plete intelligence and deep interest they manifested in respect to the design; and the presence also at the convention of several Americans just returned from prolonged and critical European travel, who gave their sympathies and prospectiv cooperation, which determined me to choose this occasion to inaugurate, formally, this Political Side or Section of the Pantarchy; and these were the events which occurred: Premising that, in so far as individuals can stand for nations, Mrs. Egli represents the republic of Switzerland, Mr. Massena the republic of France, and myself the United States—the three great republics of the world—it being in the true order that the republics should enter the Pantarchy first, as being nearer to its design.

I concluded a somewhat prolonged exposition of the Pantarchy in this sense, on this last evening of the convention, by stating a technical distinction between Pantarchists and Pantarchians (see "Constitution of the Pantarchy"), to the effect that students of the principles of Pantarchism and who favor its purposes sympathetically, but without becoming formal and proposed members of the organization, are denominated Pantarchists; and the formal and professed members are known as Pantarchians. The difference is something like that between the congregation and the church-members in church affairs. I stated that I hav good reason to believe that every person present was a Pantarchist, but that only two, Mrs. Egli and Mr. Massena, had proposed themselvs and been accepted by me for full membership. I then greeted them as fellows, extending a hand to each, and the ceremony was concluded, except in its financial aspect. A small single piece of money was then put into my hand by each of the new members, to symbolize the principle of Voluntary Taxation, upon which the new order of government is founded. Of the fund thus placed at my disposition, I then turned over (appropriated) ninety per cent to Mrs. Heywood to be applied by her to the local work at Princeton, auxiliary to the Pantarchy, retaining ten per cent of the amount, as the special contribution to the sustentation of the center. And, in fine, I then appointed Mrs. Egli as one of my semi-military helpers (in this new Salvation Army), aide de camp—the first appointed with that title—and appointed Mr. Massena Courier to the Pantarchy abroad, with the prospectiv office of Embassador.

The special logement of the University-state, as the Head of the Pantarchy, is the University of the Pantarchy. Such an institution has been chartered under the Special Act of Congress for the District of Columbia. Circumstances hav hitherto fixed its working center at New York, at and near my home (of course, also in an embryonic way, for the want of men and means). Circumstances now seem to point to the development of a branch of the University at this place, as a summer resort of the students, and a summer school of Philosophy, Science, and Universal Reform. Foote-Note on Vivisection.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: After reading Mr. Preston's last communication on vivisection, I concluded to make no reply, for two reasons. Firstly, because he was manifestly unwilling to discuss the subject from the point of view of my first criticism—that it is relativly unimportant as an evil; and, secondly, because, as I hav previously said, I do not consider it of enough importance to occupy much of your space. To fortify my position, I had made a few clippings from the daily press, of which I will now only offer the suggestiv titles, though any one subject could be written up in as lurid a light, and with as heart-rending a pen picture, as Mr. Preston's last presentation of details of vivisection. The headings are: "Wanton Butchery of Deer in Canada;" "A Bill Before Parliament Prohibiting Wanton Shooting of Pigeons;" "The Buffalo Chase"—a slaughter of four hundred buffaloes during three weeks by one hunting party in Montana, just for sport. One clipping I would like to quote here:

"Recent dispatches state that a great deal of indignation has been excited over the reported condition of insane women in the county poorhouses throughout the state of Indiana. The secretary of the state board of health and the superintendent of the insane asylum hav been making a survey of these poorhouses, and the condition of things is terrible. Superintendent Fletcher states: 'If one could tell half the truth about the poorhouses of Indiana, and the treatment of the women in them, the insane and the idiotic, I believe the women of Indiana would move upon them and tear them down. There is a fine opening for reform, and if you will awaken sentiment on the subject, you cannot fail of doing great good.'"

This is an object more worthy of humane effort and a philanthropic purse than the formation of an anti-vivisection society. But now I come to the point that led me to open up the subject again. Mr. Preston's last appeal was that all good people should exert themselvs to prevent the legal license of vivisection under restriction as in England, and it is the report of work done under such licenses (published in the Medical Record of July 12th), which I would call especial attention to. The extent of the evils of vivisection in England can be fairly judged from this report, I suppose, and if there is any clandestin work of a more serious kind, it would not be reached by a repressiv law any more than by the existing provision for license. Now for figures: 44 persons held licenses; 32 licenses were made use of; 535 experiments were performed; 290 were made with anesthetics, and the subjects killed before return of sensibility; 177 were experiments in inoculation—some 55 of these without anesthetics, but causing no more direct pain than vaccination. The inspector's report concludes, "The amount of direct or indirect suffering from the performance of physiological experiments during the past year was wholly insignificant, and limited to about 15 animals." I hav nowhere denied that vivisection may hav been accompanied by unnecessary brutality since its inception, but this is true of other good institutions, or such as hav been considered good. There is less brutality in the enforced service of domestic animals, less in the education of children, less in penal and insane asylums, and very much less in the propagation of creeds; but in all directions there is as much room for improvement as in the practice of vivisection; and probably in no other direction is progress more rapid and more in accord with humane ideas.

Wasted Millions.

The English church is enormously rich. Precisely what its income is the two archbishops who are at the head of the establishment alone know, and they keep that knowledge to themselvs; but with tithes, glebe, pew-rents, and other sources of revenue included, the income is over $50,000,000 per annum. Some of the most valuable property in the United Kingdom belongs to the church of England, which has held it ever since it was taken away from the Roman Catholics and bestowed by Henry VIII. on his church to make the fealty of the newly created bishops certain and sure. The archbishop of Canterbury has an income of $75,000 a year, and the archiepiscopal palace given him as a residence besides. The fortunate holder of this pleasant position is the Right Honorable and Most Reverend Edward White Benson, who succeeded Archbishop Tate in 1882. He has a staff of seven persons, the head of which is a dean, the Very Rev. R. Payne Smith, who receives $10,000 a year, and six canons—one an arch-deacon—who each get $5,000 a year, and has also a large household of officials, such as prebendaries, minor canons and other clergymen. The other bishops are paid as follows: Right Hon. and Right Rev. John Jackson, bishop of London, has $50,000 a year; Lightfoot, bishop of Durham, $35,000 (his dean, the Very Rev. C. W. Lake, is allowed $15,000 for assist- his superior, which he does by preaching one sermon a week); Edward Harold Browne, bishop of Winchester, $35,500; Right Rev. James R. Woodford, bishop of Ely (it is he of whom Thackeray speaks under the thin disguise of "the bishop of Ealing,"), $27,500. The bishops of Bath, Lincoln, Oxford, Salisbury, and Worcester each receive $25,000, and the others are paid from $22,500 to $15,000, and finally, the bishop of Sodor and Man, who has neither cathedral or dean, gets $10,000 annually, principally for doing nothing.

The First Sight of Greely.

From Mr. Norman, the ice pilot of the Thetis, who was the first to enter Lieutenant Greely's camp, the following graphic report has been elicited:

"At 8 o'clock on the evening of the 22d of June, having found a record previously three miles north of Cape Sabine, we proceeded in the steam launch to the spot indicated as the camping ground of the Greely party. As we approached within two yards of the shore we saw a man staggering down the hillside toward the ice fort. He held a small flag in his hand attached to which was a piece of a handkerchief. This he feebly waved. As soon as the steam launch struck the shore Captain Ash, of the Bear, and myself jumped on the shore. The man proved to be Long, one of the Greely party. He wore a haggard, ghastly look, and was scarcely able to stand. He muttered out his words. They asked him how all hands were. He replied, 'There are seven of us left.' I ran up immediately to the place where he pointed out the camp. Captain Ash and Lieutenant Colwell went back to the launch to bring some pemmican biscuits and some stimulating drink. When I reached within a few yards of the tent I cried out, 'Cheer up, Greely.' 'Is that you, Norman?' faintly replied Lieutenant Greely, who knew my voice, although three years had elapsed since I bid him farewell in the Proteus in Lady Franklin Sound.

"A fierce storm was blowing and the tent had fallen on its wretched occupants. I cut and tore it open, entered and there saw with horror the pale, shriveled form of Greely lying in the middle of the camp, encased in his sleeping bag; Ellison, with hands and feet lopped off by frost since the first of the previous year; Beiderbeck lay down listlessly in front of Greely; Connell, pointed at by his comrades as dying, was reclining in a motionless posture on Greely; Brainard lay down alone under the shelter of a corner of the tent, and was separated to the eye from his comrades in misfortune. Immediately Captain Ash, Lieutenant Colwell, and the chief engineer arrived, and we at once began to administer small doses of food of the lightest description. The men at first were ravenous and loudly insisted on getting more and more food. We refused to gratify their wishes, fearing disastrous results from over-eating.

"The launch was dispatched to the steamer, and brought on shore to our assistance Drs. Ames and Greene and Commander Schley. Preparations were at once made to convey the party on board. All the records were gathered up, and everything worth saving was carried down to the launch. We left nothing behind but some clothing and a few cans of the wretched food on which Lieutenant Greely and his men were living for weeks. This consisted chiefly of scraps of sealskin cut up in small pieces about the size of a cent piece. It had been stewed and converted into a kind of broth, with some shrimps and seaweed. This repulsiv stew formed the sole diet of Lieutenant Greely and his unfortunate comrades."

Popular Creed.

"I believe in Capital, Father Almighty, maker of weal and woe, and of all things visible and invisible. And in one power, Usury and Increase, the only begotten Son of Capital, begotten of the Father before all dues. Money of money, wealth of wealth, very cash of very cash, begotten, not made, being of one substance with capital, and whereby all things are done; which for us men and for our perdition came forth from the bottomless; and was invented by 'anra sacra fames,' and incarnate of the virgin money, and was made gold, stamped, and established also for our fleecing under all governments. It is conjured with and buried and made to rise again, according to the bank books.

"And I believe in 'anra sacra fames,' the Lord and Giver of Business, which proceedeth from Capital and Interest, which with the Father and Son together are worshiped and glorified; which spake by the economists. And I believe in one all-gathering and illimitable Thrift. I acknowledge one and every dodge for the fleecing of the poor, and I look for the Kingdom of Iniquity and eternal plunder to come—amen."

A New Zealand View of the Population Question.

From the Freethought Review (Wanganui).

There is no part of Mr. George's book, "Progress and Poverty," more open to criticism and refutation than the chapters on Malthusianism. To tell the Irish people that they may be as reckless and improvident in this one respect in the future as they hav been in the past, if they can only get rid of landlordism, is to encourage them to sink into a more helpless condition than they hav yet experienced. Whatever increase of wealth or of food may take place in consequence of political or economic changes, it is certain that, unless the prudential or other check be applied, the population will rapidly rise to high-water mark of the means of subsistence. If the economic rent were confiscated to-morrow, and every occupier lived rent free, the enfranchised tenant would be able, no doubt, to increase his family connections; though we are afraid we should hav to allow for the fact that the rentless landlord might at the same time be compelled to reduce his. The circumstances determining the population a nation may contain are too complex to enable anyone to arrive at an estimate worthy a moment's consideration. But one thing stands out as an indubitable scientific conclusion, that a people who hold it a virtue to bring as many children as possible into the world, will quickly meet with that check included in the Malthusian category which admits of no quibbling over terms—the giant specter of starvation and premature death.

Mr. Moncure D. Conway conveys to an interviewing representativ of the Pall Mall Gazette a vivid picture of British India. "The population," he says, "grows thicker and ever thicker upon the soil, increasing by millions the number of paupers—for they are all more or less paupers—festering and squalid in their misery." The interviewer appears to hav been touched by the description, and he asked: "What, then, Mr. Conway, do you think should be done?" "It is difficult to say what," said Mr. Conway with a smile, "unless we are to appoint Mr. Bradlaugh to undertake a general Malthusian apostolate throughout India." A grave word spoken in jest. The rapid increase of population is due to the absence of those checks which before the advent of British rule held sway—the massacre of millions in merciless wars and periodical famins. These checks are removed, while the prudential one has not been supplied. "In India," our authority further remarks, "the first duty of man is to breed. The women are mere child-producing machines." Christian missionaries no doubt increase the mischief as far as they are able by their idle cant about the "providence of God." It is in this field science can work out its ends beneficently, and redeem by a gradual process myriads of human beings from national and individual degradation. Mr. Conway observes that all the educated Hindoos he met were Freethinkers, and it is to them we look with the hope that knowledge will be brought home to every village commune.

☞ We wish that our subscribers who are in arrears would make a special effort to pay up. During the summer months our book sales are small, and we hav to depend upon the subscriptions coming in to pay expenses, which are just as heavy now as ever. We know that business generally is dull, that "times are hard," but the amounts are so small individually that it would seem no one can be inconvenienced by paying his dues, while in the aggregate they foot up large, and mean everything to us. It is unpleasant to us to dun our friends, and money is never asked for till imperativly needed; now we must hav it to pay bills with. A good many hundreds of dollars are due on subscriptions, so we are not asking a favor, but simple justice and square dealing between friends. It is usual for papers to exact pay in advance, but we hav never adopted the rule, believing that Liberals are honest enough not to cheat the printer. But the accommodation sorely tries our resources, and the readers ought not to force us to wait longer than they can help.

The Pulpit and Press at Odds.

The step recently taken by Park Commissioner Viele in changing the weekly concerts given in Central Park from Saturday afternoon to Sunday afternoon has awakened about all the latent bigotry in the churches of this city. Since the first concert the preachers hav been untiring in their efforts to hav the playing stopped. The general opinion of the ministers is the same as that of the Connecticut Puritans, who smashed the organ, that Sunday music is of the devil, and is one of his most potent weapons to win souls from God. They take the ground that this is a Christian country, and that one day of the week has been consecrated to Christianity; any violation of this day is, therefore, a violation of their rights. Argument with them has no effect. The insolence of their demands never seems to occur to them, and the deniers of their claims receive no courtesy.

In this fight, however, the people hav the aid of a force more potent than the pulpit—the press. With no exceptions worth noting, the great secular papers are against the clergy. Of course the religious press is a unit in backing up the churches, but its influence is small upon the general public. The Times, Sun, Herald, Star, and the best evening papers speak out openly about this question, and advise the ministers to acquiesce in what they cannot help. The time has gone by, the dominies are pointedly informed, when they could control the people's amusements. John Calvin might regulate the dress and manner of the Genevan laity, Knox, Wesley, and Mather might tyrannize over their followers, but this being the nineteenth century, and people not being all fools, the clergy must confine their efforts to the religious sphere. Any exceeding of duty will be rebuked by loss of prestige and power. When the clergy are found against the people, the people will leave the clergy.

The result of this is another victory for freedom, and another broken link in the chain supernaturalism has riveted on men. With the great press on our side, it cannot be long ere the demands of Liberalism are allowed. Let us hope that the editors will dare to argue for the other points as ably as they hav for this one of Sunday music.

The Monument Fund.

When the monument was dedicated only $5.41 was lacking to pay the entire bills. Since then we hav received the following sums:

J. D. Edgar	$1 00	Jos. La Tumee	$1 00
Henry Tilley	50	Geo. N. Cross	1 00
Dr. H. L. Horton	50	E. N. Kingsley	25
Lew Breedlove	1 00	Nelson Hunt	50
M. B. De Lano	1 00	J. Phillips	1 00
E. M. Carr	1 20	Chas W. Bowser	1 00
Wm. F. Davis	1 00	Jacob Cretors	50
Silas Burd	1 00	W. H. Fitch	1 00
Chas. Gregg	50	Jas. E. Bishop	1 00
W. A. Lowe	50	Elliott Preston	50
Peter "	50	G. H. Abel	1 00
			$17 45

These sums were all received shortly after the publication of the dedication services, and were evidently the visible signs of a generous emulation as to who should pay the last dollar. They are entered as received. Mr. Edgar's, Mr. Tilley's, Dr. Horton's, Mr. Breedlove's, Mr. De Lano's, and Mr. Carr's subscriptions were all needed, and twenty-one cents of Mr. Wm. F. Davis's. The subsequent subscriptions are subject to the order of the donors, and will be credited in any way desired, as will any sums hereafter received. If we may be allowed, we suggest that orders for lithographs would be appreciated, as the cost of that will be between two and three hundred dollars, but a small portion of which has been so far received. The lithographs ought to hav been ready ere this, but the perfection of the drawing—the first not being quite natural—has consumed much time. We are promised it now, however, very soon. But any disposition of the money will be acceptable to us, so long as our friends are suited.

The League and the Nashville "Liberal."

The Nashville Liberal is usually a bright paper, but its aged editor must hav mislaid his spectacles when he read the paragraph from THE TRUTH SEEKER criticised by him as follows:

"The noble TRUTH SEEKER, in speaking of the National Liberal League, and of the supposed inefficiency of some of its officers, closes its article by saying:

" 'If the League at the next Congress cannot take steps to command more means of action, cannot draw to its support men and women willing to work for its objects, it might as well be disbanded as a national organization, and the auxiliaries be converted into such Liberal clubs as their members prefer.'

"It was certainly unfortunate for this grand leader of Freethought to even hint about 'disbanding' the League under any circumstances."

This is nearer caviling than criticising, and applies to neither our sentiments nor words, but only to Mr. Bailey's careless misapprehension of them.

In the first place, we never said that some of the officers of the League are inefficient. They hav undoubtedly done as much work for the League as any men could do who were obliged to earn their daily bread first and labor for the organization second. If the League officers could hav had their families provided for so they could hav given their time to the work more would hav been accomplished. That they can do this in the future a salary should attach to the offices of president and secretary of the League, and these officers should go into the field and earn it.

We said, "disbanded as a national organization," leaving the local Leagues to be converted into Liberal clubs—as they now are, in fact, for their allegiance to the parent League is only a formal one, with no benefit to either. And really, what is the use of paying office rent, clerk hire, postage bills, etc., unless some good comes out of the expenditures? The Leagues should be brought into closer relations, the auxiliaries having responsibilities to the national society and deriving benefits therefrom, and the whole should be consolidated and activly supported.

Questioning a gentleman from London the other day, a Liberal of enthusiasm, we learned one reason for Mr. Bradlaugh's great power in that country. It comes from the strong organization of the National Secular Society, which has branches in all parts of England, whose officers are in constant communication with the officers of the parent society. Nothing of importance to Secularism can transpire in any place without some Liberal learning of it, and giving information to the nearest branch, whose secretary sends the information immediately to London. The branches are also local committees to prepare for lectures, for the distribution of literature, and for activ campaign work generally. In turn the parent society helps the branches by furnishing counsel for members when, as sometimes happens, their outspoken opposition to Christianity and disregard of the "sacred sabbath" gets them in the clutches of the inquisition, as it did Foote and his confreres; and in different ways effectually repays the allegiance of the branches. This plan, or something similar, should be tried in this country, and we hope to see the initial steps taken at the coming Congress at Cassadaga Lake.

Man and Brute.

In a paper in the current North American Review, Mr. George J. Romanes discusses the question of mind in men and animals—whether they differ only in degree, or whether man's is of another order altogether, having a different mode of origin, and distinct traits. On this subject there is a wide divergence of opinion, even among the scientific evolutionists, but its importance is too plain to be passed over.

In early days, before evolution, we were taught that men had minds, God-given, of course, but that the reasoning faculty the Lord had endowed animals with was instinct. This theological distinction between man and the brute Mr. Romanes passes over, as "it rests upon a dogma with reference to which scientific inquiry has no point of legitimate contact." This well-phrased disdain of Christian standards is not exceptional with Mr. Romanes. It permeates all our scientific literature, and is one reason for the dislike theologians entertain of science and its votaries.

Observing that it has been established that the principles of evolution apply to the phenomena of mind as we find them presented in the lower animals, and that we hav satisfactory evidence of these phenomena being all due to processes of a natural and continuous development, the causation of which is now in a large manner ascertained, Mr. Romanes attempts to prove not only the mental evolution of man, but to show the principles which hav been concerned in the process. He first considers the question on purely a priori ground. There is no dispute that the process of organic and mental evolution has been continuous throughout the whole region of life and of mind—with the one exception of the mind of man. Therefore he holds, as reason one, that it is highly "improbable that the process of evolution, elsewhere so uniform and ubiquitous, should be interrupted at its terminal phase," as it must be if man's mind is of a distinct order from other minds, or reasoning powers, found to exist. This he considers a very strong point, the presumption that there can be no such break in the chain of evolution being so "considerable that it could only be fairly counterbalanced by some very cogent and unmistakable facts showing a difference between animal and human" minds "so distinctiv as to render it . . . impossible that one could ever graduate into the other." Second: It is unquestionable that the mind of every individual human being presents to actual observation a process of gradual development or evolution from infancy to manhood, and that in this unfoldment from a zero level to, it may be great genius, there is no sudden break, or leap of progress, such as the passage from one kind of mental life to another might be expected to show. Everyone, from their own experience in watching the growth of children, can bear Mr. Romanes out in this. Third: It is also a matter of recorded observation, from documents, traditions, antiquarian remains, and flint implements, that in the history of the race there has been a steady growth from barbarism to civilization, and no traces of "cataclysmic" jumps are anywhere found. This, the last of his a priori considerations, Mr. Romanes concludes proves that if the process of evolution was interrupted between the anthropoid apes and primitiv man, it must hav recommenced with primitiv man and since then been continued as uninterruptedly in the human species as it previously did in the animal. This hypothetical break between the anthropoid apes and early man Mr. Romanes holds to be antecedently improbable; and, if analogy is worth anything as a guide in reasoning, he is right, for the principle of continuity in nature, as he says, is the principle found by men of science to be the one most often verified when introduced as a hypothesis to temporarily bridge over a chasm or break in discovered facts.

Mr. Romanes then proceeds to review impartially the objections found by the psychologists to this theory of continuous evolution in mind as well as in physical bodies. It used to be held that animals were unconscious machines, but he concludes that the theory has been given up by all whose opinions in such a matter are worth considering; and he likewise sets aside as of no consequence the distinction once made between human and brute psychology that the one is rational and the other not, for he contends that the rationality of brutes—meaning by rational merely the power of drawing inferences from observation—has been abundantly proved by the numberless instances of the display of this quality. The dictum of Aristotle and Buffon that brutes hav no power of mental apprehension Mr. Romanes considers to be unquestionably opposed to all the facts of observation; and he finds in Locke the first opponent with objections worthy extended consideration. Locke held that the mind of the brute differs from that of man in not being able to form abstract ideas. To this Mr. Romanes observes: "Now, it must be observed that Locke here restricts the term abstraction to that higher manifestation of the faculty which consists in thinking about an abstraction as an abstraction. I cannot find that he denies to animals the power which they unquestionably possess of forming general ideas of qualities as apart from any particular objects in which the qualities may inhere. A dog, for instance, like a young child, has a general idea of hot and cold, good-for-eating and bad-for-eating, etc., although we hav no evidence to show that he ever thinks about this idea as an idea, or sets the idea itself before his mind as an object of contemplation. To me, therefore, it appears that Locke, when properly understood, has here hit the nail upon the head. The one great distinction, and indeed the only one which can be shown to obtain between the two orders of mind in question, consists in the power which the human mind displays, not merely of forming abstract ideas of qualities as apart from particular objects, but of thinking about these abstractions afterward as abstractions. This is the initial or basal distinction. But, narrow at first as the space included between two lines of rail at their point of divergence, we hav here the beginning of a difference which is destined to end at the opposit poles of mind. For, by a continuous advance along the same line of development, the human mind (we may see the process exemplified in the psycho-genesis of every child) is enabled to think about abstractions of its own making, which are more and more remote from the sensuous perceptions of concrete objects; it can unite these abstractions into an endless variety of ideal combinations; these, in turn, may become eleborated into ideal constructions of a more and more complex character; and so on, till we arrive at the full powers of introspectiv thought, of which we are each one of us directly cognizant."

In this Mr. Romanes finds "the only distinction that can be shown to obtain [exist] between the two orders of mind." And the task of explaining it is the one he sets for himself. In the first place, he finds that "all the emotional and intellectual ingredients of animal psychology are identical with those of human, so far as they go." This being so, the difference is but a prodigious superadded growth. Is this growth accounted for by environment and experience? Mr. H. Lewes has shown, says Mr. Romanes, that in animals as well as in ourselvs, there is a "logic of feelings." That is to say, familiarity with the circumstances of his life has given man a logic, or grouping together of laws. He is also able to reason about his own thoughts. Whether animals are in any measure able to do this, there is no question that they can and do adapt their actions to circumstances, thus evincing a logic of feelings. Reasoning that this proves the common origin of both, Mr. Romanes shows how it is that men hav gone so far, mentally, beyond their brute ancestors. The reason of this is, the power of speech. "A very little reflection," he says, "is enough to show of how immense a service are verbal signs as instruments of thought. By giving to an abstract idea a name we are able, as it were, mentally to handle it, to compound it with other symbolical abstractions of the same kind, and so on till we arrive at verbal symbols of more and more complex qualities, as well as of conception further and further removed from immediate perception. Words are thus like the steps of a ladder, by the help of which we climb into higher and higher regions of abstraction; they are also like coins or bank notes, into which we manage to condense a large amount of that value which we term meaning; or, to use a still closer analogy, they are like the symbols employed by the mathematician, which may contain in an easily manipulated form the results of a long calculation, no part of which could hav been conducted but for the use of other symbols of the same kind. So that, to put the matter briefly, we may say with Max Müller, that the growth of thought and language is coral-like; each generation of living thoughts secretes around itself the staple forms of words, which in turn serve as the basis for a further generation of thoughts."

The next question is, Why has man alone been gifted with the power of speech? First, in what does the essence of the logos consist? or, what is speech? "Analysis shows that it consists in the power of predication, or of making a proposition, which is the expression of the power of forming a judgment. Thus far, men of all schools of thought are in agreement, even Mr. Mivart conceding that 'if the brute could think "is" man and brute would be brothers.' I conceive, then," concludes Mr. Romanes, "that the only question before us is to explain the possible evolution of the power of predication."

Asking the inquirer to remember that speech in all its forms is nothing more than a highly elaborated systems of signs, and that the gestures of a deaf mute or an Indian are as distinct propositions as though orally made, Mr. Romanes proceeds to show that this power to propose occurs among animals at least as far down in the scale as the ants, and much more developed in animals as high as the anthropoid apes. "Pointer dogs make gesture signs, the meaning of which they well understand; terriers will 'beg' for food; cats will pull at one's dress to lead one to their kittens in trouble; and a hundred other instances might be given. It is true that in none of these instances hav we any evidence of predication, properly so called. But we hav the germ of it. And when we hav an animal sufficiently intelligent intentionally to translate its logic of feelings into a logic of signs for the purpose of communication, we hav an animal which, in effect, is making a proposition, although it may not know or think about the proposition as a proposition. The quadrumana habitually employ vocal signs as well as gestures whereby to express their emotions and the comparativly simple logic of their feelings. Let us, then, try to imagin an anthropoid ape somewhat more intelligent than the remarkable chimpanzee which has recently been brought to the Zoological Gardens of London, and which, in respect of intelligence, as well as hairlessness and carnivorous habits, is, perhaps, the most human-like of these animals hitherto observed. It does not seem to me very difficult to imagin that such an animal should extend the vocal signs which it habitually employed in the expression of its emotions to the conventional naming of a few familiar objects, such as food, child, etc. This, indeed, is no more than we find to be the case with a much less intelligent animal, viz., the parrot, which in many cases certainly uses vocal signs as names—whether these vocal signs are words the meaning of which it has been taught, sounds imitativ of those made by the objects named, or, as is sometimes the case, wholly arbitrary, such as a peculiar squeak to signify a nut. Whether this nominativ stage of language in the ape was first reached by articulation, or, as is more probable, by vocal sounds of other kinds, and gestures, is immaterial. In either case the advance of intelligence which would thus hav been secured would in time hav reacted upon the sign-making faculty, and so hav led to an extension of the vocabulary, both as to sounds and gestures. Sooner or later the vocal signs, assisted by gestures, and even leading to a gradual advance of intelligence, would hav become conventional, and so, in the presence of suitable anatomical conditions, articulate."

Mr. Romanes has entered, in discussing this subject, upon one of the most difficult of the problems arising from the general acceptance of evolution, and the endeavors of its expounders to follow the protoplasmic germs up through successiv stages of life to man. Physically, his origin may be taken as settled; its twenty-two steps hav been traced; and if Mr. Romanes can determin the psychological problems ever presenting themselvs, his labors will be second to none in value. In his present paper—which is but an epitome of his forthcoming book—he has, we think, made a large contribution to evolutionist literature.

"THE Truth Seeker Annual and Freethinkers' Almanac," 25 cents.

A Call for the Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League.

All citizens of the United States, whether they hav heretofore acted with this League or not, who believe in a secular government and a secular republic, separation of church and state, the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all, and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press as the basis of universal suffrage, are invited to appear or to be represented at the Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held at Cassadaga Lake, Chautauqua Co., New York, on Monday and Tuesday, the 8th and 9th of September next (at the close of the New York Freethinkers' Convention at that place).

The League has for its objects the purposes above stated, and has sought to carry them out by securing:

1. THE TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE; this is the first and chief object of the League, and includes among other things the taxation of church property and the suppression of sectarian appropriations; and, as necessary to that general object, the League insists upon,
2. The protection of all citizens in their equal religious, civil, and political rights, without regard to religious belief or want of such belief.
3. The universal, secular, and scientific education of the people, so as to emancipate them from the prevalent superstitions.
4. The impartial, secular administration and enforcement of the laws by secular authorities only, who shall be directly responsible to the people.
5. The inviolability of the mails, and their impartial administration for postal purposes only.
6. Freedom of the press and of speech, without any censorship except responsibility before the jury of the country for any abuse of that freedom.

Year by year we find that the above principles and measures are openly or covertly violated more and more in every state and by the general government, and chiefly through church influences. Any sect, church, or "religion" that militates against these principles openly or covertly, directly or indirectly, is the enemy of American liberty and of the American people. The League is opposed to churches and "religions" only as they are opposed to liberty and to the rights of man, the general education of the people, and the progress of mankind.

All American citizens, therefore, to whom these principles and objects commend themselvs, should rally to their support by a common and permanent organization, which is now the National Liberal League, and should make it the nurse and defender of freedom in every town and state as well as in the nation. In no other way can "the blessings of liberty," the birth-right of American freemen, be effectivly maintained. At this Congress it is designed to revise the basis of the League so as to make it so broad and Liberal that all who sympathize with its general purpose may co-operate with it to the end that a general union of all citizens of Liberal sentiments may result, and that new officers of the League may be selected without regard to past differences.

All Charter and Life Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Each Auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates—its president, secretary, and three other members—to the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats in the Congress, and to votes by the permission of the Congress.

Combine, then, for your common defense, for general secular education, and for the firm support of the essentials of free institutions. Let it not be your fault if, in the growth and prosperity of our people, their liberties and yours are frittered away and lost!

Literary Notices.

THE North American Review for August contains an article by Justice James V. Campbell on "The Encroachments of Capital," which will command the serious attention of all readers. Richard A. Proctor treats of "The Origin of Comets," and succeeds in presenting that difficult subject in a light so clear that persons who hav little or no astronomy can follow his argument. "Are We a Nation of Rascals?" is the startling title of an article by John F. Hume, who shows that states, counties, and municipalities in the United States hav already formally repudiated, or defaulted in the payment of interest on, an amount of bonds and other obligations equal to the sum of the national debt. Judge Edward C. Loring finds a "Drift toward Centralization" in the recent judgment of the United States Supreme Court on the power of the federal government to issue paper money, and in the opinion of the minority of the same court rendered in the suit for the Arlington property. Julian Hawthorne writes of "The American Element in Fiction," and there is a symposium on "Prohibition and Persuasion," by Neal Dow and Dr. Dio Lewis.

A GOOD way to promote the cause of Freethought is to get trial subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. To such the paper will be sent three months for fifty cents.

Letters from Friends.

PHILADELPHIA, July 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find three dollars for the paper for the ensuing year. Permit me to congratulate you on the able manner in which the paper is edited. Every number is full of interest and shows the untiring industry of its management.

Yours respectfully, JOHN B. MAKINS.

CARROLL, IOWA, July 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find petition for state secularization containing eleven names. I hav handed it to men who called themselvs Infidels, yet they would not sign. One man said the public money was never appropriated for religious purposes. He believes that all religions are frauds, yet he is willing that the Bible should be read in the schools, and the Jesus crowd nursed and encouraged in every way possible.

RICHARD CONWAY.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., July 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav this moment finished reading S. P. Putnam's article in last TRUTH SEEKER, of the 12th inst., and it so fully expresses my sentiments in regard to the "new departure," also the right man for leader, that I cannot refrain saying Amen, and Amen. I, too, hate compromise and policy. He says, "Giv us the whole man." Then I say, Place woman by his side, and all will be well. Never will the League succeed till this is done. Heed my words! ABBIE KNAPP.

HIGHLANDS, N. C., July 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Would it be possible or practicable among Freethinkers to save and keep up a fund—as the Christians do—to pay one or more good Liberal lecturers to spread the truth among the people by lectures and circulating of Liberal documents among such communities as are indifferent to or unable to hire lecturers? There is in every village the nucleus of a Freethought organization, that, with a little assistance, might be developed into a successful, self-sustaining society.

Respectfully yours, JAMES RIDEOUT.

WASHINGTON, IND., July 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The inclosed $1.00 is to pay my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER four months, to November 22, 1884. I hav no fault to find with THE TRUTH SEEKER except its willfully wrong spelling, and would like it still better than I do if you printed fewer articles on Spiritualism, which I consider a grand humbug. I like the paper well enough to continue a subscriber, and I think the editorials, articles on the tariff, and Miss Wixon's department, worth many times the subscription price of it. I want John Peck's "Infidel Philosophy" printed in book form. It would make one of the grandest works ever published. Y JOHN A. GEETING.

MURRAY, O., July 16, 284.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of July 12th I see that no immediate action will be taken in regard to state secularization through Congress, Mr. Curtis and yourself agreeing that it will be better to postpone the matter until a more convenient season. By following in this direction it will enable us to increase the number of signers. Consequently I took around another petition this morning and succeeded in securing a few names. I hope that every Liberal who has read THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 12th will act likewise. Let us work with renewed energy. Roll up the names. In the language of Brother H. L. Green, "Let us all unite and work for liberty and humanity." D. E. LEWIS.

HORNITOS, CAL., July 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, for which you will please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year to the inclosed address, and the balance place to my credit. I hope to get more subscribers soon. The new subscriber whose name and address I inclose is a No. 1 millwright, and an intelligent and outspoken Freethinker. He is building a quartz mill for me. I took out to the mine several bundles of TRUTH SEEKERS, which I hav sewed up in three-month volumes since January 1, 1880. Also Radical Reviews and big little Man, for the men to read in their off-hours. In the course of two weeks I will hav the mill finished, when I will hav more men to work, and will keep them stocked with Freethought reading, by which means I hope to procure more subscribers.

R. W. BARCROFT.

NORTH WOLCOTT, N. Y., July 14, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $2, for which send me the following list. I am very much pleased with the Bennett monument, and think it is elegant, and a fitting tribute to the dead hero whose name and principles it represents.

I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is growing better all the while; and I could not afford to be without it, for it is a source of mental food that strengthens and enlightens the brain that feasts upon it; and I only wish that every individual bowed down in the slavery of ignorance and superstition could receive the blessed liberty and light shed abroad by the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER, edited by E. M. Macdonald.

Yours for Freethought, C. H. BETTS.

WOODSTOCK, VT., July 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I look upon your paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, as the highest type of a journal in all respects, with one exception. I am a Spiritualist—this you knew before; I hav not changed. But my knowledge of that world to come increases with age, from my intercourse with those that hav gone on before me. They return and do communicate, and I do see and hold communion with them as when on earth. I hav one or two friends whom I wish to hav know what is going on out of their beaten track. I know of nothing that will increase their desire to know of these things more beneficially than your paper, and I will send you their names and remit to you the amount that you require for three months, hoping that at the end of that time they will wish to continue in the knowledge which they can gain by the perusal of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours, etc., JOHN D. POWERS.

DEADWOOD, DAK., July 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2.30, of which giv me credit on subscription for $1, and apply the balance to the Monument Fund—that is to say, $1 of it—the thirty cents is for the picture.

I hope you will encourage the movement to reunite the Liberal forces at the coming League Congress. It seems to me that Underwood's resolution on the obscenity question, as adopted at Philadelphia, and as it stands to-day, covers the ground sufficiently to satisfy the most jealous liberty-lover in the land; while our divisions are certainly most deplorable, and are making us a laughing-stock to all sensible men, and our enemies in particular. Inasmuch as it has been charged that Freelovers hav captured the Liberal League, it would, in my judgment, be wise also to refute such sentiments by proper resolutions at the next session.

Respectfully yours, D. P. WILLCOX.

VINTON, July 12, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: No man venerates the illustrious dead more than I do; but I never thought very much of monuments of marble or brass to enable us to remember them. But I do believe a good deal in monuments of goodness, of good deeds, noble thoughts, and great truths, that lift up the fallen, relieve distress, and make the world better for having been in it. Monuments of that kind will always endure, and never feel the molding touch of time. Hence the reason of my not subscribing to the Monument Fund long ago. But since I hav seen a picture of the beautiful shaft, and read the wise and truthful sayings of our mutual friend on it, I feel like dropping a flower, however small, on his grave. So I will send a little—enough to make the balance an even $5. With kind and loving regards for Mrs. Bennett,

I am truly her friend, M. BRANIN.

ST. PAUL, MINN., July 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find a notice of a lecture delivered by Col. R. G. Ingersoll last Sunday night at the Grand Opera House. The extract is taken from the St. Paul Daily Globe, a paper by no means favorable to his views, nor likely to giv a too glowing account of the interest manifested by the people. This was his second appearance in this city. The Young Men's Christian Association had two or three of its advocates stationed near the Opera House distributing tracts, as is customary in such cases. Their texts were from 1 Tim. i, 1-17. The tracts were put into use to turn the masses from the "wide road that leadeth to destruction." The tracts were headed "Orthodoxy," and were supposed to giv a better definition of the subject than Col. Ingersoll. They made very poor reading, but many occupied the time looking them over until the colonel made his appearance on the stage, when everything but what he was saying seemed to be forgotten. From the beginning to the end the attention was most marked, while the rounds after rounds of applause that burst forth all through his lecture showed how much the audience appreciated his rare eloquence and humorous sallies. The success which has attended this lecture should be encouragement to other Freethought speakers to try the same field. Hitherto they hav fought shy of this place, and this is probably the reason we hav no Liberal society here, although the churches are by no means strong. F. W. GREAVES.

MARCO, FLA., July 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read all that I hav seen or heard of as coming from Col. Ingersoll, and in point of religion I agree with him in toto. But I think he is rather hard upon us in the South. The colonel should remember that Massachusetts was once as much of a slave state as South Carolina. Massachusetts found out that capital payed better in cotton machinery than in slaves. So she ran her slaves off South, sold them for cash, invested in cotton machinery, and then found out that slavery was wrong. The North proclaimed their states free. They preached it in their pulpits and taught it in their schools, until the rising generation thought that God would hold them responsible for its existence in the United States.

Now comes in what I object to. You sold us this property; got value received for it; whipped us, and took it away from us because you were the most powerful. Where is the justice in this case? I don't say that the negro should not be free, but I do say I don't think it was fairly done, after selling us the property and getting pay for it. I think it would hav been right to pay us for it if you wished to free it.

The negro can never make a respectable citizen of our country. I would rather hav a Chinaman for a neighbor than a negro. Nine-tenths of the crime committed in the South is done by negroes. No respectable white person will invite a negro into his house, or sit at his table. There is a law against intermarriage in this state. You had as well think of making a courser out of a donkey as to think of making a president of a negro. It is only the lowest grade of white people that associate with them in the South.

Do you think you could by hunting the negro portion of Africa or the United States find an equal to D. M. Bennett? No, it is not in the race to produce such a head. I wish to state a case that occurred near here some time ago: They were trying a negro, and insisted that a majority of the jury should be negroes. They got all but one negroes, and elected a big-lipped fellow foreman. They soon agreed and went before the judge; the judge called for their verdict. The foreman said: "Wergit! I war in the room dar wid de boys; I didn't see no wergit." The judge looked at the white man in the jury and said: "Were you never on a jury before?" "Yes, sir," he said. "Why were you not appointed as foreman of the jury?" Pointing to the thick-lipped foreman, he said: "They elected that gentleman." If the bone and sinew of Florida has got to govern it, I don't see why mules and jackasses should not hav a fair show. W. T. COLLIER.

EL IOWA, June 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Ever since the first proposal to erect a monument to the memory of our dear Bennett, it has been my intention to drop my "mite" into that Fund. To that end you will find herewith $2—$1 for the Monument Fund, the balance as elsewhere designated. Here, in our village of seven hundred inhabitants, we are all blest (?) with four church houses, and as many church organizations, with two others struggling for a foothold. But we also hav a good graded school, and enough good stanch Liberals to run it; and with the help of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and some other Liberal papers, books, and tracts, the thing is about equalized or neutralized, and, on the whole, Freethought is gaining every day.

I don't know if this scribbling will ever see the light, but if it does, I want to say that, as for myself, I came into this world without any wish on my part, and shall fight the leaving of it to the last minute. If I ever existed before I came to this world, I cannot remember it. And if I am to go to another world after this life is done, I hav no knowledge of it now. As to an an infinit God, I, not being able to conceive of the infinit, consequently cannot conceive of an infinit God. If I was always in existence, and did not know it till I was forced into this world, and if I am to be forced out of this into another world by any kind of a God, or any other kind of law, I am satisfied he, or it (the law), will be as kind to me hereafter as now; and this is about the turn of mind of most of the Liberal element here. I am much pleased with your paper, and as soon as I am able, financially, shall work hard for a Liberal reading-room here. Yours, with my heart and money in the work, JAMES COOLEY.

SAINT JOHNS, A. T., July 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I had, all along, supposed the "crank" Guiteau, who went thundering down the gallows, to be the chief of cranks; but it appears, however, that the state of Maryland can claim this (dis)honor, for she has yet within her borders the crankiest of cranks. It is to be hoped, for the fair reputation of Maryland, that the "fool-killer" will soon pay a visit to that unfortunate state. Of the two cranks—Guiteau and the Catonsville crank—I prefer the first named. Both were insane after a little notoriety; the first capped the climax of his idiotic ambition by swinging from the gallows, while the other, if left severely alone, will finally die within the walls of some institution for confirmed imbecils. In his correspondence for July 2d, he talks very incoherently of "mad-houses," "strait-jackets," etc., which leads one to believe his wandering, ill-balanced, and rapid brain must hav, in some undefined way, a misty premonition of his future fate.

"This ready man at every meeting rose,
Something to hint, determin, or propose;
And grew so fond of teaching, that he taught
Those who instruction needed not nor sought."

Some people (the Maryland crank is one of them) are never so happy as when they can attract attention from their superiors; and the more fool, the more "cheek" they will display to the world in order to attain this pinnacle of their ambition.

"When Truth and Reason are our friends, we seem Alive! awake!—the superstitious dream.
Oh! then, fair Truth, for thee alone I seek—
Friend to the wise, supporter of the weak.
From thee we learn whate'er is right and just;
Forms to despise, professions to distrust;
Creeds to reject, pretensions to deride,
And follow thee, to follow none beside."

A. F. BANTA.

SEATTLE, July 6, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I hav gone very greatly out of my usual way to-day and visited the Young Men's Christian Association, and now to make amends I will endeavor to write and tell my Liberal friends a part of the subject of the meeting.

The music, from the "Gospel Hymns," was very fine, and to a Christian I should think would be soul-stirring. After which the sixth chapter of Matthew was read, and the text selected, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

The first speaker said that it was an absolute fact that all those who put their trust in God never were known to suffer want. He said: "Last night, as I was returning from the reading-room, I was hailed by a man who asked me if I was a member of the Young Men's Christian Association. I said, 'Yes; what is wanting?' 'I want a place to sleep.' 'You hav been dissipating, hav you not?' 'Yes,' said the man. And so it goes," said the preacher. "Out of hundreds of cases of destitution that hav come under my observation, not one has been a Christian." Said he, "Show me the man who has devoted all his life and services to Jesus who is in want." Whereupon the following thoughts entered my head and would not down: What do they say, then, of the thousands of poor women who do now and always hav devoted their lives and their best energies to the cause of Christ, but hav been dragged down and down by the force of circumstances—possibly sickness or disease, possibly by the drunkenness and other vices of their husbands, who may hav died and left them destitute with a large family of children to support without means, starvation staring them in the face, and nowhere to go for relief except to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness?" About the only way he is apt to provide "all those things that are to come afterward" is to take them hence to that "bourne [according to the belief of the church] from whence no traveler returns," or allow them to drag out the remnant of their days in misery and want; and more than likely in spite of her prayers and seeking her children will grow up around her a disgrace to the human family.

Another speaker told how long he was seeking Jesus—that for four years he watched the members of the church, trying to find one among them worthy for him to follow, that should be to him an example. At last he found Christ Jesus, and in him he put his trust. Oh, thought I, what a pity! How sad that in all his four years of watching he could not find one Christian worthy to lead him in the way he should go! I don't believe he realized how that sounded, and possibly I was the only one in the audience who noticed it.

Another said: "Our savior did not come to the earth to promis us rewards if we did good actions, but commands us to 'seek first,' etc., after which, that we might not be afraid to take him at his word, he gave the promis that 'all these things shall be added unto you.'" "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

Respectfully, L. E. H.

WALTON, IND., July 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad of the move of Mr. R. S. Shepherd in a plan for the reorganization of the Liberal League. Its present form needs remodeling. The secular organization of the government is all we want at the present time, and no more. After this is obtained there will be ample time for something else. Mr. Shepherd suggests a new name, and that is what we hav got to find. It is useless to talk about the old name; giv a horse a poor name, and nobody wants him. The name, "Liberal League," never sounded well to me at any time. Mr. Shepherd givs three names. Two of them will do well; the other will not. He says: "A new banner flung to the breeze with 'Universal Mental Liberty' on one side and 'National Liberal Union,' or 'American Secular Union,' or any other name, inscribed upon the other, will serve to fight under as well as, or better than, our old ones, grimed as they are with fratracidal gore." Please scratch out the second name, "National Liberal Union." The word "Liberal" is what I object to. It is a good enough word, but is liable to be abused. "Liberal" sounds as if there might be too much familiarity connected with its signification. There is a maxim that reads in this wise, "Too much familiarity begets disgust." As I said, "Liberal" is a good word in its place, but is liable to run to seed. Erase that second name, and I will be well pleased with the new names; and I think everybody else will, whether a Freethinker or a dependent thinker.

It would be well enough to hav an eye on this thing. I hav, myself, belonged to several organizations where there was too much familiarity, and it produced no good, but always harm. Correct principle is what will make our ship sail clear of breakers. Get right, and stick to it, and we are safe. Secular organization of our government will suit everybody but sore-headed Christians. We need not care for them. It is sound heads that we want.

I see our old "virtuous" friend, Winter, is in the Materialistic, crude form yet. I wonder if he would not like to remain so for a hundred or more years. I should not blame him for it, if so. I am quite glad that he is so brisk at his venerable age. Yours, etc., E. VAN BUSKIRK.

MILLINGTON, MASS., June 26, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Two numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER received. The paper is new to me, though after hearing and reading of it we love the name, and trust it is truthfully applied; for there are few people who do not prefer truth to error; and the more earnest, humble, and loving we are the sooner we grasp the golden fruit; and of course to learn the truth, even of this world, we must place ourselvs in a receptiv condition. So also, in regard to spiritual truths, which we learn by a somewhat different course of study. Some seem to be fitted by nature to easily learn material truths, while others more readily catch the spiritual; and then again others are so organized that almost in their virgin purity are spiritual truths unfolded to their vision; and they likewise as easily master the material things of earth. The receptacle is pure, and nature in her loveliest moods caressingly lingers there.

But to take the world as it is: we watch the dear children who cluster around us, we note their different natural qualifications—how easily one masters his mathematics, while another will puzzle himself with the same, the subject never being luminous to his vision, but perhaps will grasp the artist's pencil, and—behold the result of his ready genius! And still another, to whose nature either subject would be foreign, but with spirit eye so clear that, although his little playmate had passed the confines of mortal life, he still sees and plays with him as before he awoke in spirit life. Of course instances of this kind are rare; so, also, is the perfect artist or inventiv genius, but occasionally they flit before us in their power and beauty.

We love the soul that strives to break asunder the chains of darkness which like a girdle hav environed this earth so long, and say all hail to the workers whose hearts are alive and whose hands are ready to work for the uplifting of humanity, thereby causing untold blessings to the human family—also to those we term the brute creations, the helpless creatures, subjects of human kindness or abuse. L. SKINNER GOODNOW.

EAST CHATHAM, N. Y., July 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find three dollars for arrears and continuance of your indispensable TRUTH SEEKER.

In our little village of about two hundred inhabitants and two churches, mine is the only Liberal paper received at this post-office. Still, I think there is a decided growing Liberal sentiment manifest among us, as our churches are not as well attended as in years gone by, while prayer-meetings are barely kept alive by the exertion of our Methodist "sky-pilot" and a few leading members of both churches, and every year seems to mark a further decline of orthodox zeal. Our Baptist church changes pilots about once a year, and stands unoccupied about one-half of the time at that, as each new advocate of "believe or be damned" finds the dimes are not forthcoming according to expectation, concludes that his "call" must hav been for the man standing next to him, and soon vacates for a new adventurer fresh from some theological school, waiting for a vacancy, brimful of creeds and dogmas, doubtless expecting to astonish the world by unveiling the mysteries of godliness that no rational mind can possibly understand, hoping that eventually he may rival some Talmage and secure a salary that will secure him from not only want, but toil, care, and anxiety, so common to the lot of mortals. While I do not wish to, and hope I do not, betray confidence, I cannot but compliment our late Baptist clergyman for his frankness and honesty, expressed in an evening chat on his calling. He had lately been questioned for instruction as to the meaning of the opening of the first chapter of John the Evangelist, to wit: "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God; the same was in the beginning with God. . . . And the light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not," etc., etc. As he desired my opinion on the meaning of this holy preamble, I could not but acknowledge that to me it was a mere jargon of words, without any positiv importance or meaning, like many other passages in this "peerless, priceless" book. And he honestly acknowledged that he was in the same fix. And I am happy to say he vacated his charge, and is now engaged in an honest, honorable calling, with a good prospect of success, and does not feel compelled to make something vastly mysterious and wonderful out of nothing as a means of livelihood. In this connection, with your permission, I will attempt to giv a short history of this close communion church, that some seventy years ago was in its zenith, centered near my nativ rural neighborhood, when my grandfather's strongest interest seemed to be centered in its success, as a deacon, and occasionally as an expounder of its "word." At that time our zealous elder could take almost any text from the Bible and preach the same sermon, all well spiced with baptism by immersion, and ending with the indispensable prerequisit, "For Christ's sake."

But, strange as it may appear to a "true believer," notwithstanding the thousands of prayers that hav been presented to the throne of grace for the prosperity and success of this church by the long list of elders that hav been "called" to preside over its interests, all based upon the sacred promis that "the prayers of the righteous availeth much," the congregation, once numbered by scores, with its revivals, baptisms, and crowded sacramental occasions, is now a mere corporal's guard—a fact I hav several times alluded to when importuned to take my worthy grandfather's place. One zealous elder, considerably older than myself, who had formerly been intimate with my grandfather, and was not satisfied with my criticisms, felt called upon to overthrow and demolish my skepticism on the authenticity of the book. He wished to know what there was in the New Testament that I doubted or could not understand. My reply was that with me the book called "the Revelation of John the Divine" contained many passages and words utterly meaningless and unintelligible, among which I alluded to the 19th and 20th verses of the fourteenth chapter. I said, "First please inform me what meaning, figure, or metaphor are we to understand by the sentence, 'The great winepress of the wrath of God,' or by the 20th verse: 'And the wine-press was trodden without the city, and blood came out of the wine-press, even unto the horse bridles, by the space of a thousand and six hundred furlongs?' There, elder, you hav me honestly confounded. I can't wool that." Explanation (apparently in anger): "I suppose it means a great blood-pond. Is that what bothers you so?" And here my instruction closed, and I was still left to wander in darkness as to the importance of the great Revelation John so "especially commissioned from on high."

Yours in the cause of truth and progress, J. M. BARNES.

"RISE AND EXPLAIN."

SNOWVILLE, VA., July 15, 1884.

"I am glad of the move of Sister Elmina to investigate Spiritualism. But if she has not got the bug out of her ear that made its way in there when she was on a visiting tour some time ago, I should like to hav her rise and explain, because according to her own report that she then made she could not account for what she received from the strange medium whom she visited. Now, if what little she then received can not be accounted for, what is the need of more evidence from the same source?—C. W. Noland.

MR. EDITOR: If friend Noland expects Elmina to account for all she sees while she is trying to learn something of Spiritualism, he will doubtless be grievously disappointed. Does he think this ism would hav created all the furor it has for a quarter of a century if any single man or woman could hav accounted for and explained the phenomena? Even the letter that was mysterious in the seance I had in Washington may be accounted for in several ways. The medium was a near friend of the cousin I was staying with, and she knew I was there, and hence may hav heard me talk, and thus knew what was wrong with my vocal organs; and her knowing my cousin's relativs may hav accounted for the names given me as of present spirits at the time. All this did not occur to me then, but it did afterward. The fact that mediums are all the time trying new devices and dropping old ones as fast as explained or exposed shows there are probably natural explanations for most of the phenomena. In Baltimore a German not very long since performed the most wonderful feats of Spiritualism, and yet assured his audience it was all trick and sleight-of-hand. A friend in New York with me a year or two ago said: "Mrs. C. and I went to see Herrman perform last night. We got a seat but a few feet from him, and there, right before our eyes, in the full blaze of gaslight, we witnessed the most marvelous manifestations of spookery, and yet were assured they were but sleight-of-hand. He brought out a little cabinet on legs, let the audience go up and thoroughly examin it, turn it over, and test it in every way, inside and out. Then he brought in a little trunk (mainly of glass), and submitted that to like handling, all right out in full light and sight of the audience. Then he put a large man in the trunk, so all could see him through the glass sides, tied up the trunk with ropes and locked it, put it inside the cabinet and locked that, and instantly hands and arms were thrust through the openings, and voices talked, and upon opening the cabinet again there was an empty trunk—the man had vanished. He took a large, live rabbit out of a little scrap of paper that the audience had examined, gave it a little toss right up before a thousand watchful eyes, and it vanished before their gaze. It was wonderful. From 8 until 11 o'clock he amused a large audience with such performances." Now, does friend Noland suppose he could go and see these thaumaturgical performances and "explain" them all? Would it be fair to accuse him of having a "bug in his ear" because he could not see farther into a mill-stone than it was possible for him to do? One by one these tricks of magicians become public property, and the whole public can perform them. This is what we are aiming to do with spirit phenomena. We want to keep on witnessing it and telling what we see and hear, comparing notes and observations, and putting on record the unexplained, till by and by the collected experience will be sifted and resifted till all the chaff and bran is taken out, and if there is any real flour fit for food we will hav it preserved for future use. I shall try and do my little, and I hope all who feel interested will help me. If any friend who is mediumistic at home cares to invite Elmina to a free seance, he or she may feel assured of her gratitude, and her desire to giv a fair and truthful narrativ of the matter. Means being scant, my stay will necessarily be short. Hotel bills will prevent a long one, but better do a little than sit inactiv while there is so much need for work. Yesterday I spent most of the day weeding and hoeing the garden. In September I hope to labor in other fields. And "what will the harvest be" time only will decide. I shall do my best, and that is all anyone can promis with prospect of fulfilment.

"Of the progress of the souls of men and women
Along the grand roads of the universe,
All other progress is the needed emblem and sustenance—
Forever alive, forever forward.

"They go! They go! I know that they go,
But I know not where they go;
But I know they go toward the best—
Toward something great.—Whitman.

ELMINA.

POMONA, CAL., June 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The arrival of THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 6th created some stir among the faithful in Pomona. At their Wednesday night session of bended-knee work they petitioned the great what-is-it on account of the Infidel blasphemer who dared to make known through THE TRUTH SEEKER their deeds of crookedness with other "worms of the dust." What particular language was used on the occasion referred to I am unable to giv, as it was only intended for the keen ear of the jug-handle savior. But it is safe to presume that, as the holy petition was couched in the usual wording of the holy scrap-book, it was ejected with such power that it exploded directly at the feet of the mediator with so much force that the great white throne was rent in twain, knocking all the holy birds then congregated hors de combat. As this was probably the first shot from these quarters that ever penetrated the heavenly kingdom, it might hav been mistaken for dynamite and charged up to the fiends of England. On consulting the map of the United States they had but little difficulty in locating the magazine in California and the battery in Pomona. As no judgment from on high has been visited upon us up to date, we feel safe, and hav concluded to offer this our prayer:

A FREETHINKER'S PRAYER.

Most wonderful nature, the God that is: thou hast seen fit through the workings of thy great laws to produce and bring into existence upon the face of this earth a variety of things. Among others thou hast evolved men—some with intelligence, others with a superabundance of ignorance and superstition. Being cognizant of these facts, we make bold to address thee in behalf of this latter class. They hav through their ignorance of thy great laws become superstitious in the extreme, and hav through their distorted imaginations arrogated to themselvs knowledge and laws superior to and in conflict with thine. They hav instituted a court and a code not in harmony with thee or thy intelligence. They hav appointed judges not known to any of thy worldly people, at whose court we are not allowed to plead or in our own way present our cases. We are now being arraigned before this bankrupt court (with night sessions) for trial. The witnesses hav been tampered with, the jury has been "caved down the bank," the attorneys hav been filled with holy water even unto "slopping over;" the songs of heaven hav permeated their entire anatomy. The fables of the past will be rehearsed at the trial; the tragedy of Calvary's hill will be offered as evidence against us. The blood of Jesus will be sprinkled at our feet to intimidate us. All the crimes perpetrated in the name of any other God for the past eighteen hundred years will be charged to us. Opposition to the father, son, and holy ghost, and to their agents or indorsers, spooks and spook-houses, all the phantoms of the skies, both winged and wingless, will be our crimes. We will be styled pagan, Mohammedan, Jew, Infidel, Atheist—all this, and more, too, will be in the indictment against us. We want a fair trial and no misstatement of facts; but we shall want in vain, for the whole court and clan is corrupt.

And now, O God of nature, we are not so bad; we are not in opposition to thy laws; we do not desire to disobey thy mandates; we would not murder or wrong our fellow-being. We hav no desire to take that which does not belong to us, even though it were as free as water. We would not attempt to bribe our fellow-men for Christ's or anyone else's sake. We will not place ourselvs in a false position for the gods of the skies. We are not desirous of forcing our companionship upon the "elect." We would not willingly be transported, body and soul, to the "New Jerusalem," for money, marbles, or chalk. We prefer to remain with thee and thy people for all time in preference to joining the "band on high." We are happy here, and enjoy ourselvs extremely well in all that is. We delight in the good things of this real world; hav no taste for that of another, or desire to be educated to its wants. We love our family better than we love Jesus of Nazareth or the God of Moses. We delight in Freethought and liberty of the mind, in preference to the slavery of the creeds. We dislike hypocrisy, and hav but little faith in hypocrits in general. The songs and prayers of the faithful only amuse, but do not frighten us in the least. Pious groans and heavenly sighs in our behalf only arouse our mirthfulness, and a profound sympathy for the groaner. We do not anticipate in this contest the loss of health or appetite by their holy antics, and sincerely trust that the farce so valiantly begun will not end in a tragedy, for we are averse to deeds of blood. So blow away, ye holy band; tune up your harps of a thousand strings. Toot your rams' horns as of old. Your divine music is harmless to us, who are anchored on the rock of Freethought and common sense. H. L. SHAUG.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

My Mother.

The parental, in two loves so joined,
Makes authority and duty;
And in its constant fulfilment we find
Concord, perfection, and beauty.

There is a charm in that name of mother,
A spell never to be broken;
A love never known by any other,
Whatever loves hav been spoken.

My mother dear, the truest friend to me,
Who sweetly softened all my pain—
In this journey I follow after thee;
Thine, to me, is the sweetest name.

And of all the names known on earth,
One there is sweeter than another;
It is that name that I obtained by birth,
When I heard the name of mother.

Her ear was open to my infant cry,
As helpless in her lap I lay;
For that maternal smile I always sigh,
And feel its absence here this day.

Her eye was ever open to my wants,
And she gave me the first supply;
As for the cooling brook the thirsty pants—
Alas! that one such friend should die.

In all her manners, kindness; and so bland,
So winning to the wayward child!
Soft and gentle was that maternal hand,
That often held mine when she smiled.

The aroma of her genial spirit,
Her love, her patience—and so kind!
Let me her hopes and virtues inherit,
Is the bliss I desire to find.

The past, in all my plays, that mother bore,
And so, all through life, to the end;
And this so made me love her all the more,
As counselor, umpire, and friend.

Memory, faithful to its holy trust,
Keeps her image before me still;
Of all the loves I know, her's was the first,
And it soothes me now as it ever will.

Filial love her memory green will keep,
Never to be loved any less;
Now laid in humanity's lap to sleep,
She remains a power to bless.

LAROY SUNDERLAND.

Quincy, Mass., July 14, N.E. 109.

Blackey.

"Horses know considerable, don't they?" said Charley.

"They know too much to be abused, and insulted, beaten, and driven so fearfully as they often are," I said. "Now just look at Blackey here—do you not suppose he knows when he is well treated? And would he not know also, very quick, if ill-treated? There is not so much difference as one might think between horses and some sort of folks! I hav thought sometimes, when I hav seen men apply the whip to a poor, patient, hard-working, and obedient animal, that the four-footed creature was the best of the two."

Blackey threw back his ears and walked solemnly on as if he comprehended and applauded what I said.

I hav been acquainted with Blackey several years. I knew him when, young and dashing, he dragged a carriage-full of happy children, with their mother, away out in the country, and by river roads into the pine woods, spicy and fragrant with rich odors, and bright with nature's gallant plumage. The birds sang and the children laughed, while Blackey would shake his head and whisk his tail as if he, too, were gay and glad with the little ones. How often he would turn his head as if to see that they were all there! And how careful he always was that he should not step on them if they chanced to play around his feet! But alas! the children hav gone now—not grown out of baby clothes into stalwart manhood and beautiful womanhood, but silently gone away in their bright and joyous childhood into the unseen realm. Perhaps they are growing there in that fair land—in some fair land—and expanding with grace, knowledge, wisdom. I do not know. I only know they are absent, somewhere; that we hear no more their sweet and merry voices; that the bright smile, the gleeful song, and joyous laugh exist now only in memory. But all intertwined with it is the fond hope that sometime, somewhere, we may see again the fair, fresh faces, beautiful in their innocence and purity—that their dear voices will, sometime, be heard again, and their sweet smiles dispel the memory of the shadows that now linger about our pathway.

No doubt Blackey sometimes wonders what has become of the dear children who once played around his heels, as he looks wistfully in the faces of those he meets, but sees no bright little Binney, no blue-eyed, fair-haired Grace, and no baby Pauline, reaching up her chubby little hands to caress his glossy mane and arching neck. Perhaps he wonders, too, where the grandfather has gone who used to drive him away up Highland avenue and around the big pond; unknowing that he, also, has penetrated the mysterious shades of the silent city. And he must miss the mother of those dear little children whose heart went with them when they left her arms so empty, and her home so desolate.

"Come, oh, come!" were the words that sounded in her ears, until she could resist that loving call no longer, and fell asleep to gently pass into the land of silence with all her loved ones gone before.

Blackey is a handsome creature, of fine form and jet black coat, adorned with a white star in his forehead. He is shy and sensitiv, and when younger would start at a piece of paper in the road, or at anything strange or grotesque. But he is more mature now, and would not shy at anything, unless, possibly, at a fashionably dressed "dude" or a drunken man. He will even stand boldly by and watch the steam cars go past without the quiver of a muscle. Sometimes a pebble gets in his shoe, and then he walks lame, when Charley has to get out and remove the obstacle, when he trots off with great pleasure.

Occasionally he will make believe he has a stone, or something, in his shoe, and go very lame.

Charley gets out and makes an examination, but finds nothing there, when Blackey will toss his head, kick up his heels, and start off on a gallop, as much as to say, "I was only fooling! O you great goosey, you!"

Blackey is a horse that has no ambition to climb long hills, and will generally stop at the foot of one and look over his shoulder. In horse language that is an inquiry if he must go to the top of that hill. After a minute or so he seems to say,

"Well, if I must, I must, and I guess I'll make up my mind to do it;" and then away he goes, wishing, probably, that there were fewer hills in this life for horses to tread.

If left to himself Blackey would always stop at my gate. He has called so many times to take me to ride that he stops at the gate of his own accord, stamps his feet, looks toward the door, and neighs.

"I suppose you know what the neigh means," said Nettie.

"Certainly I do," I replied. "It means, 'Aren't you ready to go out? Come, get on your things!' And if I do not hurry, he stamps again, which means, 'Why, how slow you are! I'm impatient to be going. Come along, you Sue!'"

He knows all the nice drives in this vicinity, east, west, north, and south, but he has a very indulgent mistress, and hence he is never overdriven, never goes hungry or thirsty, nor is suffered to get very tired, although he has traveled many a long mile in his day.

He has heard us admire the lovely view up the river, and across it, and has listened to stories of wise Weetamoe, the Indian woman, and sachem of the Pocasset tribe, who was drowned in the river while attempting to cross it at Slade's Ferry, in the long ago time.

Blackey has heard us speak, also, of the far away past, when the plain at Mechanicsville was, probably, submerged, and was a part of the river, but is now dry land, and dotted over with homes and manufactories, and I fancy he knows the spot on the hillside near the river, close to the road, where low, dark stones mark the place where repose the ashes of those citizens who once owned the land with which now their bones commingle, unheeding that the roadway was made right through their resting place, uncaring that civilization has pushed and jostled their dust carelessly, as it erected shops, saloons, factories, and houses thereon.

Such are the changes of time, and from the dust of the burial-ground with its dead past arise the life and industry of the living present.

Blackey knows well the way over the "new bridge," for his head is often turned that way, and he scents the saltish air as he trots over the long bridge, until he reaches the draw, and then, glancing up at the notice, "Draw—Walk," he sedately changes his trot into a soldierly step, and walks across the draw, looking demurely at the Captains B. and S., who, leaning over the rail, are watching the fish and the ripples of the river. Sometimes Blackey has to halt until the great draw swings back to allow a stately three-masted schooner or a cunning little tug-boat to pass through on a journey up the river to Somerset or Taunton.

Across the bridge, Blackey knows the favorit way to the left, and he dashes on rapidly, especially if he hears the rumble of the railway train on the bridge overhead, for he dislikes to be outrun even by steam. On he goes to the left, and by the water-side, and the picture is a very pretty one. Across the blue waters, npon which dance many a white sail, may be seen the mammoth steamer Pilgrim at the dock, waiting for her load of passengers and freight. Other steamboats and sailing crafts are going out and coming in, while above, on an elevation, is the busy, thriving city, with its work-places and homes, its spires, domes, and school-houses, its cleanly streets and wealth of sheltering foliage, and the blue shy overhead flecked with wreaths of cumuli, and dotted with stars—which we do not see, because it is daylight.

A wealth of wild roses are blooming among the rocks on the bank all along, and handsomer blossoms, the living children, play hide-and-seek among them. Blackey likes to pause a moment to watch them, and also to take a look at Bealky's dry dock, where, nearly always, may be seen a vessel or two undergoing repairs.

Turning to the right, Blackey knows well the way to Brayton's point, for he has taken his mistress there many times in the course of his life, and when he hears her say, "I do not feel just right to-day," he knows as well as can be that a drive to the shore will revive her sinking spirits, and infuse new life and health in both brain and body.

"What fine stone walls!" he has heard me say, when I hav been one more in the carriage. And he looks over the meadows and pastures where the cattle are grazing, and almost stops to see, when I say, "See the chickens, and the pigs, and the jet black ones, playing like lambs, while the old mother looks on, contented and proud of her big family."

Then there is the great farm house—but I don't like its leaden color, though in the comfort of living in it one would not mind the color, maybe.

And then there are fields of waving oats, potato-patches all in white blossom, giving promis of hidden health and wealth in the beds beneath the thick green leaves—that is, if the bugs do not destroy them before maturity.

A thick wood, full of deep shadows and glistening with glossy leaves, proud with tall trees, whose swaying branches seem to whisper of hiding rabbits and slimy serpents, as well as wildwood flowers, twining grape-vines, aromatic herbs, and soft, velvety mosses. The birds sing gaily among the trees, secure from interruption in their homes among the deep recesses of the forest glades, and the wild flowers bloom and fade among the birds and berries.

A turn again in the road, past lovely scenery, farms through which wind Lee's and Cole's River, make a sweet and attractiv view. Flowers and ferns grow all along the country roadside, and, in their time, wild strawberries peep out from the long grasses. Passing a little railway station, all at once we come to a bend in the bay, and we are at the Brayton beach, and the water is kissing the shore as it slowly recedes, while an old man digs clams, pausing now and then to take a long breath, or, perhaps, to take in the loveliness of the panoramic scene before him—rich meadows, farm lands, historic Mount Hope below; in front the wide expanse of salt water, and the city across it on the left. The view is exquisit, the pure air intoxicating, and I always feel as if I did not stay half long enough in such a lovely spot.

One day, Charley unhitched Blackey and led him into the water to wash his feet, though he would not go till Charley took off his shoes and went into the water also.

Returning home, a load of hay was just ahead, and Blackey snatched a mouthful, and thus all the way on to the bridge he would keep snatching mouthfuls, running up to the load and then walking slowly till that was devoured, then trotting up to the load again, slyly helping himself, and so on all the distance.

If the driver chanced to turn his head, Blackey would look another way innocently, as though he never thought of newly mown hay all his life. Don't horses know?

Well, I should say they do. Blackey knows, and Mrs. P. will never part with him till the shadows fall, and, his work done, he lies down to rest.

Correspondence.

EAST DENNIS, July 6, 1884.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I hav been thinking of writing you for a long time, and hav intended to write, but every week there has been something to occupy my mind and time. I hope you will not think I hav forgotten you entirely, for I certainly hav not. I read your letter to the Investigator of a few months ago speaking of the death of your little niece Susie, and felt very sorry for you in your affliction; she was such a dear little girl. It must be very hard for you to become reconciled to her loss. It seems so strange that those who are so bright and smart should be taken away; but diphtheria is a terrible disease, and many families are made sad by its entrance into them. Please accept our deepest sympathy, even though it comes late. I hav been away to Spencer for a while. Went in May, and returned last Monday. It had been so long since I was there in the summer that it seemed like a new place to me. It is very pleasant there now and I enjoyed my visit very much; hav been almost sorry I did not stop longer, we hav had such miserable weather since I came back, so much dampness here, and it was so dry and pleasant there. My uncle and aunt were quite well; they are quite anxious to go to Saratoga, but I think it rather doubtful if they do, as it is not convenient for them to leave home.

I hav finished my silk quilt; it is quite pretty; I hope you will come to the Cape sometime and see it. I am greatly obliged to you for the pieces which you sent me for it. The superintendent of the Universalist church in Spencer felt badly because I was coming home so soon; he was quite anxious to hav me join his Sunday-school. I told him I was no fit subject for a Sunday-school, as I had hardly been in one for ten years. I expect I quite shocked him, however; I thought I was about tired of being invited in when I did not wish to go. I must close now; shall be much pleased to hear from you when it is convenient for you to write, and should be very glad to hav you come and see us. With love from father, mother, and myself,

Yours affectionately, S. HEURS.

GEORGE CHAINEY

Wishes to enter into correspondence with Liberals throughout the country in reference to lecture engagements for the coming season.

Mr. Chainey needs no recommendation from us. We print below a few of his indorsements, which certainly are the strongest testimonials ever given to any Liberal lecturer, except Ingersoll, in this country:

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL: "Mr. Chainey is one of the best thinkers in this country. He has a wonderful command of language, is full of imagery, comparison, antithesis, logic, and beauty. He feels what he says with his whole heart, and perceives it with his entire brain. He is perfectly honest, and for that very reason is intellectually keen. Downright honesty in such a man is genius. He gives a true transcript of his mind, and gives it with great power. He is well acquainted with the church, knows all the ways of the theologian, and understands the inside of the whited sepulcher of superstition. His lectures stir me like trumpets. They are filled with the loftiest spirit. Eloquent, logical, and poetic, they are as welcome and refreshing as the breeze of morning on the cheek of fever."

"Mr. Chainey is a large, well formed, though rather round-shouldered man, wears no beard, and in these days of crops would be called a long-haired man. He has a big head and broad face. He is an orator. His eloquence is his chief fascination. His periods are models of oratorical beauty, and though ordinarily unimpassioned he occasionally becomes intensely strong in his dramatic effects. He is singularly graceful of gesture. His methods inspire one with a conviction of his honesty. His elocution is masterly. His voice is magnetic, powerful, flexible, very pleasing. His sentiments are beautifully painted sacrilege. He would make a famous actor."—Scranton Daily Republican.

"Mr. Chainey's lecture was one of the most brilliant oratorical efforts ever delivered in Creston. We doubt if any lecturer, other than Col. Ingersoll, could use so much of beautiful metaphor."—Creston Commoner.

"Mr. Chainey's enunciation is perfect, his sentences forcible and impassioned. Like Ingersoll he has the happy faculty of clothing an idea in such a peculiarly taking form, that at first thought the contrary idea seems an absurdity and an imposture."—Syracuse Morning Herald.

Kelso's "Bible Analyzed."

This is a brave book; and a valuable addition to the scientific criticism of the Bible. The Bible is a thoroughly misunderstood book, and before its genuin worth can be appreciated there must be a conclusiv exposition of its barbarism and falsity. Col. Kelso has made an earnest effort in this direction. He has put his heart into the undertaking, and every line throbs with the intensity of his conviction. He battles with the Bible as the great enemy of human progress. He may giv a one-sided view of this eventful literature, but he givs an entirely truthful one, displayed with keen and masterly logic. The folly of the orthodox theory of inspiration is fully exposed. The Bible cannot be a divine revelation, even supposing there is a God to make such a revelation. It does not accord with our ideas of justice, of purity, and of truth. As an infallible revelation it presents a hideous picture of its author. It shows him to be a savage despot, and the upholder of the greatest wrongs and crimes in human history. This theory of the Bible is fearfully corrupting; it is an insult to man's best thought. It must be put away, and the dissecting-knife must be used without compunction in order that we may see the essential rottenness of bibliolatry, which is a dead monster in the path of human improvement. Mr. Kelso has done a grand work in flinging the severe light of common sense upon this superstitious reverence. He has performed his task nobly, with the vehemence of an iconoclast indeed; but with the spirit of the scholar and the philosopher. I can heartily recommend his admirable criticism. It contains a fund of information for the radical. It sweeps away an immense amount of trash and prepares for a more progressiv view of these ancient records. I am sure that Liberals will giv to this strenuous worker and to the fruits of his labor a universal welcome.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Catholicism Dying Out of Mexico.

W. A. Croffut, Freethinker, in Church Union.

CITY OF MEXICO, March 10, 1884.

Verily, the Catholic church is having a hard time during these latter years. Bismarck has laid a heavy hand on it; in France it is an outcast; and in Italy, home of the holy father ever since Peter's crucifixion, heresy so abounds that few men are bold enough to go to church; and the man who either fears, respects, or obeys a priest is regarded as little better than an idiot.

The church entered Mexico as a wonderful miracle-worker, with the winged god, Cortes, at its head, but to-day almost all of its glory is lost. Few are left to do it reverence except the peons, the very lowest class, not one in ten of whom can read or write. In the year 1859 one-third of all the real and personal property of Mexico belonged to the church, including vast tracts of fertil land and great blocks in the heart of the chief cities. When Juarez, the renowned "Upsetter," put his hand on the helm of state, he gave things new direction. He confiscated the property of priests and of the church. He abolished convents. He drove out the nuns. Even now, when the Juarezian hostility is somewhat relaxed, no priest is permitted to appear on the street in the garb of his order, and there is a law that no house shall be the residence of more than one nun. I think it was a nun I met this morning on the street, attired externally like any other woman, her white cap barely visible beneath the folds of a heavy black woolen shawl drawn over her head.

The parade of the church has everywhere been discouraged; its noise and pompous ceremonies are everywhere crippled by law. Monks and nuns hav mostly been expelled, some convents are falling to ruins, many are deserted; and at Zacatecas and Monterey they hav become hotels. It is said there is only one church in Mexico at present undergoing repairs. Many churches hav become factories, some are used as barracks, others as warehouses, and a few, it is said, as breweries, and even as barns, like the Cologne Cathedral in the wars of Napoleon. Some hav been sold by the state for a few dollars. If they were more portable I would bring one home as a relic.

As in Italy and in France, inscriptions of adherence hav been exacted of every church, and painted prominently on the facade. Here every church that survived Juarez has been compelled to raise a flagstaff on its front, where the national colors are displayed. It should be added, however, that this is not always required, as the republic of Mexico is divided into twenty-seven states, one territory, and one federal district, and these states, having greater power than our own, hav enacted restraining laws of various degrees of severity. In the states of Michoacan and Talisco, for instance, the power of the clergy is still strong; while in Yucatan, which I visited last week, they are not allowed to appear in their vestments in public; and in this city no church bell is allowed to be rung for more than three minutes at a time, nor oftener than once in half an hour.

Yet it must not be inferred that the spirit of the Catholic church is entirely broken, by any means. It is still activ, if not dominant. With the French army and Maximilian they fought railroads and telegraphs, declaring their arrival to mask the invasion of the devil; but when Juarez, the great image-breaker, came back and shot Maximilian, it prepared the way for that revival of railroad building that took place under President Porfirio Diaz, introducing the nineteenth century—the new order of things. The prescience of the church has been justified, and the iron way and the iron wire hav proved indeed its enemies. The church is losing power day by day; day by day the spirit of unbelief grows strong. As on the continent of Europe, few educated men go to church at all, and many forbid their wives and daughters to attend the confessional. But the nativ peons—the poorest and most wretched class—are still mainly subject to the priest. In many provinces and states they yield him implicit obedience. Even boycotting is carried on in this spirit of fanaticism; in many of the rural districts the peons refuse to work for a farmer or a manufacturer who is not in favor with the priest. Like the unlettered peasant of Italy and Austria, the peon of Mexico is still the bulwark of the church.

Walking down the Puente San Francisco to-day I saw an unusual flutter ahead of me. Fifty people gathered in half a minute on the sidewalk, where a carriage had stopped. A man stepped out of a carriage and walked into an open door bearing something in his hands. On the instant all fell down upon their knees on the pavement and in the street, some, indeed, dropping supine upon their faces—everyone but three of us. One of these last was a well-dressed lady, who drew her Spanish lace more closely around her head and glided away, and the other was a man in a silk hat—a Spaniard too, I think, who cast upon them a smile of pity and walked on. Presently the prostrate peons scrambled to their feet again, robed, all of them, in the nativ costume, each in two garments of coarse white cotton cloth. and some with sandals, but most of them bare of head and foot.

I hav visited the cathedral, too—the largest in North America. It stands on the great Aztec temple where sixty thousand living human beings had their quivering hearts torn out and offered reeking to the horrible god. In no cathedral of Europe did I ever see so many people at their devotions as knelt there to-day before the various shrines. The confessional boxes were mostly occupied; the priests sitting with face exposed and a listening ear, and at the other side a well-dressed lady murmuring with a fan shielding her face. There were no peons at confessional; they were all kneeling with upturned face to some gaudy object of devotion, or, with their faces bent low, kissing the wooden floor. One peon from the rural districts knelt serenely behind a bag of corn which he had set upon the floor in front of him; another had a string of live chickens around his neck, hanging head downward and sending up a gentle peep of pain as he counted his beads and said his prayer. Perhaps he prayed that he might get a good round price for his chickens—quien sabe?—and perhaps if they could hav prayed they would hav supplicated to be let loose after long hours of torture.

As we passed out, a haggard woman sitting behind a long table covered with folded papers outside the door stopped us with a vehement gesture and besought us, as we valued riches, to buy one of the thousand lottery tickets upon the table, for this was the last chance, and the ticket would draw the magnificent prize to-morrow. Would we fling away such a splendid opportunity? We would; and we turned around to look at the curious Aztec calendar stone that leaned against the wall.

A Plucky Woman.

From the Boston Commonwealth.

We found a genuin smacking of heroism in the recent refusal of Miss Mueller (or Miller), in London, to pay taxes on the property she held. The law, as we all know, is very ready to read to women responsibilities that should only exist with certain rights that are universally denied her. If women commonly revolted against this injustice the effect would be good, prompt, and final. Miss Mueller, we understand, is in no sense different from other women who hold property except in the fact of being rather more than ordinarily interested in the movement for woman suffrage and in being pluckily determined to assert that interest practically. In due course of law she was assessed, as are other women, by the state. But here the parallel breaks off rather abruptly. For, instead of timidly and unquestioningly paying her taxes after the manner of the generality of the sex, she refused to acknowledge the justice of the tax so long as she was denied suffrage. As the law is materially stronger than an isolated person, the officers in fair time arrived and destrained a certain portion of the recalcitrant's personal property. This is the usual course, which the victim can only ineffectually protest against. But it is well to note in conclusion that the woman who suffers in this case is not weakly stunned under the blow; she simply goes to work anew to make this "outrage" impossible for the future.

If all women would do as this one has done, the cause of woman suffrage would receive an unstemmed impetus. The protest is simply of kind with that announced by the American colonists when they led the way to revolution. The principle is one we are apt to forget, but it is unanswerable. We in America are readier to make it the basis of our claims for republicanism for men in Europe than to giv women the benefit of it at home. England is, in respect to women, no more an offender than the United States. Arguments used against woman suffrage are often so mean, and so unlike those we would urge if the rights of men were at stake, that they resolve male "superiority" into absolute dishonor. Is it square and manly to force theory into a fitness with irreconcilable substance? And yet we do it with the hasty and inexcusable negativs we put upon the female right to vote. It is not likely that anyone could explain fairly just why the English woman should be the victim, as she is now, of an unjust national spirit. It is, of course, said that the taxes should hav been paid first, and the protest then made, but the effect, as is evident, is greater as chosen by Miss Mueller. The colonists never would hav won their cause on such a mode of procedure. There is a fresh and conclusiv pluck in the act selected.

Stray Scraps.

AT Bates College commencement, Lewiston, Me., June 26th., Annie Maria Bracket read a thesis—"Modern Civilization Based on Christianity." Doubtless the girl-child treated the subject thoroughly, and we Liberals may now hold our peace, as the question is settled forever.

"ONE can do nothing without God," said Rev. Philip Brooks in his Baccalaureate sermon before the Harvard class '84. Then Guiteau was right; God helped him assassinate President Garfield; and without God Judas Iscariot could not hav betrayed Jesus Christ.

CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER in his Phi Beta Kappa oration, Dartmouth College, June 25th, referred to the "mind cure" craze in Boston as "evidence of singular credulity and inclination to delusion." Did he forget that himself and every Christian are worse deluded in a credulous scare about a young Judean tramp 1800 years ago curing somewhat after the same fashion; yea, even to the raising of the dead (?), the healer himself being a sample proof of resurrection?

SAID Mrs. Livermore at the late Boston anniversaries: "It is woman's especial duty to advance the work of churches." If this is true, will woman vote God in the Constitution or out of the Constitution? The American party (God-in-the-Constitution), in their platform at Chicago last month, resolved: "We hold to and will vote for woman suffrage." Yea, because they realize the value of woman's vote, a la Mrs. Livermore; while the two large, popular parties scorn her aid as an interference.

IN his Baccalaureate sermon, June 29th., President Seelye of Amherst College said in reference to the dynamite scare and threats: "You cannot put down social disturbances by social science. When men hav bound themselvs in the chains of a false doctrin, you cannot liberate them by proving the doctrin to be false. The purpose which has chosen the falsehood prevents one from seeing that it is false." Oh, how true is this of Christianity; Would that Professor Seelye could see that he is picturing himself in his mistaken description of heretical scientists. Social science no more failed to put down those six Amherst seniors who were to hav graduated the next day, but were expelled because they "roused the whole neighborhood early Sunday morning by riotous behavior," than did the harmonious religion of the prince of peace in which the faculty had instructed these drunken Amherst senior rowdies, the majority of whom probably were the sons of doctors of divinity: "A party of Amherst seniors roused the whole neighborhood of that part of Amherst village known as 'East street,' early Sunday morning by riotous behavior. They broke the door of the East street Congregational church, pounded upon the doors of private residences, and broke several windows. A large party of citizens assembled, and with the aid of constables captured the whole party but one. Six seniors were bound over by Judge Thomas on a charge of drunkenness and riotous behavior, and their case comes up on Wednesday at the very hour that they would hav graduated. Under the college rules the offenders are no longer members of the institution. The names of the men arrested are G. W. Wadsworth, John H. Noble, E. H. Sawyer, C. W. Eustis, A. W. Whitcomb, and S. E. Appleton."

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church." etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

ANOTHER NEW BOOK!

New! Eloquent! Elegant! Splendid!

JUST PUBLISHED.

PROSE POEMS

And Selections,

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks, and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced our claims are correct in every particular and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lad who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Gems of Thought.

IT does not follow, then, because we cannot believe that of which there is no evidence, that we are immoral. A credulous person may be very defectiv in morals, while an incredulous person may hav the best moral character. Morality is to be measured by actions, not by opinions.—D. M. Bennett.

THE common feeling, no doubt, is, that as all supernatural power is the special gift of God, he would not hav bestowed it upon any but the good, nor for any purpose but that of conferring blessings and spreading truth. But this inference is wholly at variance with the analogies of the divine economy. All power is the gift of God—the power of intellect, the power of rank, the power of wealth, as well as the power of working physical marvels—yet, are these given to the good alone, or chiefly? Are these bestowed on those who employ them exclusivly, or mainly, in the service of mercy and truth? Would not the reverse of this statement be nearer to the fact?—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

THE same Cicero, who affected, in his own family, to appear a devout religionist, makes no scruple, in a public court of judicature, of treating the doctrins of a future state as a ridiculous fable, to which nobody could giv any attention.—Hume's Essays.

NATURE now beckons us; the advancing season warns us to leave the confined atmosphere of the city and seek those pleasant fields where we shall draw our inspiration from the fountain head. Nature offers you her tent. Nature will giv you her exhortations. Nature will cheer and inspire you with her undying prophecy. Never does it seem to me hav the flowers been so beautiful, or their fragrance so intoxicating. Never does it seem to me has the earth decked herself with such wonderful verdure as in this "merrie month of May." Everything blossoms anew and an exuberant life is visible in the ground. Behold, then, our temple is prepared for us. The giants of the forest make its pillars; the azure vault its dome; the purling streams murmur therein their benediction; the whispering winds waft the songs of countless choristers through its leafy aisles; and from afar the sounding bell peals, forever and forever, its solemn anthem to the infinit.—Radical Pulpit. Prof. Adler.

THE professions to which life invites the young are of very various kinds; and the question of choice among them, as it is very important, is sometimes also very trying and difficult. Rightly viewed, it ought to be a question simply of capacity. What am I fit for? But it is more easy in many cases to ask this question than to answer it. It will certainly, however, facilitate an answer, to disembarass the mind of prejudice. The field of choice is in this manner left comparativly open. Work as such, if it be honest work, is esteemed, not for the adventitious associations that may surround it, but because it offers an appropriate exercise for such powers as we possess, and a means of self-support and independence.—How to Succeed in Life, by Principal Tulloch.

THE society which founded the divinity [illegible] of Hartford University—one of the most Liberal in America—prescribes that free encouragement be given to the serious, impartial, and unbiased investigation of—what? Why, the prior, impartial, and unbiased investigation of Christian truth! So you see truth has a label! A thing is not true when it is simply true—it must be Christian truth! You hav heard of Christian charity and Christian gentility, and now we hear of Christian truth.—Felix Adler, Radical Pulpit.

IT is worse than useless to deplore the inevitable. —Shelley.

OF the Levites it is solemnly declared in Deuteronomy that they hav "no part nor inheritance with Israel," and that "the Lord is their inheritance." But "the Lord" is soon seen to be a very substantial inheritance, indeed. From those that offer an ox or a sheep the priests are to receive "the shoulders, the two cheeks, and the maw;" while the first fruits of corn, wine, and oil, and the first fruits of the sheep's fleeces are to be given to them (Deut. xviii, 1-5). Moreover, giving to the priest is declared to be the same thing as giving to the Lord (Num. v, 8). A similar notion, always fostered by ecclesiastical influence, has led to the vast endowments bestowed by pious monarchs and wealthy individuals upon the Christian clergy.—Viscount Amberley.

THE religion of the Africans, whether Pagan or Moslem, is suited to their intellects, and is, therefore, a true religion; and the same may be said of Christianity among uneducated people. But Christianity is not in accordance with the cultivated mind; it can only be accepted, or rather retained, by suppressing doubts and by denouncing inquiry as sinful. It is, therefore, a superstition, and ought to be destroyed. With respect to the services which it once rendered to civilization, I cheerfully acknowledge them, but the same argument might once hav been advanced in favor of the Oracle at Delphi, without which there would hav been no Greek culture, and, therefore, no Christianity. The question now is, not whether Christianity assisted the civilization of our ancestors, but whether it is now assisting our own civilization. I am firmly persuaded that whatever is injurious to the intellect is also injurious to moral life; and on this conviction I base my conduct with respect to Christianity.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

N. Y. State Freethinkers' Association.

THE SEVENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION;

Where Held—The Speakers Engaged—The Hotels, Railroads, etc.

THE NEW YORK STATE FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION, in accordance with its established custom, has invited the Freethinkers of all the other states, and also of Canada, to meet them in annual Convention, at Cassadaga Lake, N. Y., on the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th days of September next.

THE SPEAKERS.

The following well-known speakers hav been engaged to address the Convention: Thaddeus B. Wakeman, of New York; Miss Helen H. Gardner, of St. Louis; Courtlandt Palmer, of New York; Charles Watts, of London, England: Allen Pringle, of Selby, Canada; Col. John R. Kelso, of Modesto, Cal.; George Chainey, of Boston; J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw City, Mich.; Mrs. Dr. Juliet H. Severance, of Milwaukee; Stephen Pearl Andrews, of New York; Dr. John Stoltz, of Chicago; William S. Bell, of Boston; Judge R. S. McCormick, of Franklin, Pa.; John E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kansas; Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y.; M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Iowa; Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa.; Charles B. Reynolds, of Rochester, N. Y.; Samuel P. Putnam, of New York; Dr. William F. McCormick, of Franklin, Pa.; and Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., orthodox, of Philadelphia, Pa. And the following hav also been invited, the most of whom are expected to be present: Hon. Elizur Wright, of Boston; F. E. Abbot, Cambridge, Mass.; Horace Seaver, Boston; Luther Colby, Boston; Judge Arnold Krekle and Mrs. Judge Krekle, of Kansas City, Mo.; James Parton, of Newburyport, Mass.; Judge Carter, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; and B. F. Underwood, editor of the Index, Boston, Mass. It is possible that Col. Ingersoll will be present and address the Convention.

THE SINGING.

Professor A. D. Lane, of Olean, N. Y., one of the most popular professional singers in the state, accompanied by as good a quartet of voices as can be found in Western New York, has been engaged to provide the musical entertainment for the occasion. Professor H. H. Hall, who sang for the Rochester Convention, has also been engaged.

THE PLACE OF MEETING.

The location where the Convention is to meet is one of the most pleasant and picturesque in the state. It is described as follows in a circular issued by the Association: "The Cassadaga Lake Camp-meeting Grounds are eight miles from Lake Erie, and seven hundred feet above it; situated midway between New York and Chicago, one and a half hours by rail from Buffalo, five from Cleveland, nine from Pittsburgh, fourteen hours from Cincinnati, sixteen from Philadelphia, eighteen hours from New York, twenty hours from Boston and Washington, and twenty-one from Chicago. It lies on the shore of a beautiful chain of lakes, three in number, and at an elevation of nearly fourteen hundred feet above the level of the sea." The Association last year erected on the grounds an amphitheater, with a seating capacity of twenty-five hundred people, with the seats in a semi-circle, which givs every one present an opportunity to hear all that is said from the speaker's platform.

ROUTES OF TRAVEL AND RAILROAD RATES.

Eastern and western passengers over the Nickel Plate, Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad, and eastern passengers over the New York, Lake Erie & Western (formerly Erie) railroad, change cars at Dunkirk, N. Y., and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to the "Cassadaga Camp-meeting Grounds."

Eastern and western passengers over the New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio railroad (formerly Atlantic & Great Western), and eastern passengers over the Buffalo & Jamestown railroad, change cars at the Atlantic & Great Western Crossing, and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to Lily Dale Station.

To be more definit, persons coming to the Convention from most of the cities and large towns in the United States will find it the cheaper to purchase excursion tickets to Chautauqua Lake. These can be obtained very cheap; and then leave the cars at the crossing of the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad near Jamestown, and then take the last mentioned road to Lily Dale Station, near the camping grounds. Persons coming from any station on the New York, Lake Erie & Western railroad, or any of its branches west of Binghampton, will pay full fare to Dunkirk, and then be returned at one-third fare home. The Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad will sell excursion tickets at two cents a mile from any station on that road.

THE HOTEL RATES.

The following prices hav been established at the hotels for board: $1.50 per day, for one day and less than three days; and over, $1 per day. Table board: breakfast, 40 cents; dinner, 50 cents; supper, 30 cents. Lodgings, 25 to 30 cents. The hotel accommodations are sufficient to entertain all who may attend.

H. L. GREEN,
Salamanca, N. Y. Secretary New York State Freethinkers' Association.

P. S.—I am glad to announce that the Truth Seeker Company will hav an agent on the grounds with a large assortment of Freethought publications for sale. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER will, as heretofore, make full reports of the proceedings. Other reports of the Convention will be published in the New York Herald, the Buffalo Courier, and other secular papers. H. L. G.

On Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 8th and 9th, the

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE

WILL HOLD ITS

EIGHTH ANNUAL CONGRESS

At the same place.

In his call for the Congress the President of the League invites "all citizens of the United States, whether they hav acted with this League or not, who believe in a secular republic, separation of church and state; the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all, and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press as the basis of universal suffrage."

All Charter and Life Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Each Auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates—its president, secretary, and three other members—to the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats in the Congress, and to votes by the permission of the Congress.

Odds and Ends.

IF you need fresh air, don't go to the sea-shore; it's salty there.

SING the early melon and cucumber, "We're cramping to-night in the old cramp ground."

"I am a man of enter pries," remarked the burglar as he inserted his jimmy into the safe-lock.

A MONTANA girl has been kidnapped by a bear. She probably got one hug from the bear and followed it off.

"THE pootiest woman of all Boston," said Micky Muldoon on his return from the Hub to his home in Kensington, "livs in Philadelphia."

THE Rev. Joseph Cook calls himself a pandenominationalist. What a great many other people call him doesn't make such a wholesale inroad into the alphabet.—Norristown Herald.

"WHAT is this?" exclaimed a Burlington lady, as she opened a letter and something like a crumpled postage-stamp fell out "Oh, yes; I remember now. It's that Boston bathing suit I ordered for Nellie."

"JUST to think," said a Vassar graduate, "here's an account of a train being thrown from the tra ck by a misplaced switch. How utterly careless some women are about leaving their hair around!" And she went on reading and eating caramels.

A COMPANION piece to the song, "Where Is My Boy To-night?" has been issued, entitled, "My Boy, Where Is Your Father To-night?" This is wrong, very wrong. Boys should not go to inquiring too much where the fathers are. Fathers are liable to be all right if the boys are.

"ARE you a Theosophist?" inquired a St. Louis lady of a brilliant Bostonienne, who was visiting her. "A what?" ejaculated the young lady from the Hub. "Why, a Theosophist." "Oh, dear, no; we hav no such thing in Boston. The Sullivan fist, you know, is the only popular one in Boston now."

A TRAMP stopped at a house on Main street the other day and asked for something to eat. "Which do you like best?" asked the hired girl—"steak or chop?" The tramp meditated a minute and then replied, "Chop." "Step right this way," said the hired girl; "here's the ax and there's the woodpile."

"YES, they are excellent boots," said the shoedealer to the young lady purchaser, "they will wear like iron." "Do you think the buttons are sewed on securely?" she asked. "They are: the boots are supplied with the old maid's wedding button, a new invention." "Why is it called the 'old maid's wedding' button?" "Because it never comes off."

Now the small boy, loudly wailing,
Misses both his pants and coat;
While he's in the river trailing
They were eaten by the goat.
Now the fool who goes a-sailing
Just to rock the cranky boat,
Will gain strength while they are bailing
Out the water from his throat.

A GERMAN gentleman of esthetic proclivities recently sat in a London restaurant where Oscar Wilde occupied a table. Oscar called for a bunch of violets, stuck his nose into them, inhaled their perfume, and remarking, "I hav dined," paid his bill and passed out. The German esthete reflected for a moment and then ordered a cake of Limburger cheese. After inhaling the perfume he exclaimed, "I alzo haf mittag gehaben," and followed Wilde.

NOVEMBER POETRY.

O beautiful ship, with your booms all set,
And the gang-plank heaved ashore,
Pray, gather the boys in out of the wet—
Oh, gather them in to-day,
Ere you sail to the creek away.
With your decks knee-deep with gore—
The boys all covered with dust and sweat
And bleeding at every pore.

O beautiful creek with the saline name,
Be good to the ship, we pray—
Be kind to the gang who hav lost the game
And, wearied of worldly charms,
Forsake political arms
And sail in the ship away;
Oh, dull their ears to the sound of fame,
With the dash of thy salty spray.

"Oh, I do so much like this book," said a lady, putting aside, with a weariness that could not be concealed, a work from the pen of a realistic novelist. "Everything is so natural. Why, it speaks of the heroin stopping on the stairway and tying her shoe." "Very thrilling," replied her husband. "Oh, no, dear, it is not thrilling, but it is so real. That's what I call fine art." "It was no doubt necessary for the young lady to stop and tie her shoe, but I don't know that it was art. Anyone, of even slight digital education, can tie a shoe." "Oh, you don't understand. The mere act of tying a shoe implies no art, but the fact that the novelist should hav spoken of anything so natural, is art." "Then, in your opinion, high art must be easily attained. I am thinking of writing a piece of high art. I feel the inspiration. Giv me pen and paper." Turning to a table, he busied himself with writing, and then, calling his wife, said: "Here is a chapter from my forthcoming book: 'A calf stood in the lot. A horse-fly buzzed among the leaves of a peach-tree. A gray-headed man, with a gouty limb, blew his nose and let down the back window. The calf switched his tail. A hawk flew over and a chicken squawked. The calf held up his head and said, 'Bah.' A dog jumped over the fence and cautiously approached the calf. The calf snorted and looked intently at the dog. The calf said, 'Bah,' and the dog tucked his tail and jumped over the fence. Now, my dear, is not this realistic?" "It's disgusting." "It is perfectly natural. Take, for instance, the old man blowing his nose. How lifelike it is!—quite as much so as the picture of the young lady who tied her shoe. I make you tired, eh? I see that you do not like realism."—Arkansaw Traveler.

A PITTSBURGH man has gone to an insane asylum because both of his babies were girls. He wanted a boy.

A STATIONER in Glasgow has been forced by a ring of ministers to discontinue the sale of Ingersoll's lectures. They terrorised him eventually through his landlord, and when the alternativ was "cease selling Ingersoll or starve, with your wife and children," he had practically no choice. The same Glasgow ministers, remarks the Freethinker, are often loud in their praises of Christianity as a religion of tolerance.

FOR nine seasons a little sparrow with a deformed foot returned with each summer to the window of a Boston woman and tapped at the pane. She always received him kindly, and finally fell into the habit of making him a special cake. This summer on his first call he alighted on her hand, showing plainly that he was ill. She carried him out into the fresh air, but he would not fly, and died while she still held him.

EXPERIMENTS by Professor Maggiorani, of Rome, to ascertain the influence of the magnet upon the animal organization gave results which are likely to modify the uses of magneto-electricity. Eggs placed in the current were delayed in development, were smaller than the average size, and some of them appeared without the yolk. The chickens were precocious (a sign of organic inferiority), were born lame or rickety, and showed remarkable disturbances at the nervous centers.

FOUR million dollars is now fixed upon as the sum which China must pay for having killed or wounded forty or fifty French soldiers at Lang-son. This is only one twenty-fifth part of the amount originally suggested as a suitable indemnity for the offense, yet it makes the violation of the Tientsin treaty of May 11th an expensiv luxury. When, however, the probable results of even a ten days' war are considered, it is evident that China will show immense capacity for money-saving by quietly paying her fine of four millions.

A BAND of the pope's enemies took food and drink outside the walls of Rome on a Sunday and then entered town through the Angelic Gate, within a stone's throw of the Vatican. On seeing the policemen and soldiers guarding the Vatican entrance, the band of fire-eaters shouted: "Spies! assassins! Death—away with them!" and set to work caning them and stripping off their cockades and epaulets, but were finally arrested and imprisoned. Such rows are frequent in the neighborhood of the Vatican, and Leo XIII. would certainly be attacked by the roughs if he entered the streets.

A METHODIST preacher, one Caruther, in Holt Co., Mo., has disgusted the people of the county by his ill treatment of his sister. She married a gentleman of high respectability and good habits, but against her reverend brother's will, she being several years above the legal age. The reverend man forbid her his house, never again spoke to her, and persistently slandered her. To cap the climax of his spite, when his sister died he persisted in his course, would not speak to the husband at the funeral, and kept up his abuse at the very grave. So much for the mild influence of religion.

"YES, sir," said an enthusiastic citizen of a new Western town, "we've got a right smart town, stranger. Why," he continued, impressivly, "it's only six months old yet and it's got two hotels, forty-eight beer saloons, twenty-seven gamblin' places, four drug stores, to say nuthin' of grocery and clothin' stores, and the best half-mile track west of the Missouri." "Any churches?" asked the stranger. "Any what?" "Churches." "You mean them buildin's with a long pint sticking up in the air?" "Yes." "No, we hain't got any of them. Thar was some talk about buildin' one, but we finally allowed it would look too dudish."

To three Milwaukee lawyers who put in bills amounting to $25,000 for services in settling an estate worth $32,000, Judge Thomas Drummond said: "Gentlemen, you consider yourselvs good lawyers. How much more are your services worth to your clients than mine to the people? You hav charged $25,000 for sixty days' service. Could you not be content, each of you, to take my pro rata for the same time? These charges are infamous. They are such as men who are scoundrels and thieves at heart would make. This charge of $15,000 is cut down to $1,500, those of $5,000 each to $500. Repeat such a piece of rapine in this court and I will disbar every one of you."

THE Rev. Samuel McChesney, once a Methodist presiding elder, is pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church at West Amsterdam, and of Tribe's Hill, N. Y. His salary is fixed at $300 per year from each church. He says he has received only $15 since February, and that his family hav lived on charity most of the time, and ofttimes hav not had enough to eat. This week Willis Mosher, of Amsterdam, who held a mortgage on McChesney's horse, foreclosed the mortgage, and the pastor will hav to walk from one church to the other on Sunday, a distance of three miles. That's nothing. Christ's salary was less than $15, and the only horse he had was a donkey—and that wasn't his.

A DISPUTE has arisen between the Roman Catholic and the Greek orthodox clergy at Jerusalem under circumstances which cannot but provoke a smile from ordinary rational beings. The facts of the case are these: The stone of the floor of the chapel of the Virgin in the holy sepulcher is so worn or otherwise damaged as to require its removal and replacement by a new stone. The duty of carrying out this work is claimed both by the Catholic and the Greek clergy, and feeling ran so high among these religious fanatics that the presence of Turkish troops alone prevented the rival parties from deciding the important question by a recourse to blows. The matter, finally, has been referred to the porte.

THE abolition of public or official prayers by the French legislature has led to much very heated discussion. It authors maintain that it means simply that the state has no religion and has nothing to do with religion. But some of the bishops declare that it is a formal repudiation of God, a denial of his existence by the state. M. Paul de Cassagnac, who says he is a pious man, sides with the unbelievers or "laicizers," as they prefer to be called, but for a reason peculiar to himself, viz., that he does not pray for the republic lest his prayers should be answered, and a form of government which he hates should profit by them. This, says the Evening Post, is probably the oddest expression of belief in the efficacy of prayer yet produced.

AT a hallelujah prayer-meeting in Norwich one night last week, according to the bulletin of that city, many of the well-dressed women became so excited at the declaration of one of the leaders that plumes and finery are a barrier to the full enjoyment of sanctification that they pulled off their bonnets, tore from them the ostrich plumes, flowers, and ruches, and threw them crumpled upon the floor until there was a pile sufficient to fill a half-bushel basket. The prayer meeting was kept up in full force all night and long after sunrise next morning. Religion and rum, observes the Winsted Press, seem to hav a similar effect on many people, and whether a woman fuddled with religion isn't a bigger nuisance than a man fuddled with brandy is a very nicely balanced question.

ONE C. W. Thomas, a very pretentious, pious person of Oregon, Mo., a lawyer withal, having been long suspected of various larcenies of a petty nature, was arrested last June under three warrants, for stealing postage stamps, stamped envelopes, tobacco, books, morphine, etc., pleaded guilty of one charge to get away from the sheriff, turned off to Kirksville to deliver an address to the students there, and then, at the state convention of teachers at Sweet Springs, read an address, in which he complained that there is not enough religion taught in the schools. He declared that some great special efforts should be made to inculcate religion, to prevent so much crime. He then returned home, and by the leniency of his prosecutors was allowed to plead lunacy, no resistance being made for his family's sake.

THE peculiar sect known as the "Shaking Quakers" deserve credit for many of the useful inventions of the present. More than half a century ago they first originated the drying of sweet corn for food, and they first raised, papered, and vended garden seeds in the present styles. From their first methods of preparing medicinal roots and herbs for market sprung the immense patent medicin trade. They began the broom-corn business. The first buzz-saw was made by the Shakers at New Lebanon. This is now in the Albany Geological Hall. The Shakers invented metallic pens, first made of brass and silver. All distilled liquors were abandoned as a beverage by the Shakers sixty years ago, and during the past forty years no fermented liquor of any sort has been used, except as a medicin. Pork and tobacco are also numbered among the "forbidden articles."

THE Daily Leader, Eau Claire, Wis., pays its compliments to Comstock in this vigorous style: "The New York society, engineered by a creature one of whose aliases is Anthony Comstock, has published its usual yearly pack of lies. The society, engineered by the creature one of whose aliases is Anthony Comstock, claims to hav seized during the year nine hundred pounds of obscene books, eleven hundred ditto photographs, and one hundred and thirty-seven negativs for taking the same, and a hundred and sixty-five thousand nine hundred pamphlets, circulars, cards, etc., of like description. The old story about publishers advertising for the names of children all over the country is repeated with scarcely the variation of a lie. It has for many years been known to all who hav given the subject any attention that the society engineered by the creature one of whose aliases is Anthony Comstock exists for the purpose of blackmailing newsdealers and booksellers and obtaining money under false pretenses from the few who are still foolish enough to believe such tales as the above."

I MUST nail to the pillory of European opinion a characteristic example of the position of women in Siberia. It happened to Olga Lioubatovitch, one of heroins of the "trial of the fifty" at Moscow, where the Socialist propagandists gained to so remarkable an extent the sympathy of the public. On the 30th of August, 1883, on passing Krasnoiarsk on the way to her destination in Eastern Siberia, she was called before the "ispravnik" (chief of the police of an arrondissement), who told her she must exchange her own clothes for a convict dress. But as she was condemned to transportation by administrativ order, and not to hard labor, she had a right to wear her own clothes. This she tried to oxplain to the ispravnik. At her first words, however, he became furious, and repeated that she must not only change her dress, but do it then in the bureau before everybody. To this unheard-of intimation Olga Lioubatovitsch answered by a categorical refusal. Then at a sign from the police officer his subordinates seized hold of the prisoner in order to undress her by force. A barbarous struggle ensued. This crowd of men began to beat this woman, to pull her hair, and tear off her clothes. So long as she kept her feet she defended herself as best she could, but the chief of police by a violent kick felled her to the earth. This is how she herself describes this infamy: "I fell into a kind of stupor. I remember confusedly how the heavy boot of the ispravnik struck my chest. Some one was pulling my hair, another was striking my face with his fist; the rest were tearing off my clothes, and at last, naked, crucified on the door, in the presence of a crowd of men, I felt all the shame and horror of a woman violated. Frightened of their own deed, the cowards fled, and when I recovered consciousness I saw around me only my companions, pale as death, while Fanny Moriness was writhing in hysterical convulsions."—"Stepniak" in "To-day."

News of the Week.

A LARGE part of the town of Emporium, Pa., has been destroyed by fire.

FRANCE and China, it is reported, will refer their difficulties to the United States for arbitration.

THE rear portion of the United States Hotel at Washington fell in on August 3d, burying seven employees, of whom some are fatally injured.

MISS LILLIE DEVEREAUX BLAKE and other female suffragists dissent from Miss Anthony's. Blaine manifesto, and are enthusiastic for Cleveland.

GREAT excitement prevails among the Shakers over the elopement of a prominent female member, Miss Mary Americus with a neighboring farmer.

AN organization has been formed at Washington proposing to import foreign laborers of all grades under contract at low wages to supply the demand for cheap labor throughout the country.

LARGE numbers of Irishmen attended a convention held in Chickering Hall, this city, under the auspices of the Irish-American Independents, and, declaring their independence of the Democratic party, pledged thousands of votes to Blaine.

THE revision of the Old Testament, which it was hoped would be out this year, will probably not make its appearance before early in 1885. Nothing is positivly known of any changes made in the old version, the revisers on both sides of the Atlantic having preserved strict secrecy.

CAPTAIN SHELTON and his two young daughters, aged respectivly 19 and 21, while traveling through Texas in a carriage for pleasure, at a halt on July 30th went bathing, when the girls, getting out of their depth, were drowned, the father being compelled to shake them off to save himself.

THE Prohibition party of the county of New York hav held a convention and passed the following resolution: "We hereby mutually pledge ourselvs to each other, that we will entirely separate ourselvs from the Republican and Democratic parties, and from all other political parties not opposed to the liquor crime."

MORE investigation is being made into the corruptness of the police and detectiv forces of this city, the cause of the movement being, as is usual, the protests of the press—the World, in particular, having partially exposed the scheme of the protection of influential and moneyed criminals by the executiv authorities and by the courts. Could these infamous practices be fully exposed, there would be a sensation in this city exceeding even that following the exposure of the Tweed ring rascalities. At the door of the notorious opium joint, 13 Pell St., and the others in the vicinity, policemen stood last Sunday nodding cordially to the visitors. Several complaints were made during the week by citizens who had been causelessly clubbed in various parts of the city by members of our "finest."

AMONG the crimes of the week brutal assaults upon women seem to foot up the largest number, some eight or ten, committed mostly by tramps, being reported from different states. Three murders are reported—one from Falls Village, Conn., where Andrew Gorman was shot by Edward Halstead, the trouble being over women; and another at Fayette Court House, Ala., where, in a drunken quarrel, Simpson Lindsey cut Villa Finch's throat from ear to ear, killing him instantly; while another drink-crazed man, in Maysville, Ky., after running amuck through the town, shot an old and inoffensiv colored man, as he sat in his own doorway. Two suicides were committed. Edward C. Steers, the son of one of the wealthiest planters of Louisiana, shot himself at Richfield Springs, N. Y., from unrequited love; and at Charlotte, N. Y., Frederic Hutter, a well-to-do citizen, poisoned himself, the the cause being an unhappy marriage relation

A Realistic Meditation.

It is Sunday. Relieved a few precious hours from the burdens of the store, I read once more the late letters of your estimable correspondents, Macdonald, Heddon, and Perry, in their able defense of immortality. I am anxious—determined—to be convinced of this happy fate in store for us, but in spite of my earnest endeavors, in spite of my longings, in spite of greatest flights of fancy, it is utterly inconceivable to me how a person can liv when he is—dead. I no sooner gather the ethereal elements in my imagination and attempt to shape them into a "spirit," when the fairy bubble vanishes in the air and I am forced to the conclusion that if such beings exist and hav their abode somewhere within the realms of space, it is beyond all human conception, and a thing and locality and condition purely miraculous and supernatural. We know of nothing else like or similar to it in nature; no science can demonstrate it or locate it. It becomes a matter of blind faith or speculation, which the masses may embrace with ardent joy, but which the true philosopher must regard as a popular phantasm. While all other organisms coming in contact with man may be seen, understood, dissected, and analyzed, the spirit form alone, while often visible and tangible to the most ignorant, can never be seen, heard, or felt, much less be analyzed and resolved into its component parts, by the wisest of men. While all other forms which occupy space may be reduced to their constituent elements, spirits alone hav no elements or parts—are composed of nothing! While all other bodies hav weight, a spirit, or ten thousand of them, would not turn a scale the width of a hair. While the human form is composed of bones and sinew, tissue and flesh which giv it size and shape, the spirit form, said to be identical in outline and form, yet is composed of nothing. While the functions of the human body are performed by organs and brain and nervous system—in all, the most subtle and complex organism ever evolved—the identical functions are said to be produced by spirits without these organs. They see without eyes, hear without ears, speak without organs of articulation, think without a brain, and move about without either legs or wings. Fingers they hav not, but they can always hold a pencil to write in locked slates; their limbs are missing, but they can clasp their loved ones firmly in their arms. Flux and influx of air take place without lungs, digestion without a stomach, circulation without blood. The hair of the head is prolific, yet the original lies well preserved within the grave. And this hair especially is remarkable; it will grow and grow a few years until it has assumed a graceful length and then, behold the miracle—it will grow no more, forever no more. And the nails on their toes and fingers, and the hair on a gentleman-spirit's head and face, are subject to the same law of growth for a very few years, and then will remain in statu quo forever. And teeth are formed, but not of enamel, and never decay; and infants and children here grow into beautiful men and women spirits, and then also stop and remain eternally the same. The aged here are restored to youth, the blind will see, the lame walk, and, last, but not least, all hav the appearance, and size, and form, and sex, of living human beings, without a particle of the matter which originally made the human being.

And the spirit world—pray, where is it? Alas! our scientists, with the aid of our strongest telescopes, hav failed to discover those mystic shores. As the strength of the mighty disks has been indefinitly increased, and the explorers of the heavens hav penetrated the realms of space into depths inconceivable, yet all is but a repetition of our own grand system, and nowhere a spirit world. All that is claimed for this is idle speculation, theory, the cunning devices of avaricious priests and cranky visionaries, or the conflicting testimony of hundreds of deceived or deceiving mediums.

If the spirit world is a reality, it, like the spirits which are supposed to congregate there, is absolutely unlike all natural worlds or localities, and also entirely miraculous and supernatural. And the modes of communication or travel to and from this the spirit world are also unlike any other mode of locomotion known to us, and, like the ascension of Elijah and Christ, again purely a miraculous process. All is mystic, strange, incomprehensible, unknowable.

It is a well-known fact that no body, or at least no delicate organism, as a spirit form necessarily must be (if spirits exist at all), can, by any modus operandi known to us, rise beyond this world's atmosphere without being immediately doomed to destruction. No two bodies can occupy the same space at the same time, and while it is easily conceivable how light may penetrate a pane of glass, or electricity an iron or stone wall (this process being like flour falling through a sieve), yet the spirit body—being organic if a reality, and occupying space 2x6 feet—must positivly abandon the space it occupies, before any other body, especially a planet sweeping through space at the rate of many thousands of miles an hour, can take possession. For instance, it is utterly inconceivable how the spirit of a person, or a greater spirit, "God," can, at any time, come within range of a planet while sweeping through its orbit and not be instantaneously annihilated.

Again, while it is readily conceivable to all how the breath (to use a vulgar phrase) should leave a man, or how light and electricity—being simply an aggregation of inorganic matter or atoms—may penetrate his chamber walls or doors (all matter being porous), it is absolutely inconceivable, I insist, how an organic body or spirit, in the shape and size of a man, can first escape from the body, leaving it entire and perfect, and then make its escape through the solid walls or closed doors and windows without either leaving an opening in wall, door, or window, corresponding in size to its diameter, or else resolving itself first into original particles and escaping like all inorganic matter through the pores of the material through which it passes, and thus, of course, meeting with instantaneous disintegration and death.

Let us suppose the case of a dying girl. The spirit has left the body and has miraculously emerged into the cold and bleak atmosphere of a winter's day. A fierce tempest rages, and the piercing wind and snow sweeps everything before it. What becomes of our frail spirit, so tender and fair? Even a robe, as yet, is not forthcoming, and nude and helpless it must proceed on its weird and fearful journey to the spirit world. Up it soars, higher and higher, until it reaches the regions of perpetual snow. But here is no resting-place, and on it goes beyond the clouds, where breathing to a human being becomes impossible. But still the frail traveler soars up and up until, behold! it finds itself upon the brink of our atmosphere, revolving through space at the rate of a thousand miles an hour. But it escapes from its perilous voyage and soon finds itself beyond in space, the world sweeping on in its mad career! On again it soars, on, and on, until finally, safe and sound, it reaches that "beautiful shore." Here it is speedily robed in a spotless robe of white (but which never needs washing), and then finds itself among a group of friends and relativs, long dead on earth, but now glad to welcome our young friend to the spirit world.

If this is not a fair description of the journey all spirits are supposed to make, will some one please describe it more consistent with supposed facts. It cannot be done. All is miracle; all strange, all unnatural, from beginning to end; and, as for me, I would rather be excused from ever making that trip.

And the "evergreen shore"—how about that? There hav been nearly as many descriptions of it as there hav been mediums, and no two alike! Some place the spirits here, there, and everywhere; some on one planet, some on others. Some hav them hovering around us all the time, their sole occupation being to guard Spiritualists not yet dead. Some say there are regular changes of the seasons, and some insist on an eternal spring-time, and flowers which never cease to bloom. Some say the lower animals, even the faithful horse or dog, do not follow us, while others insist that all animals, including vermin, snakes, and oysters, may be found in the sweet bye-and-bye! All, however, are inclined to concede the "eternal spring-time" and immortality to birds in "heaven," as falling leaves, and a winter's storm, and no winged songsters, would hardly conform to their ideas of eternal bliss.

But all Christians and spiritists alike, being naturally modest, insist that: 1. Spirits must be clothed; 2. That spirits must partake of food; 3. That family relations and reunions will be possible; 4. That there must be mansions or other grand architecture in the sky, etc. Without all this, life, of course, would be intolerable during all eternity.

But alas! like all other ideas about spirit, when the above propositions are submitted to a ray of logic and reason we instantly discover their absurdity.

If spiritists from the first inception of the idea had insisted that spirits were made and returned to us in like condition, they would not hav placed such a formidable proof in the doubter's reach that the whole idea is a vain delusion. For surely old clothes are not immortal. And cotton cloth is only woven from cotton raised the usual way, and woolen trousers made only from the wool off of a real live worldly lamb. Yet when was a spirit ever seen without clothes? Are they not always pictured by Christians in flowing robes, and by our modern mediums always seen in the identical garments known to hav been worn by them while living, often stored away in chest or closet, or perhaps worn, at the very moment when worn by a spirit, also by a needy survivor? And yet, in spite of this fact, mediums invariably describe the clothes worn by the spirits they behold—which fact only proves that, being radically deceived about the clothes, and imagining they see when they don't see them, they are likewise deceived in regard to the spirit in the clothes, and imagin they see when they don't see it.

If spirits eat, they must hav organs to digest food—liver, stomach, etc.—and the process would be purely physical. But not being physical, the chemical process of digestion cannot possibly take place, and consequently spirits must liv during all eternity without food. But this again is contrary to the testimony, and contrary to natural history, as no organism can exist without food or nourishment for any length of time. A spirit masticating food, then, is impossible, but a spirit not masticating food is likewise impossible.

It is claimed that the wife shall join her husband, the father his child, etc. But these relations are also impossible without the physical. The happy family circle, now the highest condition of bliss attainable, must cease when the bodies lie under the sod. The propagation of children being, of course, impossible, the relation of husband and wife could, at most, continue only as friends. The difference in the ages of father and son, also, being but a few years comparativly, after a few or ten thousand years the parental relation also would entirely disappear. And in the case of the wife who died, and whose husband married a second, and a third, and a fourth wife, as is often the case, and vice versa, what condition of connubial bliss is in store for such an unfortunate one during all eternity?

And the notion generally conceded by spiritists, that heaven is a place of mansions is, if true, purely miraculous. If not miraculous, who is their builder and architect?

Clothes necessitate soil and a climate like ours to raise the cotton; planters to grow, gather, and ship it; also mills to manufacture it into cloth; and tailors to make it into garments. This necessitates mechanics to build the ships, and mills, and sewing-machines, and this necessitates furnaces, and fuel, and mines, and teams to haul the material, and many hands to perform the menial labor, in heaven, even, as upon the earth; and behold, if the innumerable hosts of spirits are clothed and dwell in mansions, the same life of drudgery now in store for a vast majority of mankind is awaiting them in heaven, and once there they must work, work forever, with no prospect of relief, or rest, or death!

It will be apparent now, if my crude way of expressing myself properly conveys my meaning, that no life is possible or conceivable, which, when properly viewed in all its phases, is not the same life over again which man is doomed to lead on earth, and that an eternal life without toil and care, without pain and misery, is but a happy dream, which never can be realized.

Divested of our physical bodies, as we shall be, and consequently forever denied the pleasure of the gratification of the desires of the physical nature, which now, though we may not realize it, are the only things making life endurable, forever denied sleep—the downy bed, the three meals a day, the embrace of an affectionate wife, the kiss and prattle of our little ones, luxuries like wines, fruits, desserts, candies, or cigars, the happy gatherings around the festiv board, family reunions, song, music, art, and oratory, the opera and drama—as all these will be impossible in heaven, as can easily be demonstrated—what then, I ask in the name of reason, is left to constitute an eternity of unalloyed bliss?

Let me sleep, forever sleep. As my condition, so to speak, during the eternity preceding my birth was not a cause of regret; as the condition of the unborn millions destined to liv hereafter, but now virtually dead or annihilated, is no cause of fear or dread, why should we mourn or fear to enter again that eternal sleep which knows no grief or sorrow?

But Christians say we will hav a harp, and spiritists insist there may be music and song "up there." But again a fearless logic inquires, Whence your harps, whence your pianos, whence your voices? Spiritual harps and spiritual catgut may be accepted by some as a consolation to their faith, but such childish notions must forever be barred in a philosophic discussion. They may be taken for granted, but can never be proven.

There is no such a thing as "spiritual substance." All is blind, unconscious force, which, physical conditions being favorable, may evolve the primary life-germ which in time, by due process of evolution, may produce man. All this is but a chain of purely physical causes and effects. But man can think, reason. This is a function of this creature, man. It is purely local, individual, began with him, and must end with him. But while mind, like life, must expire in each individual, it will be eternally reproduced in the future, as it ever has been in the past.

National Liberal League.

AN AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION, AND A NOMINATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The constitution of the National Liberal League makes no provision in case of absence or disability of the president.

Article 6 reads: "The officers of the National Liberal League shall be a president, six or more vice-presidents, etc." These "six or more" may be ornamental, but are quite too numerous to be useful. I would respectfully offer the following suggestion:

that the first clause of Article 6 of the constitution be amended by striking out the words, "six or more vice-presidents," and the words, "A vice-president, who shall perform all the duties of the president, in case of the absence or disability of that officer," be substituted.

And then, in harmony with the noble sentiment of the "Call," "the equality of all without distinction of creed, race, or sex," I would nominate for the position one whose high standing, tried worth, and great ability, insure the hearty and unanimous indorsement of Liberals of every shade of opinion—for vice-president of the National Liberal League, Mrs. H. S. Lake, of Milwaukee, Wis. C. B. Reynolds.

North Parma, N. Y., July 19, 1884.

The Heywood Trials, and the Recent Triumph of Freedom of the Press.

In my report of the convention here in my last communication, I promised to subsequently giv some account, in the nature of a partial review, of the great triumph of free speech and freedom of the press in the recent decision of Judge Pitman, quashing the indictment in this third and last raid upon Mr. Heywood on the charge of obscenity. I proceed now to fulfil that promis. District-Attorney Hopkins ordered Mr. Heywood to trial May 26th, before Robert C. Pitman, judge. Mr. Heywood had prepared a motion to quash, and expected to conduct his own defense, as he had done the year previous, in Boston, in the United States Court, Judge T. L. Nelson presiding; but, to his grateful surprise, H. L. Nelson, Esq., a practicing lawyer of fine repute, of Worcester, and a son of Judge Nelson, just mentioned, who also resides at Worcester, in this county, volunteered his services to present and argue a motion to the same effect. Here, then, were assembled Judge Pitman, a stanch free-trader, an old-line free-soiler, and temperance advocate, a man whose antecedents hav associated him more or less, for many years, with reformers, and whose rulings show him to hav a true sense of principles, and citizens' rights; Mr. Nelson, the zealous and enterprising young lawyer, now for the defense; W. S. B. Hopkins, the prosecuting attorney, son of the well-known Erastus Hopkins, of Northampton, and Vesta and Hermes, the Heywood children, whom, as usual, Mr. Heywood had dramatically brought in his train. Mr. Blackmer, the previous prosecuting attorney who had conducted the preliminary examination in a zealous and persecuting spirit, the Lord had now taken to himself; but the recollection of the hard blows Mr. Heywood had dealt him on that occasion still lingered in the court house. The citizens' petition, and the protest addressed to the prosecuting officer, which I had somewhat elaborately drawn, and to which I had procured the signatures of the citizens of Princeton, had also been circulated, and placed where they would do the most good, stirring up the interest of the public, so that the case was no longer the obscure affair, to be hurried through unobserved, which those who began the prosecution had hoped to make it.

The following is an abstract of the parts of Mr. Nelson's brief bearing on rights of opinion, commerce, and association:

"First, as to the importance of alleging the intent. The Mass. cases are, Commonwealth vs. Filburn, 119 Mass. 297; vs. Barrett, 108 Mass. 302; vs. Bean, 11 Cush. 414; vs. Clifford, 8 Cush. 215; Tully vs. Commonwealth, 4 Met. 357.

"In Commonwealth vs. McGarrigill, Superior Court (Suffolk), 1855, Abbott, chief justice, says, as to the necessity of alleging knowledge in an indictment under this statute: 'Generally, intent, knowledge, is of the very essence of crime, and there must be very strong reasons shown to exist to take any case out of the application of the general rule. There certainly appear to be no such considerations applicable to this case; and to hold that this offense may be committed by a blind man who sells books for a livelihood, and who happens innocently to sell an obscene publication, would be giving a construction to the statute manifestly harsh and not required by rules of law.'

"In United States vs. Carll, 105 United States 611 (last case on subject), Judge Gray held that it was necessary to allege knowledge under a United States statute against passing counterfeit money, even though the statute did not purport to make knowledge essential to the crime. In Chitty's Criminal Law (vol. II, p. 42), his form of an indictment for distributing obscene literature contains an allegation of knowledge, 'intending thereby to corrupt the morals of youth.' These authorities overrule Heard's Criminal Law, the Massachusetts book which all lawyers use in drawing up indictments.

"Second, as to the indictment not alleging to whom printed paper was distributed. In all the forms this is alleged. Heard, Criminal Law, p. 585. So in all the adjudged cases, Commonwealth vs. Holmes, 17 Mass. 336; vs. Tarbox, 1 Cush. 66; vs. Lawrence, Worcester, May T. 1878. So in indictments for illegal sale of intoxicating liquors, it must be alleged to whom the liquor was sold—Commonwealth vs. Thurlow. 24 Pickering 374; vs. Doyle, 11 R. I. 574. So in indictments for illegal gaming must allege with whom game was played. Bishop on Stat. Crim., § 894. So for larceny and adultery must be alleged to whom property stolen belonged, or with whom defendant committed crime. It is an elementary rule of criminal pleading that the crime must be described with great particularity."

Judge Pitman's incidental remarks were liberal and sensible, showing that if Mr. Heywood had been tried before him his rulings would probably hav ranked him with Lowell, Nelson, and Treat, rather than with Clarke, Aldrich, and Benedict.

It is obvious, by a glance at these points, that although they arose in the form of a motion to quash the indictments, they did not in the least relate, so far as intent is concerned, to any mere matter of technicality or form, but that they go directly to the gist of the whole matter in dispute between the obscenist-persecutors and the reformers and thinkers who claim the right to discuss any subject whatsoever in their own way, in so far as they deem necessary to the proper elucidation of their ideas. The decision, in fact, in quashing the indictment upon these points, overrules, in so far as the authority of this decision goes, the whole current of adverse rulings which were made in Bennett's case, in Heywood's first trial, and elsewhere, when these cases were sprung upon the country, and when the bench and the bar had not as yet been called to any thorough examination of the subject. We are greatly indebted to Mr. Nelson for having come thus gallantly to the defense of the right, and for having so industriously unearthed these more recent and more reasonable decisions, setting aside the musty authorities of an earlier date and a more conservativ age; for, while reformers do not, in the main, rely on any authority not based upon reason and abstract rights, still it is a great additional bulwark of strength to find that honest and enlightened judges hav already decided in favor of justice.

In connection with this recent and most important decision, let us recur to the other trial before Judge Nelson, a report of which is just now for the first time published by Mr. Heywood, in concert with the Defense Committee (New York), and a copy of which should be in the hands of every lover of liberty in the land. At the beginning of the trial Judge Nelson threw out "The Word Extra," because the allegation in the indictment that it "is too grossly obscene and lewd to be placed on the records of the court" is untrue. He asked Mr. Almy, the acting prosecuting attorney, to say on what passages in "Cupid's Yokes" he based the same charge. Mr. Almy replied that he had not yet selected the "obscene" portions. "Then," said Judge Nelson, "you must read the whole book before we proceed further." Mr. Almy stumbled along through it, noting the "obscene" passages, but did not find the "worst" (best) ones. Judge Nelson said, "The court is robust enough to stand anything in that book," and out it went. "But your action involves acquittal of the defendant on the two first counts of the indictment," said Mr. Almy. "Can't help that," replied Judge Nelson; "I do not rule on alleged obscenity, but simply say the allegations in the indictment that the works are too obscene to be spread upon the records of the court is not true."

The courts are great educators of the people in the matter of making close, but all-important, distinctions which the common mind is apt to overlook and disregard. Nothing is decided in either case on the right or wrong of Mr. Heywood's opinions on the matters in question, but only, in the one case, that, right or wrong, he has the perfect right to utter them, and in the other case, at this point, that it was false to state, as the prosecuting attorney had done in the indictment, that the language used was too obscene to be placed upon the records of the court—that is, to be reinstated, and again brought before the public for examination and estimate; and to be read therefore by the public; for to place it upon the records of the court is to republish, or re-introduce it to the public—not too obscene, therefore, for all pure and decent and fair-minded people to read and ponder and decide upon for themselvs. Virtually, therefore, this was a decision to the effect that the language was not, in the opinion of the court, obscene at all, although the judge did not choose to put it that way, but arrived at the end indirectly; thus saving the jury the trouble of deciding upon a fact which was so patent to a clear-minded thinker that it needed no jury in the matter.

Two observations occur to me here. One is the very kinky and peculiar nature of laws and court trials on this question of obscenity at all; and the very unique and trying position in which a defendant is placed, different from what happens in any other kind of trials. The charge is that he has said some naughty words, or that he has shown a naughty picture, and if to show that he has not done so—here comes in the kinkiness of the situation—he wishes to repeat the words or show the picture to his judges, or to the public, who are in part his judges, he will, in the very act of doing so, repeat the offense. In other words, he cannot show that he is not guilty, or even tell people what he is accused of, without, thereby, —in the very act of defending himself—committing a new crime, if crime it happens to be. Even the prosecuting officer is guilty of the same offense. The other observation is to commend the peculiar and discreet conduct and nice choice of just the right word in this particular ruling by Judge Nelson. He quietly, and with subtle irony and reproof, says that he thinks the court is robust enough to endure anything there is in "Cupid's Yokes," or in Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass;" which means, of course, that all right-minded and decent people, and the public at large, should be equally "robust." I thank the judge for that word. This idea of a moral robustness, which is not overcome or dismayed by every approach to forbidden topics, is a very precious suggestion, which I propose to recur to in another article. It is a protest against the weakness and babyism of our present namby-pamby social ideas; the prevalent ideas of proprietists in the community, and which the obscenity-prosecutors are endeavoring to continue and intensify, as against the more robust morality of the new and coming age, which will tolerate and approve the freest discussion of every subject. I hav lived in an English-speaking community in the South, where to talk of legs, or to speak of pricking one's finger, would hav been pronounced by the universal verdict as the most outrageous obscenity; while in England a word is used every day, as the name of a current coin, which is never heard in America, except among boys and youths in a sense most offensiv to our ideas of morality, so greatly are notions of this kind mere matters of neighborhood limits. And yet the great nation of the United States is engaged, through its courts and hired agents, in determining for us when we hav said a naughty word—under a penalty of ten years' imprisonment and five thousand dollars fine!

It is grandly to the credit of Judge Pitman that he says, "The rights of the majority of well-to-do, popular people are rarely imperiled; courts exist to protect the rights of minorities, of unpopular citizens;" in which I now learn that he follows the dicta of Hon. J. G. Abbott, of Boston, then chief justice of the Superior Court of Massachusetts, in a memorable series of decisions, thirty years ago.

This is the only true position, but is greatly in advance of where the majority of even professed reformers practically stand. It is of the utmost importance that they come to see and feel its righteousness, its beauty, and its grandeur as a social doctrin. It means that the more I disapprove, or even loathe and abhor, the ideas that my neighbor is uttering, by mouth or pen, the more am I bound, the more lowly am I summoned, to stand by and defend his right to utter them; and when anyone feels called on to hedge and apologize for such adhesion and defense by adding, "But I don't approve of the idea," or words to that effect, as if such approval in any degree were involved in the doctrin, it generally implies that he is not quite firmly intrenched in the grand idea of the doctrin itself.

In conclusion, I wish to quote the conclusion of Mr. Heywood's defense speech in the United States Court trial, an oration in the face of great danger, which will, I feel certain, enter into permanent English literature beside the great speeches of such men as Emmet, Chatham, and Burke, when pleading for life imperiled or for the rights of man:

"Your Honor, chosen to the seat of reason, with eye quick to see subtle falsities, as well as plain equities; with ear attuned to the indwelling harmony of things; guided by natural justice, which was before governments and will survive them, in that judicious use of power assured by intelligence and character—will render such decisions as the heart of commonwealth inspires. Hitherto under this statute Freelovers and Freethinkers selected by his alias 'agency' to be 'stamped out,' we, negroes of to-day, hav had few rights which obscenists were bound to respect. Sad, indeed, is it that hitherto liberty has come mainly through martyrdom; that 'by the light of burning heretics' we track the bleeding feet of Progress—civilization advancing from prison to prison, from gibbet to gibbet, from stake to stake. But there are instances where official power becomes liberating Providence, as when Judge Harrington of Vermont said to a slave-hunter, 'Show me a receipted bill of sale from God Almighty, and you may hav this man;' as when Lord Mansfield's ruling made every human foot free that stepped on English soil; as when myriads of Russian serfs were liberated by Alexander II.'s potent word; which was echoed in the stroke of Lincoln's pen that freed four million slaves here. The prosecutions under this statute since Nov. 2, 1872, not only disgrace the noble word, 'Law,' and make government the synonym of contempt, but record a page in history which will burn and blacken before all eyes as time advances! I hav no fears that this medieval barbarism now rioting here under the forms of law will reverse fundamental guarantees of liberty constitutioned in these states. True, Comstockism is a loathsome, deadly, secret disease; but perhaps your honor is to medicin it, and you, gentlemen, are the bearers to carry out its compost remains; perhaps the time has come when a judge of 'the quick and the dead,' and jurymen, strong in natural health and self-respect, will say to this contagious effect, 'Thus far, but no farther!' Be that as it may, my effort to vindicate citizen right, against lecherous, murderous assault, thus far is done, and I hav no word to unsay, or step to retrace. Intrenched behind our Massachusetts Bill of Rights and the Federal Constitution, behind the Declaration of Independence, and Plymouth Rock, behind Lincoln's and Alexander's emancipation decrees, and Magna Charta, behind the Protestant Reformation, Christianity, and every other utterance of the infinit word, I say with Luther before the Diet at Worms, 'I neither care nor dare retract anything; it is neither right nor safe to do so against conscience. Here I take my stand; I can do no otherwise.' You, gentlemen, and your honor, will also obey your sense of right. The adverse verdict, five years ago, ruined my business, broke up my home, turned my family penniless on the street, took my liberty, and, well-nigh, my life, caged in tomb 52 of Dedham hell, with clipped head and in felon's uniform, my physical vitality slowly but irrevocably breaking under the torturing rigors of even a liberal jail. As the days, weeks, months wore heavily on, and sympathetic, indignant, throbbing hearts in many states echoed my protest, these precious children in their temporary, charitably-provided abode, again, again, and again asked, 'Mamma, why does not papa come home?' 'Why does papa not come home?' Gentlemen, shall I go home? Freed from the vindictiv clutch of a foreign spy, shall I once more be allowed to—mind my own business? Liberty, home, and loved ones whose wants it is religion to supply, whose society it is heaven to share, are indeed dear to me. But what shall it profit one to hav freedom himself if others sink under the pestilential breath of repression? If the 'agent's' will must longer be law in state and gospel in church, if with your aid he again slave-pens me in a prison-vault to wait and waste away in my narrow home of iron and granit until the rude corpse-box bears back this body-form to my bereaved family, even then the ultimate result will be worth to the world all it costs me and mine; weak things will confound the mighty; others and still others with increasing, invincible numbers will rise in my tracks, and the good fight of faith will go on, until freedom to acquire and impart knowledge on all subjects of human interest; the right to hav, print, and mail honest opinions, is assured wherever the Federal-union flag floats."

STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

More Biblical Criticism from Modern Orthodoxy.

In order to giv some of our TRUTH SEEKER readers who hav not seen the lectures of Professor W. Robertson Smith on "The Old Testament" an idea of the views of this profound biblical scholar, I undertake an abridged exposition of some portions of them. Professor Smith occupies a chair at the Aberdeen College, Scotland, and doubtless regards himself as perfectly orthodox, although his frank confessions of his views would make the orthodox of twenty-five years ago open their eyes. He sets out by declaring: "The ordinary laws of evidence and good sense must be our guides, and we must apply these to the Bible just as we would to any other ancient book."

He declares that the scribes had the sole control and transmission of the Bible, and that Ezra was the father of the scribes who originated in the later times of the Old Testament. As Ezra lived during the later years of the captivity, many centuries after Moses, and even David and Solomon, and about five hundred years before Christ, what became of those parts of the Old Testament that are supposed to hav been written by Moses, Joshua, Solomon, Samuel, Isaiah, etc.? According to Professor Smith, there could hav been very little, if any, of those books in existence. There were traditions handed down orally, and possibly a scrap here or there of some writing on bits of leather. The old Hebrew language had long ceased to exist. It never was a written language, nor was its successor, that was called Hebrew, a language fully written. Professor Smith denies that these books were written by the men whose names they go under. Even Ezra and Nehemiah were not written by Ezra and Nehemiah. They bear evidence that they were written long after—as late as Alexander the Great's time. When the language we now know as the Hebrew became written, matters that had been delivered orally, as having been originally uttered by certain men, were written with such additions as had naturally grown to them. For instance, Moses doubtless received the Ten Commandments from Jehovah (when Jehovah received them Professor Smith does not say), and these, with possibly a few statutes, Moses had left to the Hebrews. In time, more ordinances grew up necessarily. These would all pass down to posterity as the laws of Moses. This will account for some books bearing the names of certain prophets, etc., as they do. The law was continually changing from century to century, yet always bore the name of Moses to giv it authority.

As to the text, he says the scribes chose that which we now hav at quite a late time, and that they had no great skill. They worked from a false point of view—their objects being legal, not philological. The Jews, for ages, worshiped images, called their God Baal, and supposed they were worshiping the true Jehovah. In Hosea's time the word Baal was felt to be dangerous to true religion [that is, to some other true religion.—Holt].

That anyone can exercise such enlarged common sense in criticising the book itself, and yet fail to use the same common sense in estimating the character it givs to the creator, will strike us as not a little strange. It only illustrates the wonderful capacity in the human mind to be inconsistent.

He declares that a large portion of the Old Testament writings are anonymous, are of composit origin, and hav been edited and re-edited in different ages, receiving additions or modifications at the hand of each editor. Whoever owned a roll of manuscript, owned it as his own property, there being no such thing as a property in books in our modern sense. The next owner or copyist would make his own changes by interlining and marginal notes, and these would all be incorporated by the next copyist. For the rŏlls were very perishable, and written with ink easily blotted out. Copyists looked to the meaning rather than the pen, not having our sense of the importance of word-for-word copy. To show what differences grow up, he compares several verses from the Hebrew and Septuagint—which last he greatly prefers, and with reason. For instance, take 1 Sam. xiv, 18:

Hebrew.	Septuagint.
"And Saul said to Abiah, Bring hither the ark of God. For the ark was on that day, and the children of Israel."	"And Saul said to Abiah, Bring hither the Ephod, for he bare the Ephod on that day before Israel."

He cites several more verses throughout the Bible to show the difference. In fact, the difference is as that between black and white. Take Jer. xxvii, 5–22. The Septuagint leaves out verses 7, 13, 17, 21, and about half of verses 1, 8, 10, 12, 18, 19, leaving the whole narrativ much simpler, more natural, and more forcible. The very titles to chapters are often, if not always, inserted by some unknown writer. "Not only the language, but the meaning, is entirely different in many parts."

"All the historical books are anonymous, with the single exception of Nehemiah, in which the author's name is prefixed to the first chapter. Why do not the authors giv their names? Because the public was interested in the substance, and cared not who wrote it." "This remark is not equally applicable to lyric poetry, like David's eulogy on Saul and Jonathan." "Nor does it apply so strongly to the sermons of the prophets. There are indeed a certain number of prophetic writings with no title; these were probably never spoken, but were composed in solitude." "The chief example of anonymous prophecies is the last twenty-seven chapters of Isaiah." Isaiah was a separate volume, even to Christ's time. See Luke iv, 17.

The custom of putting an author's name to a book as the title soon grew. That part in which the custom is most fully carried out is Psalms. The Septuagint ascribes some to David which the Hebrew version does not, and so conversely. The frequency of this ascription to David in the Septuagint is proof of an increasing tendency to do this. We know this continued till nearly all the Psalms were supposed to be of David. The same is the case with even the New Testament. Many manuscripts prefix the name of Paul to the epistle to the Hebrews, "although it is quite certain the oldest copies left it anonymous," says Prof. Smith. With considerable portions of Jeremiah and Isaiah it is evident these prophets never had anything to do. Most readers regard the prophecies as having been written and posted up to date. Such is not the case. "They were uttered at various times, and very unskillfully compiled."

So of Proverbs, which is regarded as a single composition by Solomon from first to last. "But here again we find such transpositions as show the book is a collection of various proverbial books and tracts." Had Professor Smith adopted the beautiful simplicity and striking terseness he so much admires in the Septuagint it had been better for his readers. But in that case his terrific assaults on our esteem of the scriptures were too apparent. Perhaps he thought that decency here required an abundant use of words to hide meaning. As to Proverbs, the professor admits that the book no doubt has some proverbs of Solomon, but embraces in addition a variety of other matters from other sources.

Coming to Kings and Chronicles, and criticising the way in which the history of reigns after Solomon's are narrated, he says, "There is what critics call the framework of history, and there are the details within that framework." He says the notices of the accession and death of each king, with certain stated particulars, and reference to the royal chronicles of Judah or Israel, are the framework, and bind the whole together. But the details within the framework are not a continuous story, and are plainly by different hands. Some of these details in the Septuagint are referred to a different time or place, or are omitted. He refers to the "inextricable difficulties" of the story of David and Goliath in one version, in 1 Sam. xvii. David is at court, a friend of Saul. Then suddenly there is a campaign, yet David is not along; he is with his father, who sends him to his brothers, who treat him with too much petulance for a favorit. Yet at the close of the chapter he seems utterly unknown at court. But in the Septuagint, verses 12 to 31, and verses from the 55th to the 5th of the next chapter, are omitted, and we thus get a natural account.

The Old Testament Apocrypha is found in the Septuagint side by side with books we call canonical. He explains this by the like fact of apocryphal New Testament books having been regarded as of equal authority for long periods of time. The line was not sharply defined. The idea of canonicity was not fixed. Even while New Testament books now held as canonical were still disputed, the epistle of Barnabas had not been definitly relegated to a lower place. "The line between the old and the new cannot be drawn with precision as to time, for the Psalms are in part considerably later than Ezra. The difference can be felt, rather than described."

As to any volume containing all the books of scripture in the times before Christ, we know that was out of the question. In one passage of the Talmud a volume containing all the prophets is mentioned as a singularity. Very few persons could ever dream of having them in a collected form. Daniel did not probably exist in its present form till after the time of the Maccabees.

We know as a matter of historical fact that the Pentateuch, as a whole, was never put into operation as a rule of Israel's life until Ezra. "The theory that it was given in the wilderness before they entered Palestine is erroneous. The prophets did not abolish the Pentateuch, or Levitical system. On the contrary, it is just as prophecy ceases that we find this code solemnly advances to authority, for the first time, under Ezra." So says Professor Smith. If anyanything will make ordinary Bible readers open their eyes, the above will. It will be observed how different Smith's method is from Bishop Colenso's. Colenso begins with Exodus, certain facts and figures being premised—as that the Hebrews went into Egypt some two hundred and over years before, seventy-two in number, and at the exodus are about three millions, with much cattle. Bearing this in mind, and knowing what the increase of population is at best, he wonders how such an increase could be—how Dan, for instance, who entered Egypt as one person, could then be some sixty thousand men, armed, and fit for war; how two midwives could serve for some three hundred births per day; how these millions could suddenly get up and start with all these old persons, and infants, and cattle, about 2 o'clock A.M., and march ninety miles in three days, and cross the Red Sea in a few minutes, as it were; how they could find rest at Elim under seventy palms, and water in twelve wells; how the priests could perform all these services in a camp of three millions, and eat so many burnt or sin offerings, etc.; and he concludes the whole narrativ is a tissue of blunders and nonsense, and Moses never wrote it. Joshua is even worse from the beginning. He passes Jordan even as Moses did the Red Sea; he circumcises the six hundred thousand and more men in a day, and carries them through signs and wonders greater than Sindbad ever saw, or Munchausen recorded.

But Professor Smith examins the subject in the concrete, and shows, not only that the details might be abused, but that the whole affair, according to our ideas, is a mistake. All that vast mass of material called the Old Testament, with but small exception, never was recorded in any way till a very late time, by whom we know not. Some of it existed as oral tradition from some time possibly prior to Ezra, 500 B.C. As to the prophets, had the Jews believed them, we had never seen a word of their sayings. Because the Jews disbelieved they wrote down some things to testify in after days. The Psalms were gradually introduced for the temple worship, and it is absurd to ascribe them to another who died before ever a temple was built. As to the Levitical code, and most of the ceremonials and ordinances of the Pentateuch, it is plain the greatest kings, prophets, priests, and seers never knew anything of them. Many of the chief favorits and confidants of Jehovah practised just the contrary, and supposed they were doing right. The greatest of the prophets denounced such observances.

It was not till Israel ceased to be a nation that its people lived under "the law."

Such are a few of the important facts clearly pointed out by this reverent and profound Biblical scholar of the land of Presbyterianism.

Oregon, Mo. HOLT.

Mr. Hale to Mr. Sunderland.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you permit me to reply, through the columns of your paper, to the rhodomontade of Mr. LaRoy Sunderland in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 26th, page 471, against my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 12th, on the "Existence of a Supreme Eternal Self-Existent Intelligence," that I call God. He says, after complaining of the hardship of having to drink a barrel of vinegar, to find out whether or no it was sweet wine, that if there were any such personal omniscience as he supposes, it would be unnecessary to fill four or five of the broad columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER to prove it; and then goes on to say that it is enough for the priests, and those victimized by that old barbarian book, to boast of an omniscient God, etc., as if I had taken my god from that old barbarian book—which is false inference. My god was not taken from that old book, and if Mr. LaRoy Sunderland will look at my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER, he will find in the first paragraph that God of that old barbarian book, the Jew God, classed with all the different gods that men hav imagined had an existence, and hav worshiped under every system of idolatry, and with every humbug, ism, and fraud that has ever existed from the year one—if there ever could hav been a year one—down to the present time. I would thank Mr. LaRoy Sunderland to confine himself to facts in his statements, and not misconstrue what I hav said and misrepresent my position and the ideas I hav advanced. And again, he asks, What is the verdict of science? It is that in the whole of things in all worlds—all phenomena—there is but one substance, and its inherent quality—force. There is but one force and one matter—uncreated, but without beginning or end—never more nor less in the whole of things. One force, self-controling and progressiv, evolves all the phenomena in all worlds and all minds, all results from nature, order, and laws, etc. He says, "In Mr. Hale's long argument, he has pointed out no place, no hole, for his god to come in, nothing for his god to do." There is nothing outside of nature. If Mr. Sunderland will only read the last fifteen or sixteen lines of my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 12th, page 439, he will see that my god is a full match for his force, and has quite as much to do in running this universe as his force has, and that Mr. Hale's God can fill as large a hole, or as small a hole, as his force can; and that if this force, which he has substituted for my God, only possessed the intelligence of this God of mine, and knew what it was doing, and why it was doing what is being done—was not an insensate, dummy sort of a thing, operating without knowledge or sense, like a volcano, or the expansion of water by heat or frost—it might pass for a sort of lackey for the true God of nature.

For further reply, I will refer him to my article in THE TRUTH SEEKER. If he will read it as it is, and not misconstrue and pervert it, he will come out all right.

Most respectfully yours, JAMES HALE.

Softening the Asperities.

From the New York Sun.

MY DEAR MR. EDITOR: I find in to-day's Sun the following:

"TOM MOORE WROTE IT.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN: Sir: Who wrote the poem beginning:

"'Oh, ever thus, from childhood's hour,
I've seen my fondest hopes decay?'

"CONSTANT."

Will you please tell me what poem Tom Moore ever began with those lines? In the middle of a sentence in "Lalla Rookh" I find:

"'Twas bright, 'twas heavenly—but 'tis past!

"Oh, ever thus, from childhood's hour,
I've seen my fondest hopes decay;
I never loved a tree or flower
But 'twas the first to fade away;
I never nursed a dear gazelle,
To glad me with its soft black eye,
But when it came to know me well,
And love me, it was sure to die!"

But who wrote this parody?

"I never had a bit of toast,
However good and wide,
But it always fell on the sanded floor,
And on the buttered side!"

"Even the great Homer nods."

It is permissible to soften the asperities of politics with literature. Very truly your friend and servant,

Lowell, July 30. BENJ. F. BUTLER.

We think Gen. Butler nods a little in his parody quotation. The second line does not begin with the word "however." The line should read:

"Particularly good and wide."

But what a tremendous meeting will assemble to greet General Butler when he makes his first speech in this city—say about four weeks hence. There will be no asperity about that, nor any decay of childhood's hopes; and Butler can begin his oration just as he pleases.

Our Maligners.

From the Philosophic Inquirer, Madras, India.

The Indian Messenger, the leading organ of the Sadharana Brahma Somaj, contains in its issue of June 3d a long paragraph from "one who has read many of the publications of the Theosophical Society with great care," containing some unmerited remarks and innuendoes against the leaders of the Theosophical Society, especially against their alliance with the late lamented D. M. Bennett, of the United States. One of the charges brought against this association is that that Society's organ givs gratuitous advertisments of Infidel publications and American and English works on Atheism, and that the theosophical leaders hav publicly defended Mr. Bennett against the vile insinuations and baseless charges brought against him by the vulgar-tongued Joe Cook, and others of his stamp, in view to discredit the Society in the eyes of the unwary public who do not often wish to inquire into things themselvs, but are content to be led by anyone who calls himself a public man. From the spirit with which the above charges were urged against that Society, we cannot help thinking that they were written by one who hates Infidels, and who, not caring to know the truth about what he writes, wants to hold the Society up to the ridicule of the unthinking portion of the reading public. The writer, for aught we know, may either be a Christian of the "low and meek" type, or a Brahmo of the New Dispensation class. Whatever it may be, it is certain that the writer, whether he has read with care much or little of the theosophical publications, is one who is unwilling to do the fullest justice to the aims of that august body. His readiness to identify the teachings of Occultists with modern Materialism, or Atheism, in view to raise an unmerited prejudice in the minds of those who are sluggish enough not to inquire into the problem of existence themselvs, and to face the conclusions which a rigorous logic would lead one to—his readiness, we repeat, is simply suspicious. The critic under notice, in his natural zeal for things dear to his cherished convictions, remarks that "it is an utter misuse of terms to call this theosophic discovery a basis for religion—for religion without love and gratitude and spiritual aspirations is a misnomer." We need not go the length of showing that the above remark savors of Christian cant and puts beyond doubt the fact, either that the writer has not sufficiently read philosophy in its highest phases, or that his mind is enveloped in the mists of superstition and prejudice. Nor is his allegation that Mr. Bennett was convicted for the publication and selling of obscene and immoral books and imprisoned in his own land well founded. It appears to hav been recklessly taken up from the report of a certain lying missionary who wanted to make money by traducing the characters of men who are in advance of the times, and who in consequence are adjudged criminals by interested bigots who will not permit others to think or write as they would wish to. The truth is, Mr. Bennett was imprisoned for a crime similar to the one for which Mr. Bradlaugh was convicted in "the land of liberty," and bigots must look up to that land with great pride for the wise manner in which people are still prevented there from thinking otherwise than as the clergy would wish them to do on the subject of religion and morality, delinquency being punished with no less than rigorous imprisonment. Such is the law in Christendom. Shame, that it should be preserved in the statute books and administered by men who call themselvs Christians. Strange, that in a land of complete religious freedom like the one we are now in, anyone who pretends to the least culture should consider that the barbarous law in Christian countries which now punishes Freethought with imprisonment, and which in olden days used to punish it with loss of life after protracted torture, is a righteous one, and that the sufferers therefrom are immoral men.

A Real Enjoyable Sunday-School Picnic.

"Oh, but haven't we had fun to-day!" exclaimed a young lady to some of her companions, as they settled down in about fifteen seats, a young man and a maiden to each seat, with one or two disconsolate young men left over, as is the rule with picnic parties. "I don't care if it was a Sunday-school picnic, I've had one of the best times. Say, Charley, what's that on your pantaloons? You must hav been sitting down on the pie. Say, Mary, were you with us when [outbreak of laughter]—when the minister [another outbreak]—when the minister kneeled down to ask the blessing on our lunch there by the big tree, the one that ——" Here occurred the third laughing fit and the first pause for breath. Mary improved the opportunity by replying that she was not there, wherever it was, and to inquire what was so funny. "Well," resumed the first maiden, "Rev. Hobbs lunched with us. We spread our things out on the grass, and so he kneeled down to ask the blessing [more laughter]. It—it makes me laugh so I can't tell it. Well, as I said, he was kneeling down. He started out to say, 'We thank thee, Lord, in the name of thy son Jesus Christ,' but no sooner had he said this than he jumped about five feet up in the air. You ought to hav heard the way he spoke those last two words. He just yelled 'em out as if he was swearing. It was shocking, and we girls started to run away, when Jimmy Johnson came and told us what the matter was." "And what was it?" "Well, just as the minister reached the 'Je'—a horrid wasp bit him right through his pants."—Chicago Herald.

Appreciated Sympathy.

At the last regular meeting of the Gananoque (Ont.) Secular Society, held in Acton's Hall Sunday evening, the following resolution of condolence was moved and carried:

WHEREAS, We learn with deep regret of the death of the wife of our esteemed co-laborer, E. M. Macdonald, editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER;

Resolved, That the Gananoque Secular Society tenders its sympathy to Mr. Macdonald, and assures him of the most heart-felt sorrow shared by us in this his great grief.

Signed, on behalf of the Society,

GEO. G. MEIKLE, President.
HENRY SMITH, Secretary.
JOHN GRANT, Treasurer.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., July 27, 1884.

DEAR BROTHER MACDONALD: It was with great sorrow that the Liberals of Syracuse and vicinity learned of your sad bereavement in the death of your wife in reading the grand and beautiful words of Messrs. Chainey and Putnam. Mr. Chainey expressed in words what we would like to say better than any of us could do. Yet we cannot let the occasion pass without expressing to you our heartfelt sorrow and sympathy in your great affliction.

We hav therefore

Resolved, That in the death of your estimable wife the Liberals hav lost a valuable member from their ranks, and you and yours a true and noble wife and friend. And though words are but feeble comforters at such a time, yet we hope you will accept this as evidence of our sympathy and friendship.

E. A. WOOD, President;
WM. MALCOLM, Treasurer;
HENRY NOXON, Secretary;

of the Syracuse Liberal Club; and one hundred other Liberals.

PERSONAL.—I hav received, in addition to the resolutions of these societies, a great number of sympathizing letters from valued friends. I am sure they were not intended for print, and I would reply to each if I could, but the task, in addition to my other labors, is too great. But from a full heart do I return thanks to each and every one. From Humanity must consolation be sought in times of trouble, and from Humanity alone can it come. "Help for the living—hope for the dead;" and help and hope proceed only from warm hearts. Words cannot recall her to life, but a continuance of that work in which she so fully sympathized can ease the pain of separation, and make her memory a hallowed and a sacred thought, a stimulus to effort, a constant inspiration in the right. If possible, her high ideals shall be realized, and then I shall be willing to lay down my burden and join her, whether it be for good or ill, whether to enter Nirvana or a spiritual activity.

To the friends who hav written me with tenderness and cheer I again return thanks.

E. M. MACDONALD.

Editorial Notes.

THE Catholic Examiner says that the religion received by the negroes from Methodists and Baptists is a "ghastly sham."

W. F. JAMIESON, Pipestone, Minn., is at lecture work, and has commenced the campaign early, having had large audiences in July at Marshall, Minn., several evenings in succession. Address for lectures at Pipestone, Minn.

THE tax-collector has handed his bill to the London Freethinker. One of his items is: "2s. 3 1-2d. for one year's vicar's maintenance." Mr. Foote thinks that if his particular vicar has any conscience the victuals he purchases with that sum ought to choke him. Mr. Foote pays his school-tax with enthusiasm, for it will, he thinks, in the long run choke all the vicars on earth.

"FATHER" LAMBERT'S "Notes on Ingersoll," hav had a circulation away and beyond its merits, being buoyed up by Christians who, by reason of their slight acquaintance with dialectics, thought they saw in its shallow reasoning a reply to the unanswerable logic of Freethought. It was handed to us at the Rochester Convention, but we never could see how it deserved the consequence of a reply. The Catholic church provides all its students for the priesthood with a set of answers to all the Rationalists' objections to theology. These answers are ingenious, as the Romish church has in her ranks the best of sophists, but none of them can stand for a moment when closely analyzed. Pastor Lambert has used the stereotyped formula, and with no more success than his predecessors. But as many of our readers hav heard of the book and want to know what it is like, we yield considerable space this week to a volunteer review of the work.

THE attempt to raise money to pay off the enormous debt of Archbishop Purcell seems about to be abandoned. The Catholic Telegraph made an appeal to the Catholics of the archdiocese to contribute money toward this purpose, and a subscription list was opened by the Rev. F. J. Goetz. Father Goetz has now withdrawn this list, in consequence of an interview with Archbishop Elder, who refused to giv his public approval to the schome. The archbishop, in a letter published in the Catholic Telegraph, denies that he ever forbade the list or expressed disapproval of it. He admits that he told Father Goetz that he was publishing his list in a paper which was in an "attitude of defiance to authority;" but adds that amends hav since been made by it. The Catholic church robbing the outside world is a familiar sight, but to deliberately and publicly steal the earnings of its own dupes—besides frightening them into giving a good portion of their property—reveals a depth of depravity startling even if not unexpected.

THE verdict against Mr. Bradlaugh for the crime of voting in Parliament without having taken the oath is not by any means the end of even that attempt to suppress him. The verdict is without legal effect until judgment shall hav been heard, first in support of a motion for a new trial, then in support of a motion to enter judgment for him, and again in support of a motion for arrest of judgment. This fight, which he publicly announces he will make, may put the end off for years, for if even all these motions are rejected he will go to the Court of Appeal, and from the Court of Appeal to the House of Lords, if that ancient nuisance is in existence at the time. If a new election of members of Parliament be in the meantime ordered, he can be re-elected by Northampton, and, going up with the first forty members, swear himself in with them, and no redress can be had by the Christians except they resort to the stake or dungeon, for it is the legal method of beginning a new parliament.

DR. CURRY, of Chicago, who characterized the Bible as "a lot of old wives' fables," was at the last General Conference elected editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review. In the first number under his editorship appears an article by Dr. Milton S. Terry which gives away the whole Pentateuch. Mr. Terry's paper states that "the Pentateuch contains a number of passages which cannot, without doing violence to sound critical principles, be attributed to Moses as their author. The Pentateuch, especially the book of Genesis, contains documents of various dates and authorship which hav been worked over into an orderly and homogeneous whole. The laws of the Pentateuch were either unknown, or else largely neglected and violated, during most of the period between the conquest of Canaan and the Babylonian captivity. The books of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers show different stages of legislation, and Leviticus contains a noticeably fuller and more elaborate priestly code and ritual than appear in Deuteronomy." Dr. Terry's assent to these propositions is stated in these words: "We are frank to say that we regard the above propositions as simple statements of fact." This is certainly cautious enough, but none the less conclusiv. Between Dr. Curry and his contributor the Bible gets hard raps, and if the Methodist church proposes to continue their membership its "Disciplin" will hav to be amended.

Many more equally conclusiv internal evidences of forgery are adduced and elaborated by Mr. Ross.

The external evidence of forgery is also irresistible.

Poggio Bracciolini (pronounced Bratsheoleny) was secretary to several successiv popes during a period of forty years. In erudition, intellectual ability, and power of writing, he was without his equal. In some qualities as a writer he was superior to Tacitus. He wrote the fable of "The Old Man, the Boy, and the Ass."

In 1418 he went to England with Henry Beaufort, bishop of Winchester, afterwards cardinal. From 1420 to 1422 he was constantly complaining in letters to his bosom friend Niccoli, seventeen years his senior, of unfulfilled promises by the prince prelate. His benefice was only 120 florins a year, with hard work; and when it was exchanged for another worth £40, with less duties attached, still he was dissatisfied.

In February, 1422, came an offer of new employment of a very mysterious character, which his friend, Niccoli, who seems to hav been at the bottom of the scheme, advised him to undertake. If he would do it, his countryman, Piero Lamberteschi, would endeavor to procure for him in three years 500 gold seguins. "If he will make it 600," writes Poggio, "I will at once close with his proposal. . . . I like the occupation to which he has invited me. I hope I shall be able to produce something worth reading; but for this purpose, as I tell him in my letters, I require the retirement and leisure that are necessary for literary work."

This mysterious task appears to hav been the forging of the hopelessly lost additional books of the "History" of Tacitus, and palming off the forgery on Cosmo de Medici, a wealthy patron of learning and special admirer of Tacitus.

In June, 1422, Poggio writes to Niccoli:

"Giv me the leisure and the time for writing that History, and I will do something you will approve. . . . When I reflect on the merits of the ancient writers of history, I recoil with fear from the undertaking; though when I consider what are the writers of the present day, I recover some confidence in the hope that if I strive with all my might I shall be inferior to few of them."

His first intention was to go from England to Hungary, where he would be unknown, but in the summer of 1422 he returned to Rome, where as secretary to the pope he had a small salary and little or nothing to do.

In May, 1423, he writes to his friend Niccoli to send him without delay all his notes and extracts from books. In October he speaks of the "beginnings of any kind being arduous and difficult; what the ancients did pleasantly, quickly, and easily, was to him troublesome, tedious, and burdensome." In November he begs Niccoli to get him a map of Ptolemy's geography and send him several historical works, particularly Suetonius and Plutarch.

But now he begins to see the impracticability of forging additional books to the History of Tacitus on the plan of that author, for the want of material. So he suggests another scheme of fabrication just as audacious.

Iu January, 1424, he implores his friend Niccoli to seek out Cosmo de Medici and tell him of a great discovery in a far-off town in Germany of two large volumes containing the ten Decades of Livy's History. This was a trumped-up story by which he hoped to be relieved of his present difficult task; he could forge books of Livy much easier than of Tacitus, and if Cosmo could be caught with this fly, Poggio would be able in a short time to make his fortune. Already he had made discoveries of ancient manuscript, either alone or in company with other scholars, and fabulous sums had been paid for such discoveries. In fact, he was occupied with that sort of business nearly all his days, and may hav forged other ancient books.

But the new suggestion did not tempt Cosmo; Livy was not his favorit author. Poggio therefore had to proceed as best he could. Three years and a half elapsed when mysterious utterances passed between him and Niccoli with respect to Tacitus, and after nearly two years more, in the spring of 1429, a monk is said to hav brought from a convent in Saxony, near the borders of Bohemia, the last six books of what are now known as the "Annals" of Tacitus.

The forgery is completed in Poggio's fiftieth year. He has earned his five or six hundred gold seguins, which is a fortune in 1429, equivalent to fifty or sixty thousand dollars now; and for the rest of his life he can indulge his long cherished wish of devoting himself to literary undertakings. From that time until his death, at the age of seventy-nine, his published works number at least fifteen, many of them valuable.

Fifty-three years after his death, when his fourth son, a man of sixty-eight years, is holding the same office that his father did before him, John de Medici, who has just become Pope Leo X., offers a reward of 500 gold seguins for the discovery of new copies of ancient Greek manuscript or Roman works; and in less than two years his thesaurum questor pontificus, Angelo Arcomboldi, afterwards bishop of Milan, produces the first six books of the "Annals," incomplete.

The composition of the first six books (five, as now divided) is superior to that of the last six, as might be expected, being later work; but they are all by the same hand. The presumption is that, emboldened by the success of the first forgery, Poggio endeavored in his old age to complete the whole work, sixteen books, but was surprised by death in 1459. The manuscript was left to his sons, and was not made public until it came into the hands of the last surviving son, who was in a position to use it with the collusion of a competent scholar like Arcomboldi.

The first six books, like the last six, contain errors that Tacitus could not hav made, as, for example:

1. The writer tells us that before the time of Claudius only two generals, namely, Sylla and Augustus, had exercised the privilege of the enlargement of the pomoerium. Commenting on this, Lipsius says: "I am not going to defend you, Cornelius; you are wrong; an enlargement was also made by Julius Cæsar, who was 'pitched' in [interjectus] between these two."

2. We read in the "Annals" that Julia, the only daughter of Augustus and wife of Tiberus, after languishing in exile for twenty years, banished by her father, and deserted by her husband, and supported only by the bounty of her mother, "Augusta" (Scribonia), died in the first year of Tiberius. In the fourth year of the latter's reign, he ordered a coin to be struck in honor of his wife Julia. That coin is preserved in the National Collection in Paris.

3. The author says that at the funeral of Drusus "the images of the Claudii and the Julii were borne around his bier." Drusus belonged to the Levian family and not to the Julian. The mistake is so palpable that Lipsius and other modern editors hav substituted Liviorum for Juliorum.

But we forbear to adduce further evidences of so palpable a forgery, and will only note again what Mr. Ross further says about the oldest manuscripts:

"The manuscript in the Mediceo-Laurentian library is known as the Second Florence manuscript. All the other manuscripts of the last six books of the 'Annals' are copies of it; as James Gronovius puts it, 'emanated' from it; just as the other Florentine manuscript is the only one containing all the books of the 'Annals,' or, as Ernesti says, 'It is unique; we hav no other manuscript of those books.'"

There was no necessity of making many transcripts of the latter codex, for printing had come into use a good half century before it was found—or, more properly, said to hav been found—in the Abbey of Corvey.

At the end of the Second Florence manuscript is a note purporting to be written by Salustius, a heathen philosopher of the fourth century. But the codex is written in Lombard characters, which were not in use in Italy until the sixth century.

Again we quote Mr. Ross's words:

"This copy in the Mediceo-Laurentian Library in Florence of all the 'Annals' of Tacitus cannot be traced further back than to the possession of a man who flourished in the days of Leo X. and the Emperor Maximilian I.—Johannes Jocundus, of Verona; so that it turns out on careful investigation that all positiv knowledge of this manuscript stops at the commencement of the sixteenth century, exactly as all positiv knowledge of the other Florentine manuscript stops at the commencement of the fifteenth century."

Mr. Ross lays no special emphasis on the passage in the "Annals" conceiving Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate, nor does he deign to notice Robert Taylor, who first proved that passage a forgery. But he draws an ugly portrait of the forger—a rare scholar, the brightest intellect of his time, but devoid of principle, delighting in obscenity, addicted to lewdness, prone to calumny, and fond of depicting vice. He lived in a notoriously immoral age, just prior to the Protestant Reformation. Hence, as might be expected, his pretended History of the Cæsars is totally unlike that of the gentle Tacitus. It is a counterfeit record of court scandal, and shamefully exaggerates the vices of the Roman emperors.

Nero is said to hav set fire to ancient Rome, A.D. 64, and to hav charged the crime upon the Christians, who were "already branded with deserved infamy," and upon whom he "inflicted the most exquisit tortures." Did Poggio believe it? Of course not. And it is not a little singular that he should omit to mention either Peter or Paul, who, having escaped the mythical slaughter, were reserved for special martyrdom at the hands of the same anathematized emperor.

The citizens of Florence placed a statue of Bracciolini in the church of Santa Maria. In 1560, the reigning duke of Tuscany transferred it to the interior of the sacred building and placed it among the twelve apostles. The group is not altogether an inconguous one—twelve shadowy apostles and one brilliant impostor.

An Explanation Wanted.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Does the petition for the impartial protection of all citizens which appears on the last page of your issue for June 11th include women? If it does not, then, though the petition were granted, and all the "citizens" enjoyed their absolute equal rights, there still would exist a national crime, committed against that national justice for all the people which, as the Constitution declares, this government was founded to establish, because the women who compose the best half of the people would still continue vainly striving for the rights which are so unjustly withheld.

But if it does include the women, we ask why it does not say, "people," instead of "citizen"—then it would also include the Indians. For the Fourteenth Amendment declares: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States, and of the state wherein they reside."

The Fifteenth Amendment says: "The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition."

Thus the law is as plain as words can make it that not only women, but Indians, are nativ-born citizens, and are justly entitled to the free enjoyment of their religion and laws upon their respectiv reserves, which are theirs either by heritage or by treaty stipulations, precisely the same as the Shakers and other co-operativ parties enjoy their respectiv creeds and customs upon their own domains. This fact suggests another item which needs explaining. Why is it that with the Nine Demands of the Liberal League there is not one for the protection of the Indians against official outrage, much greater than the evils prayed against in all the nine put together?

The Indians are not only compelled to liv under the control of the different churches, and to hav their children taught their conflicting creeds, but whenever the whites want their land, as in the case of the Modocs, and the great tribes under their respectiv leaders, Sitting Bull and Chief Joseph, an army is sent to drive them off or put them to death. Canby and Custer both perished in this sad attempt under national authority. Other tribes are now threatened by acts of Congress which are passed under a show of justice, of which the following are specimens that I cut from the Jacksonville, Oregon, Times, and the Ashland Tidings, of July 4, 1884:

"The sale of 640 acres of the Umatilla reservation, ordered thrown open by Congress, has closed at Pendleton, over 4,000 lots having been sold. The appraised value of the land was about $60,000, but the sale realized over $200,000."

"One of the finest farms in the United States is said to be that of Hank Vaughn, on the Umatilla reservation, says the Walla Walla Journal. Features are 900 acres of wheat, 480 acres of barley, fifteen acres of Russian oats, thirty of miscellaneous vegetables, 160 acres of pasture, 600 acres broken for fall sowing, and an orchard planted and in thriving condition; 600 or 700 chickens, countless ducks, a large number of hogs, and hundreds of horses and cattle; good residence and fine barns and outbuildings; an abundance of the best machinery; the land all fenced; several hundred thousand feet of lumber hauled from the mountains; 150 cords of wood. This year's crop is magnificent. The wheat is as high as an ordinary man's head, and very thick. Mr. Vaughn calculates to clear $22,000 from this year's products. On the 18th of May, 1883, the land was an unbroken prairie, with no sign of cultivation. It now blooms like the rose."

The Umatilla Indians are more civilized than those who call them savages. They never were at war with the United States, but were forced from their nativ homes to liv a thousand miles south, in a sickly country, where hundreds died of fever.

The following extract was from a letter published in the Council-fire at Washington, but so far as I can learn it was not noticed by any other paper:

"We Western men wish it to be understood that we do not approve of Gen. Howard's moving the Indians (510 in number) from Camp Harney in Oregon to Washington territory, 360 miles, starting in January, when the ground was frozen a foot deep, covered with snow, very cold, and the Indians not half clad. I am sure that the settlers did not demand this needless suffering.

"The horrors of this trip in mid-winter can never be described. Men, women, and children, well and sick, were crowded into ox-wagons and jolted over the rough and frozen ground; women were taken in labor, and the sick were frozen dead and stiff before reaching their camps. The weird wailing of friends for the dead was enough to melt the hardest heart. Such a sight, I pray God, I may never witness again."

Another letter in the same paper has the following:

"My head and heart are full of bitter memories of the indignities which hav been heaped upon the Indians by scores of military men. Many hav left their half-breed children to perish—worse than full-blooded Indians, who are never brute enough to desert their own offspring. I hav witnessed no grief more sincere than Indian woman suffer from being brought to shame among their own people by army officers, and then left unaided to provide for their children."

Col. Meachem, the editor, adds: "I know these writers to belong to a class often called border ruffians, of whom there are thousands married to Indian women, whose conjugal affection is unequaled, and infinitly superior in every element of honor to those who seduce the mother and desert the child."

With these facts before us, I respectfully suggest that the following be added as a Tenth Demand of the Liberal Leagues and to the petitions to Congress:

Whereas, the Indians are citizens, and are entitled to all the protection of the government which their circumstances need for the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; therefore,

Resolved, That the appointment of missionaries and the military should be chiefly to instruct, and to restrain the lawless whites from aggression.

Resolved, That all difficulties should be settled by arbitrators, mutually chosen.

Respectfully, John Beeson.

Christian Liberty.

"I will pray the father, and he shall giv you another comforter that he may abide with you forever, even the spirit of truth" (John xiv, 16, 17).

"Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (2. Cor. iii, 17).

In proportion as the human race becomes enlightened, it strives after liberty. The ignorant only are content to be slaves, and the struggle for freedom is the cause of progress. Carrying on this struggle, men constantly advance to higher and nobler conditions of life. Abandoning it, they retrogade towards the lower state of mere animal existence.

Christianity promises to instruct the ignorant, and to free the slave, but her utterances are false and misleading. Her spirit, instead of guiding her disciples along the highway of truth, conducts them into the by-paths of error. In the place of bestowing liberty, her efforts hav ever been directed to binding the world in the iron chains of thraldom.

The knowledge which is calculated to benefit us does not consist in fanciful dreams of an uncertain future, but in a practical acquaintance with the world which we inhabit. It is a knowledge of ourselvs and our fellow-beings. It results from a study of the means which are adapted to render their lives and ours happier and better. This science is within the reach of humanity, although it can be acquired only by slow degrees, each generation adding to the inheritance left by its predecessors. But that the stock may be increased, we must not fall into the delusion that we already possess all that we require. The blind faith and implicit obedience taught by religion are the worst enemies to human progress. So far as they influence communities or individuals they keep them in the darkness of ignorance, and bind upon them the fetters of slavery.

The statements contained in the passages at the head of this article are, like most scripture texts, absolutely the reverse of fact. Only by seeking for truth can we discover it, and the dogmatic spirit of Christianity is entirely opposed to this search. Happily the spirit of humanity is stronger than that of any religion that was ever promulgated. Year after year, day after day, it proves its strength. First one, then another evil doctrin is cast to the winds. Articles of faith are constantly diminishing in number, while those that remain are becoming more elastic, as the religion of humanity becomes blended with the religion of the churches. Past generations united with Pilate in asking Jesus, "What is truth?" Like him they received no answer. Now men turn from the dumb oracle to search the open pages of the book of nature, and seeking they find.

Hence the rapid strides with which humanity is advancing. Every day men throw off some of the shackles imposed upon them by their religious teachers. The time when credence was given to idle folks because they were indorsed by those in power, and submission yielded to tyrants because they were "the Lord's anointed," is fading from our view. The world is a brighter, happier, better dwelling-place for us than it was for our ancestors. It will be brighter, happier, better still for our descendants when we shall hav passed away.

If it be a fact that "where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty," then is the spirit of the Lord absent from all religious bodies? The most Christian communities are those where tyrants hav most power. Wherever freedom may be found it can be traced to the exercises of human reason. Christianity inculcates only blind faith and entire obedience, and religious people are only tolerant in proportion as they admit a mixture of secularism with their teaching. The doctrin of original sin assumes that the pursuit of knowledge and the exercise of the will are criminal, and caused the ruin of the human race. That doctrin is the foundation on which the churches are erected. Remove it, and they tumble to the ground —no fall, no atonement, no first Adam, no need for a second.

The liberty which Paul offered the Corinthians was exactly that which preachers hav always been willing to allow their hearers. It was the liberty to listen to his teaching, to believe his utterances, and adopt his principles, but never to dissent from or dispute with him. "Be ye followers of me" (1. Cor. iv, 16). True liberty is that which secularization is spreading throughout the world. It means freedom of thought, speech, and action, restrained only in each individual case by the equal rights of others. What Christian liberty is, let the apostle himself explain. "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God" (Rom. xiii, 1).

Those were dark ages when the doctrins of Paul, falsely attributed to Jesus, had power over men. The world stood still, or was agitated, not by sentiments of benovolence and humanity, but by those of cruelty and oppression. Luckily for us, we go on, daily repeating the act attributed to our first parents, plucking fruit from the tree of knowledge. Thus surely, if slowly, ignorance is being banished from among us, slavery put to flight, and we are enabled to exclaim: "Where the spirit of man is, there is liberty."

Reconciliation.

"Reconciliation" is all the go in the Liberal ranks just now. Reconciliation, union, and harmony are all right—are very desirable, in fact—but there is such a thing as sacrificing matters of much greater moment for the sake of securing them, and thus secured, they are very apt to take to themselvs wings and fly away.

I am one of the "irreconcilables," and I hav failed to discover a single valid reason for offering any terms to the so-called "modifiers." The question at issue is one so vital, one so intimately interwoven with every fiber of the Freethought mantle, that I cannot see how anyone upon whose shoulders it has fallen can for a moment giv his assent to any scheme for governmental doctoring of the fountains of knowledge under any pretext, however specious. I reject, wholly and in detail, as unworthy of consideration, the arguments of those who claim that the state is a moral or religious person—is a person at all; and with this theological assumption goes the basis upon which rests all obscenity statutes, as well as all other so-called "moral" legislation.

For this central reason I demand the repeal of all such statutes as those which are familiarly known as the "Comstock laws," whether enacted by a municipal council, a state legislature, or a national Congress. There is no difference between them in principle, and they vary only in degrees of dangerousness.

So thinking, it has been impossible for me to join in the cry for "reconciliation" which is now swelling through our ranks. I see no gain to be derived from a temporary union with those who only a short time ago made such fierce war upon the repeal policy of the League. A platform which shall be satisfactory to them cannot be so to the earnest Radicals, and one upon which the latter can honestly stand must be as white-hot iron to the modifiers. The prophets of this new dispensation of harmony cry, "Peace, peace!" when there is no peace.

There can be no true secularization which includes in its program a press and mail less than completely free from the meddling beaks of both church and state. There can be no compromise here; it is folly to hope for an honorable union of these rapidly diverging forces. And the sooner we make up our minds to this, and proceed firmly and resolutely on our way, the better.

Hitherto, or since the fall of 1880, the policy of the League upon this question has been that of antagonism to national obscenity statutes, and tacit, or, more accurately, avowed, indorsement of state laws touching the same matter. Thus were formed two distinct camps into which could gather the friends of Liberal organization, the camps respectivly of those demanding repeal and those favoring modification only of the national obscenity statutes, but agreeing in the main, if not wholly, concerning the desirability of morality laws.

Of course, at bottom, there was no real difference between these two positions, but the repealers were on the side of decentralization and of local self-government, and hence they had the sympathies of and enlisted in their ranks many of the "extremists," who cannot see how it lessens a man's sufferings to be sent to prison, for no crime, by a state instead of a federal court.

These extremists, among whom I of course number myself, though not satisfied with the attitude of the League, were yet willing to take half a loaf, and help the League in so far as it was right in its war against the common foes, the Christians and the modifiers. And so we never hav attempted to introduce genuin repeal resolutions.

But now that overtures hav been made to the modifiers, the time has come for the fight to assume a triangular form, and I hope that this opportunity for us to challenge the public attention in behalf of our righteous principles will not be lost. It is a matter of the deepest regret to me that I cannot be at the Congress this fall, but I trust that some clear-headed reformer who shall be there will introduce repeal resolutions having the right ring and covering the whole ground. It is of no use to temporize longer; the League has been placed in a position where it must go backward or forward—or die.

Freethought vs. Bond Thought.

The word "religion" is derived from religio—"binding;" and Freethinkers, therefore, are strictly correct in declaring that, however benevolent any religion may appear at first glance, its ultimate object must be—unless it would prove false to its name—to put fetters of some kind upon the freedom of thought; and this is a practice which all lovers of humanity should resist to the utmost.

A "religion" that does not attempt to bind the mind is no religion at all, because binding—religio—being the plan, and the human mind being the prey, it necessarily follows that mental bondage is always and everywhere the ultimate aim and object of every genuin religion. I earnestly hope, therefore, that the time will come when religion—or, in plain English, mental slavery—will be as abhorrent to all friends of liberty as is its twin barbarism, chattel slavery, and that the offices of bishop and clergyman will be as much frowned upon as are those of slave-driver and overseer at present.

The two former of these titles mean just the same thing to the victims of the first-mentioned tyranny, that the two latter titles do to the last mentioned.

Even if it were possible to keep the great mind of humanity in binding to a special ideal, as all religion is obliged by its nature to demand, it would still be an immense wrong so to do, for what our race most needs is not "tying to the highest," or any other sort of chaining to some variety of faith, but simple freedom to investigate, liberty to be truth seekers; and free reason will, in the long run, do far better than fettered reason can ever do, concerning either high or low ideals.

In the words of the gallant and eloquent Col. Ingersoll, what is needed is "Room—room for the human mind," and any binding—religio—upon the intellect, however light it may appear to be, is inevitably a clog and fetter to proper mental growth and action.

Blind, unreasoning, or bounden devotion to even the best of objects is objectionable, because any such fetter upon the mind works injury to the broadest mental culture; and yet this is precisely what every real religion, because of its binding name, is obliged to demand or be false to itself.

And inasmuch as the special business of every species of religion is the binding of thought, it follows, as a matter of course, that the greatest mental slave is the best specimen of the tribe; and this is a condition of things that ought to make even religionists feel like calling off the dogs of faith.

With Freethought, on the contrary, the person who keeps reason the most free from straps and bindings is the best specimen; and what a noble contrast this presents to the bound and gagged disciple of religion!

As no person can be both free and bound at the same time, the attempts of some Freethinkers to write themselves down as devotees of a religion can only end in ludicrous failure, for if secular philosophy and goodness is a religion, then, of course, it is wrong to teach any of its principles in the public schools, exactly as in the case of any other religion, and consequently no philosophy and goodness could be taught in them at all.

Liberals ought to liv above such childishness, and, dropping the name as well as the game of mental slavery, should endeavor to become ardent scientists, thereby adopting a culture which lifts its followers unto hights of moral and spiritual excellence never even attempted, much less accomplished, by any religion of either ancient or modern times.

Under any bona fide religion, you must remain chained to its ideal, whatever that may happen to be, and are not allowed to go any higher, but under glorious Freethought you can change to higher ideals whenever you please—a very necessary liberty, but one utterly impossible within the bounds of any true religion.

This religio, or binding, to some special way of thinking, is wrong, however excellent the faith you are tied to, and although superstition and barbarism hav always deemed it right to thus "crib, cabin, and confine" the human intellect, the voice of reason and the logic of civilization are fast showing it to be wrong, and its abolishment must surely follow. It all comes down at last to this, that true religion consists in binding the mind, hoping thereby to prevent all change from its particular faith, while true goodness consists largely in breaking all such fetters, thus leaving the mind free to follow virtue, acquire knowledge, and institute progress through the only means by which it can practically ever be done, viz., untrammeled reason. Even the least and most humanitarian of religions is, like a mild form of chattel slavery, a crime against liberty and virtue, for upon the complete emancipation of thought depend the freedom and hope of universal man.

The Hurst Phenomenon.

To The Editor of The Truth Seeker Sir: E. B. Foote, Jr., has "dipped his pen" to befog the readers of The Truth Seeker. The tricks of Miss Hurst hav been explained over and over again, but the public seem to care nothing for the explanations. Dr. Foote ought to know that no one can do a trick at first trial with grace and ease, any more than a man can skate with ease at the first attempt.

I willingly rank myself with that class who hav relinquished all ambition, except that of leading a peaceful and agreeable life; there is a medium condition to which I desire to conform, neither commanding nor being commanded; but always preserving my liberty.—Socrates.

Why dost not wait for thy end in tranquility, whether it is extinction or removal to another state? And until that time comes, what is sufficient? Why, what else than to venerate the Gods and to bless them, and to do good to men and to practice tolerance and self-restraint?—M. A. Antoninus.

☞ We wish that our subscribers who are in arrears would make a special effort to pay up. During the summer months our book sales are small, and we hav to depend upon the subscriptions coming in to pay expenses, which are just as heavy now as ever. We know that business generally is dull, that "times are hard," but the amounts are so small individually that it would seem no one can be inconvenienced by paying his dues, while in the aggregate they foot up large, and mean everything to us. It is unpleasant to us to dun our friends, and money is never asked for till imperativly needed; now we must hav it to pay bills with. A good many hundreds of dollars are due on subscriptions, so we are not asking a favor, but simple justice and square dealing between friends. It is usual for papers to exact pay in advance, but we hav never adopted the rule, believing that Liberals are honest enough not to cheat the printer. But the accommodation sorely tries our resources, and the readers ought not to force us to wait longer than they can help.

A Constitutional Crisis in England.

Just now England is in a ferment over the refusal by the House of Lords to read a second time the new franchise bill. Popular meetings are being held, attended by tens of thousands of men, all clamoring for a more liberal franchise act, and denouncing the Lords for standing in the way. The upshot of the tumult will probably be, unless the House of Lords recedes from the position taken, that new Lords favorable to the bill will be created by the Commons, or if not sustained in this, Mr. Gladstone will appeal to the country, and a new election be held.

This new franchise bill would create about two millions of new voters—citizens who hav heretofore borne the burdens of, but had no voice in choosing, the government. The House of Commons is emphatically in favor of the new act, it is championed by the responsible representativ of the crown, and its justness is acknowledged by even the House which has blocked its passage. But the Lords decline to help it along until they shall be satisfied it will not peril their position as the aristocratic clog on the wheels of government. These hereditary rulers are afraid of the two millions of votes they hav disfranchised so long. The contest is, therefore, an effort on their part to preserve their prerogativ—in other words, to stay the tendency towards democracy everywhere visible in England. It is a fight between hereditary and representativ government. Either the ministry and House of Commons must do the bidding of the Lords, and acknowledge the supremacy of the aristocratic principle of government, or the Lords must bow to the will of the representativ House.

In this contest the church has a vital interest. Democracy means disestablishment, and disestablishment means the loss of millions of pounds of revenue per annum to the fat and worthless drones who occupy high official stations by virtue of their own skill, and that of their predecessors, in playing upon the fears of the people. Money for the church is now collected from every rate-payer in England by the state; should the two be separated, the church must beg instead of having it stolen for her. Naturally in this crisis the church is with the Lords.

But neither the church nor the peers will be able to delay for many years the advent of the bright time for England when her government shall be a republic, and her church dependent upon voluntary contributions for support. The Freethinkers of the United Kingdom are pushing ahead to this, and, outside of them, the number in favor of disestablishment is almost a majority, and the advocates of a republic are rapidly increasing. Ten years will witness great changes in England. It is doubtful if the Prince of Wales ever occupies the throne his mother must, in the natural order of things, soon vacate. And Bradlaugh will be the Paine, if not the Washington, of the English republic.

The Mormon Bible.

Richmond, Mo., is a place that has had fame unexpectedly thrust upon it. The cause of its glory is the residence within its limits of David Whitmer, the only surviving member of the combination of what one paper calls fools and knaves who founded the Mormon church. Mr. Whitmer declares that he has in his possession the original manuscript of the Book of Mormon, and several members of that branch of the Mormon church which does not uphold polygamy hav recently called upon him for the purpose of comparing late editions of the book with the so-called original text.

Upon the origin of this Book of Mormon lay authorities very generally agree. It was written by the Rev. Solomon Spaulding, a graduate of Dartmouth College, "who amused himself by composing historical and speculativ romances relating to the origin of the races that formerly inhabited this continent." One of the manuscripts of Mr. Spaulding was surreptitiously obtained by Sidney Rigdon, who took it to Joseph Smith, whose scheming brain devised the monstrous fraud of Mormonism. Smith declared it to be a translation of the gold plates he pretended he had found under the direction of an angel of the Lord, buried in the soil of Ontario county, this state. The manuscript now in the possession of Mr. Whitmer is a copy of this made by Oliver Cowdery, from dictation of Smith, who concealed himself behind a suspended blanket and pretended to translate from his golden plates. Whitmer was such a dupe that when Smith published his book he testified that an angel of God came down from heaven and placed before them the plates of which the book was said to be a translation. The existence of the plates was still further testified to by Christian, Jacob, Peter, and John Whitmer; by Joseph, Hyrum, and Samuel Smith; by Hiram Page, Oliver Cowdery, and Martin Harris; but this last personage, according to a Rev. Dr. Eddy, denied that he had ever seen the plates or made a certificate. The fraud was fully exposed by Mr. Spaulding's relativs, but the exposure was unavailing with the delirious converts. They clung to it as thousands of Christians cling to the Pentateuch as the work of Moses, even though the whole world knows better. The original Book of Mormon denounced polygamy in these words:

"There shall not any man among you hav save it be one wife; and concubines he shall hav none. For I, the Lord God, delighteth in the chastity of women."

This prohibition occurs twice in the same chapter, "Book of Jacob," ii, and polygamy is denounced again in the "Book of Mosiah," vii. All the editions of the Mormon Bible contain these prohibitions, but they are annulled and superseded by a special revelation to Joseph Smith, in 1843, by which plural marriage is enjoined.

Mr. W. H. B., of Washington, whom our readers will hav no difficulty in recognizing, in a letter to the Sun of this city exposes, upon internal evidence, the humbug of the book. He considers only the beginning, but in the first five pages he finds ample reason to condemn the clumsiness of the attempt. The story goes:

Lehi, having incurred the wrath of the Jews, and being in danger of his life, is warned by God in a dream to depart from Jerusalem with his family, consisting of a wife and four sons, the youngest of whom is Nephi. This in the first year of the reign of Zedekiah, the last king of Judah (610–588 B.C.).

The family journey three days in the wilderness, and pitch their tent "by the side of a river of water," "near the mouth thereof," which river, the writer says, his father called "Laman, and it emptied into the Red Sea."

Here the fabricator, comments Mr. Burr, has "given himself away." Aside from the impossibility of a family making a journey from Jerusalem to the Red Sea in three days (the shortest distance to its eastern gulf being 160 miles in a straight line, or to the Gulf of Suez 200 miles), there is no river emptying into the northern section of the Red Sea, nor, indeed, any considerable stream in the southern half.

The Book of Mormon repeats whole chapters of King James's translation of the Bible, with only the slightest variations, caused by careless reading or imperfect memory. Twelve chapters of Isaiah (ii–xiv) are copied out into the second book of Nephi. The entire Sermon on the Mount, with some omissions and additions, is found in the "Book of Nephi, the son of Nephi."

The pretended translator of the mythical plates Mr. Burr finds to hav been a blockhead and a lunatic. The grammar is shocking—for example: "When they had arriven;" "which fleeth from the shepherd and scattereth, and are driven and are devoured;" "should hav wore these bands;" "how had ye ought to;" "neither is there any conditions;" "all mankind which ever were ever since the fall of Adam;" "consider on the blessed state;" "I hav spoken plain:" "whose flames ascendeth;" "with all your whole soul;" "him who has created you and art preserving you;" "had ye not ought to;" "I saw wars and rumors of wars;" "did rebel against us, yea, against I, Nephi and Sam." Hundreds of similar instances might be cited. The story continues that after a few years, and further travel in the wilderness, the family pitched their tents on the shore of a sea which they "called Irreantum, which, being interpreted, is many waters." Here Nephi, with the help of the Lord, built a ship, and using a "compass which had been prepared of the Lord," he navigated the sea. Two of his younger brothers, born in the wilderness, mutinied and bound Nephi; but then the compass ceased to work, and in order to save themselvs from shipwreck they unbound their brother, who took the compass again, and it did work. Nephi also prayed for the storm to abate, and there was a great calm. By-and-by they reached the promised land, where they cultivated the earth with "seeds brought from the land of Jer usalem." They found cows, oxen, goats, asses, horses, and "all manner of wild animals which were for the use of men." There, also, they found gold, silver, and copper ore, out of which Nephi made the plates, and upon these plates he "did engraven the record;" which record, he tells us at the beginning, is "in the language of his father, which consists of the learning of the Jews and the language of the Egyptians."

There is no doubt that such a book needs revising as badly as does the Christian Bible. In fact, the histories of the two books are much alike, except that the authorship of the Book of Mormon is better established, and has never been made the subject of discussion in quite so many councils. But there is no danger of running counter to fact in saying that one contains quite as much truth as the other; that the inspiration of Joe Smith was as real as that of Moses; and that the Bock of Mormon is as much a revelation from God as the Christian scriptures. Christianity has no solider basis than has Mormonism; Christ was no more the Lord's chosen than Joseph Smith; without their St. Pauls and Brigham Youngs, neither would hav been known to-day. Mormonism, however, is valuable as showing how religions grow, and a hundred parallels could be drawn between it and the stupendous system which for fifteen hundred years has beguiled and misguided a large portion of the civilized world. Both are inferior in many ways to pre-existing and contemporary faiths, Christianity, especially, as it existed up to the sixteenth century, being no improvement on the pagan mythology it supplanted. Mormonism omits much of the lasciviousness of the Old Testament, and Smith's subsequent polygamous revelation is no lower than the plain teachings, by permission and practice, of the saints figuring in the "holy" scriptures. Why the Christians should hate the Mormons is incomprehensible to us, unless it be because hypocrits dislike those who practice openly what they only do in private.

Back Numbers Wanted.

To make our files of this year perfect we need a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 5, 1884. Anyone having a copy of that date to spare will greatly oblige by mailing it to this office. In payment the sender may select any ten-cent pamphlet in our catalog. We would also like, on the same terms, a few numbers of March 15, 1884.

Politics.

Lately we hav been the recipient of many inquiries as to the standing of the various political candidates, and for which the Liberals can most consistently vote.

Now, we are not the keeper of men's consciences, do not aspire to dictatorship in politics, and deprecate the efforts in that direction of some of our leaders.

The regularly constituted parties in the field are the Democratic, Republican, Prohibition Home Protection, American Prohibition, National Christian, Anti-Monopoly, Greenback-Labor, and Benjamin F. Butler. The two leading candidates are, of course, Grover Cleveland, and James G. Blaine, representing respectivly the Democratic and Republican office-seekers. The candidates of the other parties, in the order named, are John P. St. John, ex-governor of Kansas, Samuel C. Pomeroy, better known as Old Subsidy Pom., Jonathan Blanchard, and Benjamin F. Butler, who is a candidate of the three last named. Mr. Cleveland is a broad-minded Presbyterian—that is, a Presbyterian who has partially outgrown his creed. He is the man used by the County Democracy wing of the Democrats of this state on account of the immense majority by which he was made governor of the state. His "boss" is Daniel Manning, proprietor of the Albany Argus. This wing is the Protestant branch of the Democracy, and Mr. Cleveland has been the object of much Catholic abuse. This abuse is the result of two vetoes—one of the appropriation of $20,000 for the Catholic Protectory, the other of an item in the supply bill for the special employment and payment of Catholic clergy ministering to convicts in the prisons under the exclusiv control of the state. The reasons for the first veto was that the support of the Protectory was more properly chargeable to New York city, whose juvenil delinquents are sent there, and for the further reason that the grant would tend "to subject the state treasury to demands on behalf of all classes of sectarian institutions, which a due care for the money of the state and a just economy could not concede, and which would yet hav a justification in precedent." If Mr. Cleveland honestly held these views, and has the courage of his convictions, it is surprising he did not veto all the sectarian appropriations, instead of just this extra one for the Protectory! The reason for the second veto is this, as stated by his managers for the campaign: "In all cases of official action concerning charitable or religious bodies, Governor Cleveland has . . . asked, 'What are my powers as the servant and agent of the whole people?' And as a public officer he has felt unable to assent to the disposition of public moneys for any purpose not strictly public." If Mr. Cleveland had always lived up to these words, more religious institutions than the Catholic Protectory would hav gone without their appropriations. Payment of Protestant chaplains in the state prisons is no more a public need than the payment of Catholic clergy. A one-sided record will not suit Liberals. Strict and invariable justness is what is demanded from our rulers, and that would veto every appropriation of money for religious uses. Mr. Cleveland has not been consistent in this, and has shown himself, we think, more anxious to hit the Catholics than to promote state secularization.

Mr. Blaine introduced in 1875 in the House of Representativs a resolution for state secularization. So far as it went it was complete. We hav quoted it twice this year, but it is short, and we will again introduce it:

"No state shall make any law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; and no money raised by taxation in any state for the support of public schools, or derived from any public fund therefor, nor any public lands devoted thereto, shall ever be under the control of any religious sect; and no moneys so raised or lands so devoted shall be divided among religious sects or denominations."

So far as we know all of Mr. Blaine's utterances on this subject hav been in keeping with this resolution. Col. Ingersoll once told Horace Seaver that Blaine was "a thoroughly Liberal-minded man." Information from other sources has convinced us that the Republican candidate is a Freethinker. But—and the "but" in this case is a big one—he is a politician, and knows where the votes are. He permits his organ, the New York Tribune, to make him out a very pious New England Congregationalist, and in his short speech to the notification committee he used the word God as glibly as his pastor could; and his letter of acceptance makes reference to the great care that mythical personage is supposed to exercise over this country. If Mr. Blaine is a Freethinker, he is also a bit of a demagog, and we hav little respect for that kind of people—too little to vote for him. For the sake of popularity and a second term he might extend favors to his country's enemies.

Jonathan Blanchard, the candidate of the National Christian party, is the God-in-the-Constitution man. He is a representativ of his party, and the bare mention of the name is sufficient. No right-minded man, no patriot, will ever vote for a united church and state.

Mr. Pomeroy is the nominee of a party composed of about equal parts of prohibition and God-in-the Constitution. The platform is particularly strong on "Christian morality," and on the principle that a noted drunkard makes a good temperance orator, Mr. Pomeroy poses as the candidate of virtue. His pose is statuesque but very impracticable.

Ex-Gov. John P. St. John is the regular Prohibition candidate. The party platform embraces many good things—the planks on money, public lands, woman suffrage, etc., being just in their outcome, whatever the motiv influencing their insertion—but it, too, is nauseatingly pious. It begins by acknowledging "Almighty God as the rightful sovereign of all men, from whom the just powers of government are derived," and closes by prasing their God "for the presence of his spirit." As the fundamental principle of the American republic is that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, this party is plainly not the one for the suffrages of true American citizens. As Dr. Monroe alliterativly, but pertinently, puts it: "When the battle is between beer and the Bible the sensible moral man can stand aside and let it rage. If to be rid of gin we must embrace Jesus we beg to be excused. A sober community we want to see; but if that sobriety must be bought by a surrender to the church—by the putting of Jehovah in the Constitution—the price is too high, and we cannot purchase."

With the Anti-Monopoly and other reform parties who hav nominated Mr. B. F. Butler, we are heartily in sympathy. But with us state secularization is the paramount issue. It transcends all others in importance, for it is the bedrock on which must rest all just government. These parties hav not seen fit to recognize this claim, and we do not propose to go into their society uninvited. So far they hav given no evidence that they would be more favorable to our purpose than the old organizations. Indeed, Butler's record is more barren of Freethought sentiments than Blaine's or Cleveland's. He belongs to the worldly church—the Episcopal—which is next door to Romanism in forms, if not in faith. But as Butler has not yet accepted their nominations, it may be premature to discuss him as their candidate. He is a party by himself, and if his utterances at the Democratic convention at Chicago are his platform, there is nothing in it to attract Liberals, as such, however much they may sympathize with the reforms he is popularly supposed to represent.

And so, surveying the political field from the elevation of secularization, we see no opening for the Liberal forces. On general principles it is always well to go with the progressionists, if such there be, but it is questionable which is the least desirable—a good candidate of a bad party, or a bad candidate of a good party. In the present mixed state of affairs we see no other way but for each to work and vote according to the best light attainable for his (it ought also to be her) individual self, or join Mr. Tucker's party and refrain from going to the polls. And by-and-by the Liberals will hav strength to form a party with the high aims that actuated the Republicans in the days of Lincoln, or, earlier still, when Jefferson taught the principles of government which hav made his name a synonym for pure democracy, a government of, for, and by the people. There is a wealth of true statesmen in the country, and no lack of work for them to do, but unfortunately they are not in the front, and the work is lost sight of in the scramble for pelf and power.

A Delphic Utterance.

The Radical Review is good enough to observe that "Some of our Liberal contemporaries in the East are already amusing themselvs with suggesting candidates for the offices of the new organization to be formed. Is the politician among even us? It would be now encouraging to note a lively discussion of the principles that are to form the basis of the new Liberal organization. Let us first elaborate such basis, and agree on a plan of action, before we waste much time in praising our friends and commending their election to office. There will be plenty of time for that at Cassadaga Lake. There, we thoroughly agree, it will be a very serious matter not to forfeit the usefulness of the new organization by the election of unfit men to office."

Following, as it does, this paragraph, the foregoing is funny:

"Split up in hostil factions, the Liberals of America hav remained weak, and failed of some of the great aims which it is their special mission to realize. Oppressed by this sense of failure, they are now making efforts to unite and concentrate their forces on the one issue concerning which there is general agreement—state secularization. This movement toward union has won the favor and support of nearly all Liberal journals, as well as of Liberals throughout the country."

If the basis of state secularization has already been agreed upon by nearly all the Liberal journals and prominent Liberals, it would seem that the plan of action is well determined, and that the nomination of officers who will not "forfeit the usefulness of the new organization" is very timely. The action at Cassadaga Lake should be calm, deliberate, and well thought over. The best men for the purposes contemplated should be put in place. In a convention which may be heated, and must be hurried, mistakes can easily be made. Much better is it to discuss all matters beforehand.

Is Mr. Walker Preparing to Secede?

In the latest issue of Lucifer this appears, signed "W.:"

"The latest suggestion from THE TRUTH SEEKER and from Man in regard to the League Congress the coming fall is that it will be held at Cassadaga Lake, New York, immediately following the adjournment of the National Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association. This would be practically a surrender to the latter body, and a verification of my predictions regarding the results of the undue prominence given the society by the eastern Liberals.

"The idea of holding a National Congress or Convention of any kind in New York is absurd. Do New York Liberals imagin that the centers of population and of Radical thought are east of Ohio? Do they hug the delusion that after a state society shall hav, to all practical intents and purposes, absorbed the National Liberal League, we of the West shall maintain our connection with the metamorphosed association in the far East? Has it never occurred to them that it is possible for us to form a Western Freethinkers' Association, or Northwestern and Southwestern Freethought societies? Hav they never heard of the Brotherhood of Humanitarians, with headquarters at Liberal, Mo., which is rapidly spreading and needs but the adherence of Western Leaguers to enable it to smother out every League west of the Mississippi? To be sure, the latter association is slightly indefinit and somewhat namby-pambyish, but this will not be for long, I think, and it is taking hold of educativ, constructiv work with no small degree of vigor and with large promis of success.

"To hold the Congress of the League at Chicago, or Milwaukee, or St. Louis, is no hardship to eastern Liberals. Even then, delegates from west of the Mississippi find their expense bills larger than those of their New York and Massachusetts brethren, while Pacific coast Freethinkers find it almost impossible to get so far east even as the above named cities.

"To sum up all in a word: Do the New York comrades want everything? W."

Bolting is a freeman's right, and is quite the style this summer. Mr. W. has an undoubted right to start all the Western, Northwestern, and Southwestern associations he pleases, and so far as they work for secularization we will help them if we can. But such societies could hardly be called national.

A CORRESPONDENT of a Hoosic Falls paper is traveling West. When he reached Carthage, Mo., he heard of Liberal, and in his letter discourses of that place as follows:

There is a town some forty miles from Carthage that perhaps is worthy of mention. It is the town of Liberal, situated on the Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad, surrounded by rich, rolling prairie, and bountifully supplied with rich gifts of the creator, but, surrounded as they are with every evidence of a supreme grand master, the inhabitants hav boldly stepped out and declared themselvs irrevocably opposed to all sectarian churches and church organizations. They boast with seeming pride that they hav no church, no preacher or priest, and no saloons. They hav no hell, no God, no devil, no debauchery, no drunkenness. They believe in but one world at a time, and a heaven of their own making. Every person is esteemed by his or her mental worth, rather than for the amount of faith he or she may possess. They recognize the nobility of man, woman, and child. They substitute a good hall, with staging and furniture, suitable for amateur plays, for the church, which they use on Sunday nights. They hav lectures for long sermons, reading room and library for saloons, social gatherings instead of prayer-meetings; "The Age of Reason," by Thomas Paine, for the Bible; Ingersoll and his works for Jesus and the New Testament. They hav morality without religion, prosperity without a God, happiness and harmony without the Ten Commandments. They hav become truly Infidelized, and hav built up their town on the principle of manhood without sectarianism, and humanity without superstition. They practice the art of doing good, being happy, industrious, sober, and independent. They hav no short-cuts to glory and flowery beds of ease, but go on the principle that every man shall earn what he gets, and get what he earns. There no man is ostracized on account of his disbelief in any of the popular religions, but it is the worst place in the world for a person to go to lead a profligate and wayward life. Drunkenness and its kindred vices are not tolerated. All the good in man is cultivated, and bad discarded. Such is life in some parts of the "far West."

Letters from Friends.

IS THAT INFIDELITY?

NEWPORT, ME., July 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: If the sentiments advocated by your correspondent George T. Bruce represent Infidelity, then Infidelity and Christianity occupy the same platform, and advocate the same principle, "Believe or be damned." The Christian church need hav no fears of Infidels at present. Comstock, you hav a friend in California. SEWARD MITCHELL.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., July 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please discontinue the notice of the Milwaukee Liberal League, which you hav kindly inserted in your column of "Liberal Meetings" for some months past. We hav adjourned till September 7th next, on account of hot weather, camp-meetings, etc.

Our present League has not only proved a success, but has demonstrated the fact that such a society can be maintained in this city. We had about sixty members, with new accessions at every meeting, and hope when we meet in the fall to swell our numbers to an even hundred.

Who will be the coming president of the National Liberal League? Wakeman can't be beat, but he declines to longer serve. Then let it be Col. R. G. Ingersoll, if he will accept. I know of no one who would be more acceptable to the Freethinkers at large. He is not only a "big gun," but always has plenty of ammunition to fire off. R. A. STUART.

ELMIRA, MICH., June 22, E.M. 284.

MR. EDITOR: I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 21st that Mrs. Severance finds fault with the motto of "One world at a time," and claims that the phenomena of Spiritualism belong to this world's affairs. I believe that all theological men claim the same for theirs. Now, I, being a Materialist and unacquainted with spiritual phenomena, would like to ask him a few questions, which I hope he will kindly answer for my enlightenment. First, in order to retain our identity, we must hav a material form, must we not? If not, how shall we distinguish between two nothings? If the animal, man, retains such identity, does not all matter retain such identity? If so, then what would there be to produce new identities or forms? We, as Materialists, claim that the change called death only changes this form and looses this identity, the matter going back to produce other forms. Death only ends the form, not the material, nor does it set it aside beyond the power of reproduction. It seems to me that such a process would exhaust the material of this world of ours. Will the doctor please answer, and accommodate a Materialist whose motto is "One world at a time?" G. G. GABRION.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., July 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav this moment read Mrs. Juliet H. Severance's "Protest," in your paper of the 19th inst., and I wish to add mine most earnestly. She has expressed my sentiments exactly. No such men as Bundy are wanted in the League. We hav no use for them. When honorable, whole-souled men cannot be found to officer the League, then turn it over to the women. And let me say, right here, that the National Liberal League will never succeed till it does justice to woman.

And now I wish to write upon another subject, so will not "extend remarks," as the preachers say. When THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 28th came to hand with the beautiful engraving of the monument, I resolved that ere the 19th of this month (which was the date of Mr. Bennett's visit here at our home, and which was yesterday) I would forward you money enough to pay the last dollar of indebtedness before the anniversary came again, but by being from home I hav failed to do so, and now if it has not all been contributed please let me know immediately, for I want to, before the Convention and Congress are held, hav it said, "It is complete!" Please notify me, and oblige an ardent friend of D. M. Bennett.

Yours most thoroughly, ABBIE KNAPP.

DIANA, TEX., July 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I will now forward you the petition for state secularization, with one dozen names attached thereto. I regret that I hav not been able to obtain more, as was expected. Some found objections to it and would not sign. Every Freethinker and Liberal throughout the whole country should send up his petition. State secularization is the one thing that is needed. I hav delayed forwarding longer, perhaps, than I should hav done; but I wished to obtain all the names I could before doing so.

I hav been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER nearly two years. I like it better and better, and would not be without it.

I hav been trying to do some missionary work with it, but hav not yet been able to obtain any subscribers. I think it has shocked the faith of some and set them to thinking. The great trouble is getting the people to read and investigate for themselvs. Superstition has been so deeply instilled into some that I fear they will never be able to see the error of their way. Thanks to the genius of the age, error is being exposed and dislodged, and truth is taking its place. Haste, ye wheels of time, and bring the glorious day when one of the most gigantic frauds that was ever known shall be no more. Yours for free speech, free press, complete secularization, and equal tax. J. M. WOODS.

DR. YORK IN MONTANA.

SALESVILLE, MONT., July 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: This distinguished Freethought lecturer has been delivering a series of lectures to crowded houses in Bozeman during the last week, and expects to continue this week. I had the pleasure of meeting him and hearing too. I found him to be a nice gentleman and a good speaker. He handles his subject well. The editor of the foremost paper in Bozeman said to me that he done better than Henry Ward Beecher did when he was here, whom they paid five hundred dollars for one lecture. And I am frank to say I believe the editor is right. So Liberals need not hav any fears when Dr. York is coming that he will fail. Let Liberals write him, for he is as good as any you hav anywhere.

Well, in our little school here we hired a nice young Christian lady from the East to teach for us. The first thing she did was to open school by reading the Bible and prayer. The Christians were well pleased, and soon began to whisper around of me, "What will he do?" I waited patiently for two weeks, when I copied the Montana school law and sent it to her. That ended the good Christian services. The good lady said that was the first time she knew it was contrary to law to pray in Montana. My good Christian neighbors were horrified that the law of Montana was such, and that any poor devil would object.

Now let our friends throughout this territory of Montana see that no public school uses the Bible, for it is contrary to law. DR. W. J. STOVER.

MR. EDITOR: I am just in receipt of C. Garwood's report of the fund to procure for old man Hasket a hundred dollars' worth of bees, that are believed to be sufficient to enable him from this time to earn his own living, and it seems that after two months' trial he has not been able to procure them—that out of thousands of what are called Liberals just eighteen hav responded. These hav done well enough, but there are not enough of them. Now I wish to speak in language not to be misunderstood. I would not giv one damn for a million of such sham Liberals. If they hav no better love of suffering humanity than that, all their professions are nothing but bosh, and they would disgrace the devil's frying-pan. I promised in the beginning that if the sum was not made up I would try again, and I shall, but if the Infidels don't rush to the front and permanently help that man I shall never pay one dollar in any shape into any Infidel institution or charity, or for any Liberal paper, lecture, or book, or for any similar purpose; but I will be a miserable, mean, avaricious hog, and hoard up every cent that I can lay my hand on to keep me in old age; for that is just the way these Infidels will treat me in my necessity. It is with the most terrible feelings that I write this, for I hav carefully, for long years, watched the illiberality of self-styled Liberals. If to help the poor is not the first article in any creed or belief, I care not to hear any other thing its supporters hav to say. GEO. W. CHAPMAN, M.D.

MT. VERNON, IND., June 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.00 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Remember I am slightly in arrears.

Ideas on different subjects crowd on me so quickly that I hardly know what to write first. Thanks to Mr. Hacker and other Infidel agitators, Congress has at last begun to make land-robbers disgorge. I see the growing popular sentiment is even echoed in the National Republican platform.

If Mr. Talmage means to say that previous to 1870 Spiritualism caused more insanity than religion, I wish to say, on my own responsibility, that he is an ignoramus or a liar. In proof of this I will trot out some figures. Just watch and see if they don't "work like niggers." Quoting from the official reports of the Pennsylvania Insane Hospital, I find that from the year 1841 to 1847 the institution had 3,041 inmates. 189 of them, or more than one-twentieth of the entire number, were insane from religious excitement. Cases caused by Spiritualism—0,000. In the Longview Lunatic Asylum, of Ohio, of 2,305 patients received up to date of report in 1870, 36 men and 57 women were suffering from religious excitement. Victims of Spiritualism—none. In the Northern Ohio State Lunatic Asylum, during the years 1858, 1862, 1865, 1868, and 1869, 764 patients were received, of whom 35 suffered from the religious craze. Spiritualism is here charged with 5 cases. Out of many such reports now in my possession I giv only one more extract. The report of the Central Ohio Lunatic Asylum for 1865 states that from 1839 to 1865 3,583 patients had been received. Christianity had made 354 of them crazy; Spiritualism, none. CHAS. O. ROWE.

BENTON, TEX., July 26, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Messrs. Putnam's and Chainey's able discourses which appeared recently in THE TRUTH SEEKER show those gentlemen worthy of any positions the honorable body of Freethinkers may bestow upon them. With such officers, and also many others able and willing to assist in leading our worthy cause, only proper co-operation and reorganization by the Liberals in every part of our country is necessary to insure our cause to succeed and its strength to be felt in the near future. To that extent politicians will pay respect to our demands, and priestcraft will no longer feel that it only holds the lines of power in this country—that was intended by its framers to be a free land instead of a church despotism, which it is fast drifting to now. I consider the work before us second to none in the history of this so-called free America; not even in independence declaration days, for if let alone it will soon drift into a far worse monarchy than when under England's rule. The fears that Franklin, Paine, and others of those days expressed seem really to be now fast realized. I fully agree with Mr. Putnam in advising no concessions, or swerving from our true cause and duty to please the fancies and quibbles of any set. As he says, we desire all the aid we can get honorably, but to make concessions of what we know to be right, to side with any form of superstition, would add no moral strength, in my opinion, to our side. We would only be giving them a cudgel to flail us with. I can see not a particle of difference in this ghost-belief business. It is all a huge humbug. When a human being dies, he is very dead, and no raps or noises are ever made by him or her afterward. It is strange to me that Spiritualists deny the truth of the Bible, and yet often quote from it to prove the ancient beliefs in ghost stories. The only difference I can see between them and Christians is that the latter believe the spirit goes somewhere beyond the moon and stars, where heaven they say is located; the former that the spirits float around in the air amongst us, and can be called up, as a drove of pigs is fed, and reviewed by certain ones at their will. One is about as foolish as the other, and no really sane man, I think, believes in either.

Yours for solid facts, and success for our cause,

H. B. JONES.

AURORA, OHIO, July 27, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I was somewhat flattered with hopes when I became a life member of the Liberal League that a new republic might spring into existence. But I found that I was not yet through with disappointments, and the invitation is now to meet at Cassadaga and "deal" anew. It is admissible to deal over sometimes after mistakes, if the parties wish to continue the game.

In my long acquaintance with THE TRUTH SEEKER and its patrons, I hav learned that there is a great variety of opinions, social, political, and religious, among Liberals. With many I stand in about the same relation as I do with church-members. With them, I am wanting in faith, and when I find one as faithless as myself, he is perhaps looking at me across a political gulf.

It does not look encouraging, but if well shuffled up we may get a new trump, and new hands; and this does not avoid every difficulty, since in games somebody is always to be beaten, and in our case success is for all.

I think of going to Cassadaga and trying a rubber in a fair, gamey way, and if my partners do not like me there is plenty for me to do at home in the future.

As to a new name, let me suggest, "The New Republic." This squints politically in time—so much the better—Jeffersonward.

I discover that you hav made some use of "The New Theology," by the Rev. George G. Lyon, in the Popular Science Monthly. Every Sunday I hav the pleasure of hearing him, and it is useful to listen to a large-minded man. He is trying to dress up the old theology so as to make it more acceptable to modern taste. His "New Theology," however, if joined with our "New Republic," would make a union of church and state noways alarming. N. EGGLESTON.

PROVIDENCE, ARK., July 20, 1883.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a reader of your paper from time to time for several years, my father, J. Petty, of LaCrosse, Wis., being one of your correspondents, and sending me a copy now and then. You advocate the principles that I like, and as I had but little Sunday-school nonsense rubbed into me while young, I am very stubborn in my way of thinking.

I hav always tried to avoid crowding my views upon anyone, but being a school-teacher, I am compelled to express myself in a manner which clearly shows my disbelief in that relic of barbarism, the Bible.

Almost every lesson in the natural sciences will bring up the subject in some shape or other. A preacher picked up A. J. Davis at my boarding-house, and declared from the pulpit that I was an Infidel, and warned the people not to send their children to me for instruction. Yet, in spite of his denunciation, my qualifications as an instructor gave me a fair patronage.

I hav been tormented with questions, and discussions hav been forced upon me—not for the purpose of finding facts, but faults—until I am ready to sacrifice my property, and everything but my opinions, to seek a more favorable location.

I know that there are thousands to-day who are in the same condition, and who can sympathize with me. My object in making this statement is that you may print it in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so that all Liberal-minded people may communicate with me in regard to making my home and following my profession among them, untrammeled and free from prejudice.

I hav a good education, a fine set of philosophical apparatus, and quite a respectable library. I am unmarried, in fine health, and in the prime of my usefulness, but prefer teaching school to following any other vocation.

Anyone knowing where I can find an opportunity of building up a good institution of learning with a reasonable hope of success will oblige me by writing to me at Providence, Searcy Co., Arkansas. D. L. PETTY.

July 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Since sending you names of persons whom I thought likely to subscribe for your paper I hav each time eagerly looked at the signatures of the correspondents and also the headings, in hopes of seeing a name I had sent you, but either you hav not yet come to my list or the stupidity upon the religious question prevents their subscribing—or some of the many other obstacles.

Six dollars' worth of Liberal documents, purchased last December, hav enabled my imbecil Infidel cerebrum to accomplish one task of which I am proud. A cousin who has long been contemplating the missionary field, and who for several years did missionary work at home, a most worthy lady and devoted friend, had vowed that she "would never read any of Ingersoll's works," and up to this spring had been true to her word, when we again chanced to meet and the subject again arose concerning the foreign missions. Little by little I inculcated my ideas of Infidelity, till she consented to read—seeing that she was mistaken in her supposition that we were insincere in our statements. Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses," his "Interviews on Talmage," and a goodly number of Liberal tracts, also Gibbon's "History of Christianity," hav placed her where I myself am—among the Atheists.

I talk only to my most trustworthy friends—those who know my daily walks and whom I know will shield from publicity my standing should they not themselvs be converted.

Next week I shall send you another order for books, but can only buy a few. Money with me is a rarity. However, my bills you will never find standing. I pay as I go, and go as I get paid. I am now wishing the address of some manufacturer of photographer's supplies—Infidel prefered. I only wish equipments for taking "tin-types," or pictures on a tin plate, for a traveling car, and in the spring I anticipate huckstering in groceries and working at the cheese business until I get enough money to complete my education. If you can giv me the address of a wholesale grocery house, also, you will be doing a favor. However, it is the photographic supply manufacturer which is now most needed. I want Infidels if you can find them without inconvenience to yourself, and I should hold before each Liberal the necessity of encouraging his Liberal friends in preference to Christians—even to discommodity. The reason is obvious. All I ask you to publish is the addresses of those two business houses, and by doing so you will not only do a favor for which I am thankful, but advance the cause, as each Infidel helped givs an impetus to the cause, and we are eager that the cause advances.

Very kindly yours, R. A. CHAR.

[We know of no Freethinkers engaged in the businesses mentioned; but E. and H. S. Anthony, 591 Broadway, dealers in photographic supplies, and Austin, Nichols & Co., cor. Jay, Hudson, and Staples sts., wholesale grocers, are reliable and worthy firms, and considerably patronized by Freethinkers.—ED. T. S.]

CARTHAGE, Mo., July 3, 284.

MR. EDITOR: After three months' trial subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I feel that it is as indispensable to me as the blood of Christ is to the Christian, and a good deal more useful. As long as I am able to scrape up a dollar or two you can count on me as one of the regulars in the line of your subscribers. I am poor physically and financially, but rich in mental freedom from gods and devils, and the creeds and isms of superstition. One dollar is my pile now, so date my subscription as far ahead as it will pay for, and by that time I may earn a few more cart-wheel "In-God-we-trust's," and thus swap my trust in God for a better trust in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I see in your "ANNUAL" that we are credited with a Liberal League at this place. We had one here about four years ago, but it died of chronic formality and dry rot. We had members of ability—in fact, the best brains and morality in town—but a few dudes and dudesses who had part control were too timid about hurting the feelings of their Christian friends to take an aggressiv course, hence the earnest Liberals got disgusted, and it collapsed. We hav a good many Liberals here, but too many of them are moral cowards and stand in awe of that miserable ogre, popularity, and are but little help to our cause.

It was my misfortune to hav to spend last summer in the little, rusty, moth-eaten village of St. Johns, Ohio. An orthodox friend of mine had heard that I was an Infidel, and the first chance he got when there was a crowd in front of the post-office he bounced me on religion, and I tell you it was just fun, for me at least. For I always am outspoken and in earnest on politics and religion, and some of the most pious of them had to leave the crowd, while the others stood around with open mouths and horrified faces, for lo! I was the first real live Infidel they had ever seen, and they were disappointed that I did not hav cloven feet, horns, and the other trimming they suppose belongs to the devil. I tried to get a chance at their parson, but he avoided me as he would a pestilence. I had a standing challenge out to debate with anyone who would accept, but alas! I had to bottle up my thunder. No one felt like taking up the cross to fight for Jesus. I did some good, however, for I sowed the seeds of doubt in several minds, and when they begin to doubt they soon grow into Freethought.

I want to send you a few items before long concerning some of God's soul-insurance agents, the preachers. I will send you a few names of Freethinkers who might subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER if you would send them sample copies.

Wishing you success, I am, Fraternally yours,

WATSON HESTON.

ST. CATHERINES, ONT., July 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It is to be hoped that you hav no more such letters as Fred. Cooke's in the last TRUTH SEEKER. He commences all right, and gets on well, till he presumes to feel sorry for Elliott Preston and Mattie C. Mitchell, who require no sorrow from him or anyone else. They are sound to the core every time. He says vivisection may be wrong, but he does not think the doctors use unnecessary cruelty. He says they need practice to get nerve for man's benefit. If that is his opinion of the practice of vivisection, I do not think much of it. If those who attempt the practice of surgery require to perpetrate such cruelty upon dumb animals as is known to be perpetrated in the practice of vivisection to get nerve for man's benefit, they had better leave it alone. If nature has not given them nerve enough to pursue such business properly, it would be better for all concerned if they would pass out into the country and till the soil for a living. What say you, friends Elliott and Mitchell?

Then notice his remarks upon the liquor business. He says, "I don't use liquor, but sincerely hope those inflammatory prohibitionists will use more cold language. It is only brutes that use whisky." He says that during our long winters the saloon is a great help to our poor who cannot obtain work, and cabins and wood are very scarce for many an honest workman. They get light, warmth, and reading for nothing, hundreds of them. And all this, he says, must be stopped to save a few chronic drunkards. The saloon is all right, if used right.

Now, who ever heard such reasoning upon the liquor question. All this to "save a few chronic drunkards"—when there are millions of them—not one of which, I presume to say, would be guilty of reasoning so foolishly. "The saloonkeepers are very kind to the poor during our long winters." Query: Who pays for the whisky in the meantime, and where does the money come from, and who feeds the wife and children?

In his wind-up he puts me in mind of a youth I once heard of, who penciled up a picture for a dog, and when done, fearing it would not be recognized, he wrote underneath it, "This is a dog." He says, "I hav no education, no brains." He didn't need to speak of that, for anyone who may read his epistle would infer that at once.

The communications from Albert Chavannes and Wm. Watson are good, and written in a style easily to be understood.

C. B. THOMPSON.

SEATTLE, WY. T., July 13, E.M. 284.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of July 5th is an article on woman suffrage. Wyoming territory is not given credit, as it seems to me it should hav been, for having granted to its women the right of suffrage. If I may again be allowed space in your valuable paper, I shall be happy to giv some testimony in regard to the result.

Women hav been empaneled upon the grand and petit juries all over the territory, and the highest eulogiums of praise hav been accorded them, by both bench and bar, for the uniform good judgment and conscientious manner in which they hav performed such duty. Your correspondent has the honor of being a member of the grand jury in Seattle at the next term of court. And I wish to testify that I fail to see why an ordinarily intelligent woman is not as competent to perform the jury duty as the ordinarily intelligent man. And I believe women on the juries are necessary to purify and elevate the machinery of the courts.

It is necessary before a municipal election in this territory to hav a registration of voters. We are to hav an election here in Seattle to-morrow (the 14th) for city officers. Seven hundred women hav registered. This year, for the first time in the history of Seattle, a mass convention was called for the purpose of nominating a ticket. A platform was adopted demanding a strict and rigid enforcement of the city ordinances and laws, and required that the candidates should be honest, efficient, and sober men.

Women hav from the first taken an activ part in the campaign, and hav called down some insults on their devoted heads from those who are opposed to law and order, but many of us hav been glad that this opposition has formed a part of the issue, because it has thereby spurred many lukewarm women to action, and aroused the chivalry of hosts of good men, and brought them to the front as agitators of all that is best in politics.

I am proud to say that this year our officers are the servants of the women citizens of the territory as well as the men, and that we, the women, are in a position to demand the strict enforcement of the law, and as nearly all the laws that are violated are those regulating the liquor traffic and its accompanying evils, we are earnestly working to elect men who will carry out our wishes in this respect.

To conclude, I, with thousands of others who hav felt the shackles of inequality lifted from our shoulders, could not be induced to remove and exchange our freedom from this territory to any state in the Union. We feel grief and pity for our sisters all over the land who are yet in bondage.

Yours for equality, LAURA E. HALL.

BRANDON, July 17, 284.

MR. EDITOR: We hav quite a number of Freethinkers here, but very few dare come out and state their honest opinions, for fear of wounding the feelings of Christian friends and injuring their own business. You can't blame those who depend for their living on the public for keeping their belief to themselvs, for they hav wives and children to support.

If the truth were known, we hav but very few of those who may be classed as intellectual who really believe in the orthodox faith out and out. They are not believing much in the hell doctrin, and this is but the entering of the thin end of the wedge that is to upset the whole fabric of the Christian superstition.

We hav all the leading denominations here, and it is a heavy tax on the community to support them all. The churches are well attended simply because there are no other places where the people can see and be seen. The ladies are the mainstay of the churches. They attend church as a matter of course, and the gentlemen follow just on their account.

We hav some good Liberal papers in this province, and the first and foremost is the Winnipeg Siftings, which strikes right and left at every form of rascality. It fairly whipped Professor Bryce on the observance of Sunday. The professor was horrified at the idea of excursions on Sundays, and went after all the editors for advocating such sinful recreations, as if they knew nothing about what they were writing about. The Free Press argued strongly for Sunday excursions, and had the best of the argument with Puritan Bryce, but the Siftings showed him up in his true light. Of course it would hav been against the interests of the Presbyterian church to sanction Sunday excursions, and it is this selfish motiv that the professor had in view when he came out in the press against such a movement.

The most of our editors are really at heart Freethinkers, and are as Liberal as they dare be at this present moment. The time is soon coming when they will be able to write as they think, and then orthodoxy will be strangled.

I take a deep interest in your presidential election. I would like well to see Cleveland elected, and the Liberals should unite in supporting him, for they can expect fully as much good from the Democrats as from the Republicans; if so just giv them a trial. The Republicans hav had their own way too long.

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER all manner of success, I remain

Yours for the truth, D. MCMILLAN.

GRASS VALLEY, July 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of June 28th you publish a letter from Mr. Corey, of New Haven, Conn., in which he denounces Mr. Lewis as a fraud and humbug. Now, Mr. Lewis is an old subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and you hav advertised his publication, which is really a work of merit. He has been editor and proprietor of a newspaper for many years, and claims to be an honorable man, and such a charge against him naturally hurts. He is at present just recovering from a long fit of sickness, and is not able to speak for himself. I trust you will publish the accompanying letter to Corey and thus giv an injured party a chance for defense.

AN OPEN LETTER TO C. W. COREY.

Sir: Your letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER denouncing S. G. Lewis, of Grass Valley, will, if allowed to go unquestioned, do wrong and injustice to a very worthy man. Neither "fraud" nor "humbug" is a word that can be truthfully applied either to Mr. Lewis or his publication. I feel qualified to speak in this matter, for I set the type for printing the leaflets, and am the author of one of the papers they contain. I know that much of the matter in them was never before in print. In the first place, you mistake the number of the pages. There are twenty-four pages, containing the choicest thoughts of the best writers on the sex question, carefully selected by Mr. Lewis and arranged in paragraphs, numbered so as to be readily referred to in his private correspondence with those who seek his advice and instruction. The leaflets were not at first designed for public circulation, but the flattering reception they hav met from intelligent men and women has induced the publisher to giv them a wider circulation. One lady in Michigan writes that she has been studying this subject sixteen years and finds a clearer light in these few pages than ever found before. She says she considers them worth a dollar a page, and orders a dozen copies to distribute among her friends. Several public speakers buy in large quantities and keep them for sale. I certainly think that had you read the tracts candidly you would hav found value received for your money. If not, then it must be because you know so much already that further study is for you superfluous. There are always a few such wise persons in every community. Their words do little harm where they are known, but published in THE TRUTH SEEKER they may, like thistle down carried by the wind, finally lodge where they will do mischief.

It may be true that most people would prefer them in pamphlet form, and they will very soon appear in that shape, when I will send you another copy. RACHEL CAMPBELL.

CAWKER CITY, KAN., July 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Some one—perhaps the author, the good old man, Lewis Masquerier—has sent me a pamphlet on "Sociology, or the Scientific Reconstruction of Society, Government, and Property." I suppose this comes in consequence of a short article in THE TRUTH SEEKER to friend Hacker on the "home question;" and I suppose I am expected to say something about it, or get converted to it and start to liv it out. The first is all I can do. I can giv my opinion of it, but to liv it out is impossible. It is strictly scientific, and I can't be that. Why, if I were to liv a life of strict scientific precision, I should be of no more use than one of a set of mathematical instruments, and would make no more progress.

To be happy, I must make some mistakes, and then take pleasure in correcting them. I must notice the ignorance and mistakes of others, and set them a better example; but, above all, I must add to my conduct scientific principles slowly, as necessity and capacity present themselvs. In short, I must act myself. I hav no doubt that Sir Isaac Newton, two hundred years ago, made and published most valuable discoveries in the sciences, useful to me, as to all other men; but alas! I am ignorant of them, and hav neither time nor capacity to learn them; so I must be content with the little good that comes to me through others who hav learned and do apply them. I think it quite reasonable that the land could be so divided that all should hav some, or at least a claim to some, and that the rules of geometry could be used to make the road to the market shorter, as also to the school and the church, but I know that if I were to start out with a license to pick my men and women to commence with, having the mental capacity to carry out such a scheme, my life would be gone before I could find fifty such individuals. And still the principle may be true, but it is applicable only to a people more advanced than the present.

A few years since a society of Grangers, with lots of economic truths, was started here, but it was very soon a complete failure. The people were intelligent enough, but not honest, and the very idea of economy collected the most avaricious men. The chief of the society here killed his neighbor to get 160 acres of land, when he had twice that amount already, and is now in state prison for life for the crime. The finest of closet-concocted theories are fallacious when put in practice. When Herbert Spencer was in New York, he was asked what was his opinion of the future of America, and he said he was not able to take in all the factors in the case, consequently could not make a reliable prediction. This is just what is the matter with all our social reformers—they cannot take in all the factors in the case. But nevertheless it is best to try. Man is progressiv. Just now I think of a little piece of my own history in that line. About forty years ago a Vermont school-teacher, then in Canada, spoke in eulogistic terms of George Combe's "Constitution of Man." This title seemed queer to me, as I knew of nothing but man's physical constitution, and not much of that; but by a friend going to Cincinnati I procured one. This friend was a Scotchman, a Presbyterian, dyed in the wool; but he read it before he gave it to me, and remarked that he thought these books led to Infidelity. I did not scare, but after reading of natural laws I could not comprehend them, and I most sincerely wished that without being a criminal I could be sent to prison to hav a chance to completely master that book. So it was laid on the shelf for about six or seven years. During this time I had done considerable promiscuous reading, and by some chance that I do not now remember I took up the book. And now I understand it as easily as a school primer, and from that day to this I hav measured all things by the natural laws first taught me by that Infidel book. So by this experience I think it reasonable that our mutual friend's books on Sociology may yet lead men to the truth. But just now there are hungry, homeless people, and it is a duty we all owe to the world at large to do our best to help them; and at another time I will try to offer a few hints on that question.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

Loving Hands.

Loving hands, wee, chubby fingers,
From yon cradle stretched to me,
Dearer far than gems or silver,
Make me more than king to be.

What were wealth of "all the Indies,"
If of love, and thee, bereft?—
Not within life's glowing quiver
One bright, golden arrow left.

What were scenes of pomp and splendor,
Where the servil knee might bow,
To the flood of fond affection
Whelming all my being now?

O my son! where thou art sleeping,
With thy blue-veined lids shut fast;
Fancy weaves her web of wonders
In my brain—too fair to last.

I can see thee grown to boyhood,
With a mind beyond thy task;
Draining draughts of purer knowledge
Learning in truth's light to bask.

Loving hands! And now I press them,
While the tears fall thick and fast;
For our country needs my soldier,
And this look may be my last.

Loving hands! From fields of glory,
Where thy name hath now renown,
Comes the long-expected letter
To thy far-off nativ town.

Loving hands hav penned its pages,
'Pon the ghastly field of death,
Where full many a gallant warrior,
Yielded up his latest breath.

"General" now; and men are asking
Whence hath come their chosen chief;
And the nation's eyes are on thee,
With a truthful, high belief.

War hath furled her bloody standard,
But, within the people's heart,
Thou hast won a place enduring,
And must play the statesman's part.

Crown'd with honors, then, I see thee
In the nation's forum stand;
High among their lofty leaders—
'Mid the magnates of the land.

Thus I muse, till fitful fancy
Peoples all this shadow'd room
With thy bright, unclouded future
(For I reck not of the gloom).

Loving hands! If death but spare them,
They shall all my care repay;
And my age shall be transfigured,
Gazing on thy glad young day.

Loving hands and hearts about me,
As life's day draws nigh its close;
To the last shall bloom the lily—
To the last shall blush the rose.

Leaving the Old Home.

When we were told that the next day we were to move to our new house near the village, the news was received with great delight by us children.

As I ran eagerly from place to place collecting my toys and playthings, that I knew would be left behind unless I got them secreted in some of the large boxes that were being packed with things of which mine were miniature representativs, there would come over me feelings of sadness, especially on visiting the spring, walking down its well-beaten path, where I might come no more; passing the old tree with the rope swing still hanging there, where so often my pulses had been made to thrill with that joy only known to childhood's happy hours.

Thence I ran into the garden to take a last look at the flowers that I had tended with much care, and it seemed to me they turned their sweet faces to me for a farewell kiss, as I bent down and pressed them to my lips; while tears gathered in my eyes as I saw my mother from the window observing me, when I asked permission to take some pink roots and violets with me, which she readily granted.

Soon I had these and other things of ours stowed away in the capacious wagon now about to start for our new home.

On going out, I looked back at the house, and the windows stripped of their curtains stared upon me like eyes glazed in death, and the stillness of a graveyard rested on all around, when, as we moved on, old Chanticleer, whose clarion notes had so often aroused me from my morning slumbers, flew upon the fence and gave us a parting salute.

Near the road where we passed along was our play-house with its little mud chimney, where we had made pies and cakes of fairy-like dimensions, and the pieces of broken crockery were still upon the tiny shelves. Again I felt the tears start, but, like those of children in general, they were soon dried by the new scenes presented along the road as we proceeded on our journey.

For many months, and even years, the scenes of the old home would come back to me in memory and in dreams, ere I had learned the deeper lesson that life had more of sorrow than of joy.

Years rolled on, and, though not many miles distant, I only revisited the old home once more, when I was about to leave for another clime, perhaps never to return. I went alone to this, to me, hallowed spot. No one had lived there for years; its solitude was unbroken, save by the singing of the birds and the twittering of the chimney-swallows.

It was in the early summer, all nature looked lovely and full of joyous life, and I could almost hav persnaded myself that I had but awakened from a troubled dream to find myself a happy child again, had it not been for the tall grass waving around the doorsteps and in the beaten path.

I first went to the spring, and it was with some difficulty I found it, for the large log that was wont to lie partly over it had rotted away, and the elder bushes that used to shade it were gone, letting in the burning rays of the sun, that had well-nigh dried it up, and I could hardly believe that the little insignificant pool before me was once the deep water I used to gaze down into with awe, and watch the little "peters" run about upon its smooth surface.

I pushed aside the rank weeds that grew upon its margin, and stooped down and drank a last draught from its pure waters. I then went to the house, no one having lived in it for years, and succeeded, after a time, in opening the door, which grated upon its rusty hinges, reverberating through the empty halls and chambers with a sad, hollow sound, which, with the stillness that reigned around and within, quite over powered me. I seated myself in an old chair wherein my grandmother used to sit and tell us children fairy tales, that made the earth more beautiful than when stripped of this pleasing illusion—for it was with pain that I learned, in after years, that the little fairy only existed in the imagination.

While sitting there alone, looking around upon the floor, walls, and ample fire-place, I thought of the winter evenings, of the happy faces that once clustered there about its bright hearth. I went out, feeling that our homes here are but "wayside inns" along the journey of life. Luna Hutchinson.

Our Puzzle Box.

REBUS.

Five letters do my mystic name compose,
Which anyone by study can disclose.
My one, by itself, I plainly see,
Is worth a hundred times my number three.
My last is ten times more than my third,
But, stranger still, in England I hav heard
That my fifth weighs a fraction of a ton,
And is worth a dozen score of number one.
My fourth ranks far below the rest,
But for everyday use is much the best.
Still, when for downright comfort you reckoned,
You always wanted several of my second.
Now when you guess my name, you will find
That my existence is "all in your mind."

A Remarkable Number.

The discussion which has taken place with respect to the remarkable properties of the figure 9 givs interest to the following communication, published in one of the daily papers:

Attention was drawn in the newspapers, two or three years ago, to some of the singular qualities of the number 142,857. It was then pointed out that this number, when multiplied by any figure up to 6, reproduces its own digits, the results being successivly (2) 285,714, (3) 428,571, (4) 571,428, (5) 714,285, and (6) 857,142. When 7 is the multiplier the result is 999,999. This, I think, is as far as the investigation went at the time. It has since occurred to me to experiment further, and I multiplied by all the numbers up to 45, and then by various higher numbers. This led to the following observation: If the digits of any multiple of 142,857 be separated into sets of six, measured from the right hand, and these sets of six be added together, the final result will always reproduce the original digits, unless 7 be a factor, in which case the final result will always be 999,999. An example will illustrate this: Let us multiply 142,857 by 1,373,625. The result is 196,231,946,625. Separating into sets of six, and adding 196,231 to 946,625, we hav 1,142,856, which by the same operation becomes 142,857. But if we multiply by 1,373,624, which has 7 as a factor, the result is 196,231,803,768, and the addition of the two sets of six digits produces 999,999. I hav raised the original number as high as the twelfth power, producing a row of 62 figures. The observation is uniformly true up to this point, and presumably so ad infinitum.

The factors of the number 142,857 are 3 x 3 x 11 x 13 x 37. They may be re-arranged for convenience of multiplying, as, 11 x111 x 117. The six digits themselvs can be placed at the points of a hexagon, and it will be found that the "results" already spoken of always preserve the hexagonal order, though one or other digit may take the lead. There is probably a number of eight digits which can be arranged at the points of an octagon with similar or more surprising phenomena. Has such a number been discovered? Perhaps some of our mathematicians can pursue the inquiry.

Correspondence.

Bishop Creek, Cal., July 15, 284.

Miss Susan H. Wixon, Dear Editress: I send you a piece or two for the Children's Corner of The Truth Seeker, and will contribute more from time to time. I wish to make a suggestion, that the best articles of this juvenil department be selected, and be put into a first and second reader for schools, that the children of Liberals may hav some better food for thought and instruction than what is contained in many of the school-books now extant.

Yours, L. Hutcheson.

[In reply to the above, and also to similar suggestions, we would say that there is a probability that the stories and sketches which hav appeared in the Children's Corner will shortly be gathered together, and presented to the public in book form. We hav long been of the opinion that books and newspapers of a high moral tone, introducing current topics of general interest, should be read in our public schools in place of the stereotyped "reader." We may not hope such recognition for our forthcoming volume, but we trust it will find a hearty welcome in many homes and by many firesides.—Ed.]

Cleveland, Ohio, July 18, 1884.

Dear Miss Wixon: I am twelve years old. I am a boy, and I hav just got a new bicycle. It goes like blazes and can outrun my uncle's horse Jim. My mother is dead, but I hav a father and one sister, Hannah. I had another sister, Lucy, but she died with the canker-rash—or measles, I forget which. I am going to New Hampshire, pretty soon, next month, and you bet I shall hav fun catching brook trout. Perhaps I will send you some in a box. Hannah says some red raspberries or maple sugar would be more appropriate; so look out for berries and sugar in about two weeks or so. I think you are real good, Miss Wixon, to make such a nice Children's Corner. Hannah says you are splendid, and so does father. He says he would rather see you then anybody else he knows of. Yours truly, Roland L——.

P.S.—When you get the raspberries and sugar, you will know it is from me. R. L.

Scientific Proofs of Two Primordial Principles—Conscious and Unconscious Elements—Comprising the Universe; consequent Materiality of Mind, and Dynamic Will-Force for Potential Laws; and so of Intelligent Creation of Phenomena from Coeval Unconscious Matter; with Necessary Origin of Finite Minds and their Immortality. By Charles E. Townsend. 16mo, cloth, pp. 288. New York: Published at the Truth Seeker office.

The author of this volume suddenly deceased in September last, shortly after having read and corrected the proof-sheet of its last pages. Until 1848 he was activly engaged in business in New York city, where by industry and strict integrity he acquired an independent fortune, and in that year retired, with the intention, afterward fully carried out, of devoting his time to his favorit studies, which were wholly of a metaphysical class. The result of those studies was the adoption by him of the doctrin set forth in the essays forming this book, some of which hav been given to the public in periodicals, while many are here for the first time published, the leading points of which are so fully stated in the title above given that we need not repeat them. He believed the proofs of the truth of the doctrin he advanced on a new basis of scientific analogy and induction to be "opposed to all inadequate Atheism, or know-nothing Agnosticism," and a rational substitute for all mystical Theism.—Banner of Light.

COL. KELSO'S BOOK.

From the Sunday Gazetteer.

A few weeks ago the Gazetteer, in a brief notice, acknowledged the receipt of Col. Kelso's latest book, entitled, "The Bible Analyzed." We hav not had time to peruse the whole book carefully, but hav examined it enough to discover that its pages are full of solid facts, and the logic of the hard-fisted order, that downs sophistry every blow. We find the following notice of this handsome volume in the San Francisco Universe, which givs a general idea of its character:

"'The Bible Analyzed' is the title of a new work by Col. John R. Kelso, whom we are proud to claim as a Californian. Col. Kelso is the author of two other works which hav attracted the attention of Rationalists and Christians. The volume before us is a book of 821 pages, has a copious index, and is embellished by a portrait of the author, which is decidedly military in its contour. We hav read with care 'The Bible Analyzed,' and pronounce it to be an honest work. The 'sacred volume' is subjected to a severe criticism, and from its own pages are given positiv proofs of its fallible origin. We hav always looked upon the Bible as being of human origin, a record of the heroic Jewish race, a truthful picture of the faults and failings of the 'chosen people' who are of us and amongst us for all time. If any man thinks that the Bible is aught else let him peruse this work. We hav had occasion to criticise, in a severe manner, the former works of Col. Kelso, but in this, his later effort, there is a seriousness and dignity worthy of a man who tries to dethrone myths consecrated in the hearts of millions. The work is published in fine style, and is from the printing-press of The Truth Seeker Publishing Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York City."

Col. Kelso makes one statement in a way that would convey the impression that the author was writing with the historical evidence before him, but which we hav never been able to authenticate to our satisfaction, although we are aware that Paine and Robert Taylor both make similar assertions. We allude to the statement that at the memorable council of Nice, in the fourth century, the New Testament canonical writings were selected by vote of the council. We should be pleased if Col. Kelso would giv his historical authority for this statement. We do not wish to be understood as saying he has no authority, only that the authority has not been met with in our reading.

Stray Scraps.

President G. D. B. Pepper said in his Baccalaureate, Colby University, Waterville Me.: "As our Lord was taken into an exceeding high mountain, and there in one glance saw all the kingdoms and their glory, felt all the concentric multitudinous power of their motivities, so does the advancing civilization of successiv generations carry men up the mount of vision higher and higher," etc. Now is not this stupid talk to young men in a university who hav been taught that this earth is a sphere? Perhaps the president regards the whole transaction figurativly, as he very judiciously omitted the propelling power of his satanic majesty in elevating his Lord and savior into the mountain, so eloquently described by Matthew, Mark, and Luke. "Surely he would be a fool who would deliberately choose illusion instead of reality." Then why should Col. Ingersoll, and the rest of us who are not fools in other things, choose the illusion of Agnosticism instead of the reality of Christianity, as you and yours accuse us? Hav a care, or your theory will prove too much in its application to yourself. "He will go under and perish who substitutes a dream for a fact." Indeed; how about Joseph's dream in regard to his espoused wife, Mary? Did he substitute a dream, for a fact? Divines should be cautious how they repudiate "dreams," since the foundation of the Christian religion depends on a dream and dreams form such a conspicuous necessity in God's infallible word of fact.

Some years ago, Dr. McCosh, of Princeton College, was lecturing before the senior class, and "had been discussing Leibnitz's view of the reason of evil, to the effect that mankind was put upon the earth because there was less evil here than elsewhere. One of the seniors inquired: 'Well, doctor, why was evil introduced into the world?' 'Ah!' said the doctor, holding up both hands, 'ye hav asked the hardest question in all feelosophy. Sukkrates tried to answer it and failed; Plato tried it, and he failed; Kahnt attempted it and made bad work of it; Leibnitz tried it and he begged the whole question as I've been tellin' ye, and I confess (gnawing at his thumb knuckle)—I confess I don't know—what—to make of it myself." GEORGE CHAINEY

Wishes to enter into correspondence with Liberals throughout the conntry in reference to lecture engagements for the coming season.

Mr. Chainey needs no recommendation from us. We print below a few of his indorsements, which certainly are the strongest testimonials ever given to any Liberal lecturer, except Ingersoll, in this country:

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll: "Mr. Chainey is one of the best thinkers in this country. He has a wonderful command of language, is full of imagery, comparison, antithesis, logic, and beauty. He feels what he says with his whole heart, and perceives it with his entire brain. He is perfectly honest, and for that very reason is intellectually keen. Downright honesty in such a man is genius. He gives a true transcript of his mind, and gives it with great power. He is well acquainted with the church, knows all the ways of the theologian, and understands the inside of the whited sepulcher of superstition. His lectures stir me like trumpets. They are filled with the loftiest spirit. Eloquent, logical, and poetic, they are as welcome and refreshing as the breeze of morning on the cheek of fever."

"Mr. Chainey is a large, well formed, though rather round-shouldered man, wears no beard, and in these days of crops would be called a long-haired man. He has a big head and broad face. He is an orator. His eloquence is his chief fascination. His periods are models of oratorical beauty, and though ordinarily unimpassioned he occasionally becomes intensely strong in his dramatic effects. He is singularly graceful of gesture. His methods inspire one with a conviction of his honesty. His elocution is masterly. His voice is magnetic, powerful, flexible, very pleasing. His sentiments are beautifully painted sacrilege. He would make a famous actor."—Scranton Daily Republican.

"Mr. Chainey's lecture was one of the most brilliant oratorical efforts ever delivered in Creston. We doubt if any lecturer, other than Col. Ingersoll, could use so much of beautiful metaphor."—Creston Commoner.

"Mr. Chainey's enunciation is perfect, his sentences forcible and impassioned. Like Ingersoll he has the happy faculty of clothing an idea in such a peculiarly taking form, that at first thought the contrary idea seems an absurdity and an imposture."—Syracuse Morning Herald.

BEES! BEES! BEES!

FROM $2,000 TO $5,000 A YEAR KEEPING HONEY BEES.

The particul rs are simply to prevent the great loss that most bee masters hav to contend with annually. Then giv the bees a chance to increase and collect surplus honey to their fullest capacity; all of which can be easily accomplished by using the kind of hive described in "Kidder's Secrets of Bee-keeping."

Send for the Book and see how easily it can be done with a few swarms of bees.

THIS BOOK IS A RELIABLE GUIDE

to all persons that keep bees, especially to the novice or new beginner, as it teaches how all of the troubles and disappointments that the bee master is liable to, can be successfully overcome, such as Foul Brood, Dysentery, Bee Robbery, Ravages of Moth Millers, Loss of Queen, loss of bees in Swarming time, by their flight to the forests, also the great loss in winter and early spring management, which is usually more than all other ways combined. This book will also inform the bee master HOW BEES WILL INCREASE AND THROW OFF SWARMS to an enormous extent, all conditions being favorable. The old stocks will frequently swarm three or four times each, and oft times the first swarms thrown off will swarm once or twice each, with a good hive and right kind of management. In warmer climates the bees will increase and swarm to a much greater extent.

GREAT YIELD OF SURPLUS HONEY.

This Book will inform the bee master how to get the greatest amount of surplus honey, and at the same time hav it in small packages weighing three-quarters of a pound to two or three pounds, as may be desired, which will command the highest price in market. In a good season, the bee keeper may calculate on two or three hundred pounds of surplus honey from each old stock, and from fifty to one hundred ponnds from the earlier young swarms, especially if they do not over-swarm.

NO MORE BEE-STINGS IN MANAGING BEES.

The Book will post the bee-keepers how to manage them when putting them on, or taking off surplus honey boxes, and not get stung in the whole operation.

BEE-KEEPING FOR OUR SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

It being the most pleasant, as well as the most profitable business that young people can engage in, and at the same time remain at home with their parents. The author has known of several young men who commenced the culture of the bee in their teens, and are now making more money than their fathers who run the farm, and doing it easily and with small investments. We must also remember that the women folks often make the best of bee-keepers, and not so liable to neglect them as the men folks.

KIDDER'S BEE BOOK

should be in the hands of all persons who like honey, and take an interest in the little honey bee. It contains more matter than many books that sell for two dollars, and is embellished with numerous cuts and drawings. There is no trouble, loss, or damage that a bee master has to contend with but what the book will giv the proper remedy by simply referring to the index, and that will point to the page where it is fully exp'ained.

In order to bring this book more prominently before the mass of bee keepers, the Author proposes to giv, as a premium to each purchaser of a book, from this date until Aug. next, the privilege of making his Celebrated Patent Bee Hive, as spoken of in book, for their own use (but not to sell) Free of Charge, otherwise there will be the usual Patent Fee of Five Dollars to each individual that wishes to make and use the hive

PRICE, BOARD BOUND, 85 cents.

N. B. The directions for hive making with cuts, drawings, etc., will be inclosed within each book sold, until Aug. next, (not longer). Now is the time for all bee-keepers to avail themselves of this liberal offer, which is simply to buy a book at the Regular Price, before Sept. next

Lambert's "Notes on Ingersoll."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Herewith I send you a book of "Notes on Ingersoll," by Rev. L. A. Lambert. The only wonderful feature of it is that it purports to be indorsed by thirty-two editors. That may not seem very remarkable, and yet it is quite a wonder that the press (only of the United States and Canada) should contain thirty-two moral prostitutes—for prostitutes they must be, as this little work, though very full of sarcasm, has not the material to excite thirty-two lettered men unless it be in the way of disgust.

The book opens with a falsehood in the shape of an introduction by the publishers, claiming Father Lambert's work has broken down the barriers of sectarianism. The hundreds of different Christian creeds are by no means amalgamized, although they may join forces to fight their common foe—human reason.

The preface, by Father Cronin, is about as foul and as complete a sample of Christian venom as can be produced. Yet it is no wonder, as not much less could be expected from a person professing to believe that the greatest sin possible is to be intelligent. Were the book to be by Father Cronin, I believe very few respectable readers would read any further than the preface. To say the least, it is a very poor recommendation for the work. Father Cronin's clamoring at the venom contained in the great Infidel's expressions, about to be exposed, reminds one of the poor artist who thought it necessary to inscribe over his drawing "This is a horse." Rogues are very apt to predispose fools whichever way suits their purpose best, but honest, intelligent readers, who choose to coolly decide a case on its real merits, very naturally feel disgusted when the attempt is made at them.

I will not follow Father Lambert all through and note all of his sophism, as it would occupy much more space in your valuable columns than the case is worth. I confine myself to a few remarks as I read through this volume of nonsense.

Page 12, Father Lambert says: "If Mr. Black has been guilty of personal detraction, as Mr. Ingersoll insinuates, he has done wrong; but in attacking a live man like Mr. Ingersoll he has shown more courage and manliness than the latter has exhibited in his detractions of Moses dead." Mr. Ingersoll attacks no dead man, only his law, or rather an absurd and tyrannical law enacted by living priests and ascribed to a dead Moses. If Mr. Lambert's insinuation of cowardice means anything at all, it means that a law, no matter how bad it may be, once enacted and its author dead, must ever be respected and obeyed. Such being the case, Abraham was a big coward, Jesus Christ was another, and we are all cowards to-day for finding fault with Mormonism —Joseph Smith is as dead as Moses.

Page 15 contains a mess of nonsense I would like to see a thoroughly scientific man gaze at, just for the benefit of the pitying grin it would bring onto his face. There, in among a lot of scarcely intelligible balderdash, he says: "Change supposes succession, and there can be no succession without a beginning, and therefor limitation. Thus we are borne out by reason, experience, and common sense." "Change supposes succession"—of events, not of existences. "No succession without beginning"—of effect, not of the material that caused it. "Therefor limitation"—of the duration of the phenomenon, not of the substance that enacted it. "Thus we are borne out"—of nothing, though Father Lambert may be very much relieved after his discharge of such a dishonest argument. Father Lambert's argument reminds me of the boy's new pants made out of his mother's old petticoat—the pants were new, but not the cloth.

Page 16, Mr. Lambert says to Col. Ingersoll: "Why should you try to convert the world to your way of thinking?" etc. The inference is derogatory to the dignity of the colonel, putting him on the level with Christian dudes who say to the people, in substance, as follows: "You don't know anything, can't be made to understand anything, so you must hear me, believe all I say to you, and obey all my commands." While Ingersoll says: "Hear me if you will, and ascertain the truthfulness of my utterances; then, with your own judgments—which I presume are as good as mine—form your own conclusions."

Page 17, he says: "Why condemn kings as tyrants, and priests as hypocrits, if they are the helpless victims of the unalterable forces of matter?" Col. Ingersoll says that matter is indestructible, but when did he ever say that it was unalterable in form and effect? Ingersoll does not denounce kings as tyrants and priests as hypocrits out of malice, nor for a mere amusement, nor do I believe he has much hope of persuading them to amend their ways, but he intends to make it impossible for them to continue their career of tyrants and hypocrits by raising their dupes above their villainous practices. The colonel knows perfectly well that so long as there will be calves on the market there will be butchers to skin them.

Page 18, Father Lambert givs a lesson on the law of gravitation that must be invaluable to Ingersoll, particularly when he treats of water running up-hill. I suppose the colonel did not know that the water did somehow find its way up after running down-hill, but thought there was an immense water-making instrument somewhere on the Rocky Mountains. But still, while reading this sophistry, it occurs to one's mind that possibly the reverend gentleman understands better than he pretends to what Ingersoll meant when he said, "Water always runs down-hill."

Page 23, Mr. Lambert says God did this, that, and the other thing. He givs no opinion, but givs it as a fact above comment. Father, you were not there, and hav no personal knowledge of God's doing all these things. Consequently, even if he did, you are not acceptable as a witness in the case. You only heard so, and those who told you hav been convicted of falsehood, and you know it. Among their misrepresentations is this: They said this earth was as flat as a pan-cake, and covered over like a gypsy wagon, and all hands believed it until an Infidel learned them better at the risk of his life, and now I don't know of anyone but reverend Brother Jasper that believes it. Father Lambert analyzes science pretty well with borrowed language, but when he comes to a question where his own intellect must come into play, that is where he shows how little there is in him except borrowed knowledge.

Page 24, he says, in comparing the weight of clouds and rocks: "Density is a circumstance in the case." So far he and Ingersoll agree, but there the latter stops and says he knows not; while Lambert proceeds and says: "The difference is to be traced to the will of God." The only difference is that one only says what he knows and the other says much more than he knows anything about.

Page 36, Lambert says: "Crime is the result of human liberty." The difference between that and the truth is little. Had the father said, "Christian liberty," instead of, "human liberty," he would hav said the truth for once. The French and the Spanish inquisitions, the burning of Servetus, the murder of Garfield and of Freeman's children, were all caused by Christian liberty. Father Lambert, ignorance, bad education, and fanaticism are great sources of crime, but a still worse one is the oppression of the weak by the strong, abuse of authority, etc. In this Canada, where civil authorities allow the priest to be more Catholic than you dare be in the United States, I could sicken your heart, if it is at all susceptible, telling you of honest, well-meaning families living the most miserable life possible, often ending in crime, on account of fathers and mothers oppressing and enslaving their children, particularly their daughters, under the direction of the priest, who, instead of helping the parents to make their daughter proof against encroachments on good morals by helping them to teach her good principles, directs them to enforce prohibition in everything the young girl may show any desire for. The mother must never lose sight of her daughter—must always be between her and the boy—particularly such boys as the priest may not like—and if she ever fails to do so he refuses her those sacraments without which a firm believer in the nonsense thinks himself eternally damned. The consequence is that this house is turned into a little hell, where there is continually some scolding, crying, or pouting done. The neighbors will all hav a hand in it, some siding with the mother and some with the daughter. The girl under such oppression becomes bold. Of course she is young, and not yet wise and charitable. On seeing that her mother and the priest hav no more confidence in her virtue than they hav in that of any four-legged brute, she loses all respect for herself. She runs away if she can, and who with depends very much on who is willing to run with her.

Father Lambert, crime may be the result of human liberty, but only with the slave who believes that liberty is a sin, and is so wearied of his slavish existence that he must enjoy liberty to extremes before his craving can be satisfied. Prohibition and oppression, on the contrary, is, somewhat, a success with fools only. All intelligent enough to claim the right to liv their own life are by prohibition led to crime. That the uncalled for oppression and false teaching of Christianity, together with the injustice it practices, and its support of governments and monopolists to practice likewise, are the chief causes of all evils on earth, is pretty well proved by the fact that one can always tell what is the prevailing religion of any locality by finding out the evils practiced most in the place. Show me a place exclusivly inhabited by Infidels—not neglected Christians, but Infidels whose opinions are the result of Freethought—and there I can almost defy you to find one single evil, judged from an unprejudiced human standpoint.

Page 37, Father Lambert says: "While admitting the existence of sufferings in the world, the Christian does not, and is not, bound to admit that they are the result of the design or plan of God in creating the universe." This point is decided by a single question, viz.: When God created the world, did he, or did he not, know that all his dear children would suffer on earth, and that the majority of them would suffer eternally? This question admits of only one short reply, which is, "Yes," or "No"—no theological dodge about it. It can not be that he did know and yet hardly believed it. One of two things is the case. He did know, or he did not know. Christians can choose whichever horn they please of the dilemma, then kneel down and worship either a fool or a fiend.

I am the father of one boy. I did not make him alone, but I did my part to the best of my limited ability, using the best, but yet imperfect, material that I possessed. I call him a pretty good boy, circumstances all considered; I am even a little proud of him, yet he is not perfect, he has no wings to bear him to me (a distance of fifty miles) as often as I would wish to see him, and he may even lack of being perfect in many other respects. He is certainly not what he would hav been had I been almighty. Yet I would not damn him by any means. I would not even allow the Christian's God to damn him unless he damned me along with him. The greatest punishment that could be inflicted on me would certainly be to lock me up in heaven and my son in hell. There would be another Lucifer in heaven to disturb peace. Christians hav a happy way of forbidding God's wisdom to be measured in a human measure, and still they weigh his responsibility on a human scale without adding a single notch for the Almighty.

Page 37, Father Lambert says: "To those who see in man's nature and destiny nothing higher than the grasshopper, or the potato-bug, etc., there must be something inexplicable in the sufferings of this life." That is as much as to say, "Brethren: believe even a fiction. If you cannot believe it, keep trying to convince yourself that you ought to believe it in order to be happy, and by all means always say you do believe it whether you do or not." It is fortunate that none but fools need to be rocked to sleep in a fiction, as none but fools could succeed. Wise people are too well aware that to wish an impossibility can never make it a fact, so they direct wishes toward possibilities, and their appreciating faculties toward facts.

Page 42, Father Lambert says: "God's justice is infinit." I would like to know what is infinit justice. If justice is to giv each one his just due, that is not infinit; if to giv some more than their due, that is injustice; and if it means to giv all hands more than their due, that is impossible to God or man. A whole, no matter what the volume may be, divided in any given number of shares, can only yield each one his just due. If God is as wise as they claim he is, he should certainly hav a better conception of justice than we hav, but it cannot be that what is justice in his sight is injustice in our sight. The very fact of his having made it so would be the worst kind of injustice, particularly as his advocates claim that he created us in his image. How could he, in justice, create us in contrariwise to himself and call us a fac simile of the original? Father Lambert approves of Judge Black's saying that we hav neither the jurisdiction nor the capacity to judge of the justice of God. He is evidently a little ashamed of it, or he would not shade it over by explaining that "The finite cannot be the measure of the infinit." This last dodge means nothing; we all admit that. That is, all admit that a quart measure cannot measure the immense body of water contained in the ocean, but it will measure a quart of water, even if that quart of water is part of that immense body. We cannot describe an object that remains beyond the extent of our sight, but anything within our sight we can tell the color of, just as well as God or any of his priests can. If God created all that exists he could, undoubtedly, instruct me as to the lay of the land and the climate at the North Pole, but he can learn me nothing of the kind about the Pacific Coast from San Francisco to Santa Barbara. I was all along there and know it myself. I do not claim infinit knowledge, but I claim to know this much: If God created Lord Lansdown to receive $50,000 a year for his useless presence in Canada, and me to work hard and liv poorly every day to help bear the expense, and calls that "just," he surely did not create me to his image, for I can never see it so. According to Judge Black and Father Lambert, God has the easiest position on earth. I don't see but what I could fill the place as well as old Jove himself. Nothing to do, only let events take their natural course, and compel everybody to approve of it, right or wrong. By the way, if such is infinit wisdom, I, along with many others, may hav been greatly mistaken about somebody's wife whom we considered a marvel of imperfection at her offset in life, and has been ever since growing more so, for the reason that she could always accede to praise, but never could bear to be contradicted. A great deal of fault was found with her when, through her seeming neglect and mismanagement, she would ruin everything within reach of her influence—even her own health—and cause everybody about her to share in the disagreeable consequences. After all, she was probably all right, and, like the Lord, her justice was "infinit," and her ways past finding out. Who knows?

Since human judgment is not to be trusted, when this woman set fire to the premises by carelessness with a kerosene lamp, who knows but it was one of those visitations of the Lord, and a real God-send, possibly to divert the mind of the servant girl from a criminal relish of the sweet kiss she had got at the departure of her beau that evening? Since the best judgment of the wisest may be all wrong, why talk, write, or think? What is the use of brains, anyway? There is no need of intelligence to obey. Fear alone will do that.

Page 53, Ingersoll: "Reason is the result of all experience." Comment by Lambert: "When you make reason the result of experience, you destroy its proper entity." I say, Father Lambert, reason has no entity. The entity is in the power of reasoning only. The first reasoning is brought about by our senses, and is developed faster when helped by teaching. I hav had a good illustration of this very lately: A child just beginning to walk could not be persuaded to keep away from the hot stove till he burnt his fingers, and one burning did not suffice, but he burnt them several times. When he burnt his little fingers he of course felt the pain, and cried, but must touch the stove again. His young mind, or thinking powers, were so undeveloped that it required several of those painful operations to lead his mind into a speculation as to what might be the cause of the pain he suffered every time he touched the hot stove. In this case, which was it, Father Lambert, reason producing experience, or experience producing reason? Father Lambert says that the individual, minus reason, is incapable of apprehending experience. The reason here mentioned is elsewhere identified as the soul. Such being the case, his reverence must admit that a horse has a soul, for I am aware that a horse apprehends experience. To convince Father Lambert of this, I would direct him to go into a good pasture, coax a horse to him a few times with salt, and then use the same means to decoy him into hard and painful labor—say to be boxed up into a horse-power, and perform the monotonous rolling of the logs all day—and see how long it will be before the horse refuses his salt at that price. If Mr. Lambert had said that "individuals can apprehend experience only in proportion to their reasoning power," it would hav been nearer the truth. Father Lambert is not sincere, and I dare say he knows his ways are not fair, but writes for one class of people only—the believing class. He takes Mr. Ingersoll to task for his bad use of language, and in doing so he himself distorts language to the utmost of his crooked inability.

Page 128, Ingersoll says that, besides the good and the bad, there are the mistaken. Lambert, in his comment, tries to make it appear that there is no third class in this scale, that the willfully mistaken are bad, and the honestly mistaken are good. I am sure he knows better. A "willful mistake" may be said as slang, but there is no such a thing as a willful mistake. A deed is willful only in as far as its effect is known by the performer. Thus far it is no mistake. The mistake commences where the knowledge ends, consequently it is not willful. Hence Father Lambert pardons all mistakes; consequently he is no Christian. According to his theory, all Infidels are going to heaven in spite of his Roman Catholic teeth. Any man possessing a bit of common sense as big as a mustard-seed will admit that no one will knowingly consign himself to eternal torture for the sake of a belief, if he can acquire and possess it; and if he cannot, it is an honest mistake; and, according to the divinely inspired judgment of Father Lambert, he is good. In regard to sincerity, we Infidels hav the advantage over Christians. One can easily conceive of hypocrits professing to believe in Christianity, with all the inducements—political, social, and pecuniary—there are for so doing. In fact, the hypocrit is the most successful, for while he may hav no hope for the future on one side, on the other side he has no fear, and is therefore better able to take advantage of those who believe the fables they imagin he does. But a hypocritical Infidel would be a man who believed that his conduct will produce his eternal ruin, and while Infidelity is at a discount in all human pursuits, a hypocritical Infidel is simply inconceivable.

Page 131, Father Lambert: "Why question the fact that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John wrote the gospels, any more than to question the authorship of the works attributed to Josephus, Homer, Shakspere, and others which you [Ingersoll] do not question?" Father Lambert, Josephus, Homer, and Shakspere all wrote believable things—common sense. That makes all the difference in the world. It takes much less evidence to convince people that two and one make three than to persuade them that one and two make one. If I told you that my grandfather came from Bordeaux in an old-fashioned sailing craft in six weeks, you would say, "He must hav had pretty favorable wind," but on the strength of common evidence you would probably believe it. But if I should add that ten years later my grandmother, a virtuous old lady, who had never known man carnally since my grandfather had left her, came to him leading her own three-year-old son, furthermore that the old man, shocked at the apparition of a step-son, jumped home in two bounds, traversing the Atlantic from Newfoundland to Ireland at the first leap, would you not begin to question the veracity of my statement, first questioning as to whether I believed it myself or not, and if so, on what evidence had I been so convinced? I would say that my father had told me, and minutely related to me how his parent got up on a big stone about a mile west of St. Johns, and in an instant was alighting on the mountain of Kilkenny. Would you not plead that my father was not there to see him, and ask why the old man did not jump home at once, where somebody knew him, and he could be identified and accredited for his great feat? Should I take you to Ireland and show you the print of his feet in the rock, would you not say, "Those holes hav been there a thousand years; St. Patrick made them," and show me how they are worn out of their former shape by your dupes drinking holy water out of them? Would you say that, or would you be ashamed of it? Should I further claim that my grandparent could and did invest me with power to do likewise, would you not request that I take the famous leap before believing that the old man did? Father Lambert, I think the foregoing explains pretty well the difference in the credibility between the two sets of authors above mentioned.

Page 132, he tries to demonstrate the truth of the gospels on the strength of their success. If there is any weight in that argument, Joe Smith's Bible is ten times as true as that of Jesus, because Mormonism is making headway ten times as fast as Christianity did in the same time, and that with the disadvantage of more light than there was in the world when Christianity began. But would it not be more reasonable to attribute this success to the fact that Joe and Jesus both got their first recruits from among fishermen, well-diggers, and such like, ignorant enough to be easily deceived, and miserable enough to be easily bribed, until the business got to paying enough to attract smart hypocrits.

authors of the second, third, and fourth centuries, as having not denied or questioned the real existence of Christ. Father Lambert, those men had something more important to attend to, and that probably accounts for their having been suffered to liv and write at all. Those men probably knew how far they could carry their criticism and save their lives.

Possibly they had been made that wise by the bitter experience of the Gnostics, who had all been killed and their work destroyed for saying that Christ had never had a real human existence, but had only appeared in visions as a specter.

Page 168, Father Lambert says: "The upright or downright Atheist will no doubt be treated as the upright rebel or traitor is treated by the government whose laws he defies, and whose authority he rejects." Where and how Father Lambert can see any comparison between an upright Infidel and a traitor, is more than I can tell. However, according to the foregoing, God is so averse to people who cannot believe as they are bid that he will treat all such as rebels and traitors. Of course, he will cast them in hell, and people his heaven with his favorits—fools and hypocrits who can believe, or pretend to believe, any fables, no matter how absurd and irrational, if the priest says they must believe it. But this seems to be somewhat contradictory to what the same father said in another comment, viz.: That in the eyes of God (or of the church, which is all the same) the honestly mistaken are good. This is probably a paradox. The cause of so great a difference between two men's ideas, whether from a different way of thinking, or the entire absence of thought from one or the other party, I don't know. But Father Lambert thinks that life must be dreadful to one who sees no difference between a man and a potato-bug in their eternal destiny, and I think that if Father Lambert really believes in such a God as he and his church describe, he must wish he was a potato-bug. I am sure I would.

Page 170, Ingersoll: "A being of infinit wisdom has no right to create a person destined to everlasting pain."

Father Lambert's comment: "Passing the question of right, which is to no purpose here, who holds that God created any being to be damned? God created man to enjoy happiness forever, and no man will be damned but he who damns himself." There, do you see, readers, God has the right to do right or wrong? I do not dispute his right to do wrong, but what I question is the possibility of his ever having such a desire. I suppose Father Lambert can explain that out. But that man was created to enjoy happiness forever, is either a lie or a failure; that we all know; and if none will be damned but he who damns himself, we need not fear for anyone, even if the Catholic church says that a large majority will be damned, as none but fools would do that, and Father Lambert will not suffer a fool to be damned, even if he wants to be.

Father Lambert, your God did not create you. The Roman Catholic church created you, and you hav created your God. In the main you resemble your old bigoted mother, and your God resembles you; but, owing to the civilizing influence of your surroundings, your offspring does not resemble his grandmother. In a pinch she could be made to disown him. The only characteristic your God retains of his grand-parent is selfishness. He will hardly damn anyone, but would hav all, if possible, bow to him, and contribute to his support.

I hav got a God, too—one I created to my own image. His first commandment is that omitted by your God, and often called the eleventh commandment, "Mind thy own business." That and the Golden Rule are the whole substance of my creed. My God's virtues are three—wisdom, strength, and beauty. He enjoins me to be as happy as I can while I liv, and to trust him for the hereafter. His prescription for happiness is justice, love, temperance, and fortitude. The result he guarantees to correspond with my exactness in following the prescription. With this prescription I keep myself as healthy, and liv as happy, as anybody of equal means, and never pay a cent for prayers, or hav to swallow any bitter medicins. This I say for the benefit of the reader, not for Father Lambert, who will undoubtedly disapprove of my hygienic mode of treatment, as he makes his living by selling the very drugs I deprecate.

Mr. Editor, publishing the foregoing might be objectionable from the fact that it advertises Father Lambert's book, but the objection drops low when we consider that fools never read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and should any of your readers be thereby led to read Lambert's famous "Notes on Ingersoll," it would only show them how rotten and weak are the props of the Roman Catholic religion—the mother of all Christian creeds. Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

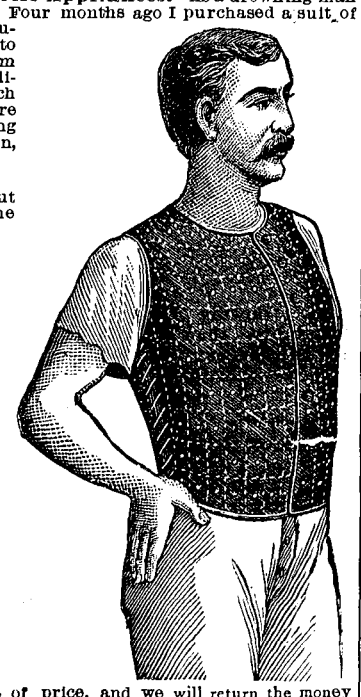
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fall rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselvs. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

Gems of Thought.

As important as it is that man should possess the right faith, know ye that no man is justified by faith alone: only so far as faith leads to good works is it a justification to him who embraces it. When faith and works are compared, works stand far ahead. It even may be said it matters little what a man believes, so his actions are right. It is wrong to say that faith is to be accounted for righteousness; for unless a man's works are of a righteous character there is no righteousness in him. It is true that faith without works is dead. Be not deceived, no man's faith can be a justification to you, no more can any man's works be a justification to you. Every man must perform good works himself if he would hav the justification which good works afford.—D. M. Bennett.

SWEAT is the destiny of all trades, whether of the brow or of the mind. God never allowed any man to do nothing. How miserable is the condition of those men which spend their time as if it were given them, not lent; as if hours were waste creatures, and such as should never be accounted for; as if God would take this for a good bill of reckoning: Item, spent upon my pleasures forty years! These men shall once find that no blood can privilege idleness, and that nothing is more precious than that which they desire to cast away.—Bishop Hall.

Is life worth living? Is not life worth living for to him who can believe that he livs in a world organized, as we know this world is, with the myriad stars every night, with the unceasing sun that has been pouring its creativ beams for millions of years upon this poor planet, and will go on to do so for millions of years to come—is it not worth living for, to be in a world where there are all these questions to be asked and answered, all these problems waiting for solution; where there is nobody that does not lack something that we can giv with our hands, with our hearts, with our brains, with our simplest faculties? Is it not worth while to think that when we hav done our utmost, and laid ourselvs down to our quiet sleep, the everlasting forces will still go on, making the world more and more glorious, and the lot of man brighter and brighter, and bring about the consummation to which we hav added our little trifle of help?—Frothingham's Life as a Test of Creed.

IN the pursuit of knowledge, follow it wherever it is to be found; like fern, it is the produce of all climates, and, like coin, its circulation is not restricted to any particular class. We are ignorant in youth, from idleness, and we continue so in manhood, from pride; for pride is less ashamed of being ignorant than of being instructed, and she looks too high to find that which very often lies beneath her feet. Therefore condescend to more of low estate, and be for wisdom what Alcibiades was for power.—Colton's Lacon.

ALCIBIADES was naturally a man of strong passions; but his ruling passion was ambition to contend and overcome. This appears from what is related of his sayings when a boy. When hard pressed in wrestling, to prevent his being thrown, he bit the hands of his antagonist, who let go his hold and said, "You bite, Alcibiades, like a woman." "No," said he, "like a lion."—Plutarch's Lives.

IF bodily pain and disease be the legitimate and traceable consequence of imprudence and excess—if pleurisy or consumption follow by natural law exposure to inclement weather in weak frames—if neuralgia be the legal progeny of organic decay or shattered nerves—if storms follow laws as certain as the law of gravitation—how can prayer bring about the cessation of pain, or the lulling of the storm, for the relief of the suffering, or the rescue of the imperiled man? Is not the prayer for such cessation clearly a prayer for a miracle?—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

LUCIAN observes that a young man who reads the history of the gods in Homer or Hesiod, and finds their factions, wars, injustice, incest, adultery, and other immoralities so highly celebrated, is much surprised afterward, when he comes into the world, to observe that punishments are by law inflicted on the same actions, which he had been taught to ascribe to superior beings. The contradiction is perhaps still stronger between the representations given us by some later religions, and our natural ideas of generosity, lenity, impartiality, and justice; and in proportion to the multiplied terrors of these religions, the barbarous conceptions of the divinity are multiplied upon us. Nothing can preserve untainted the genuin principles of morals, in our judgment of human conduct, but the absolute necessity of these principles to the existence of society. If common conception can indulge princes in a system of ethics different from that which should regulate other persons, how much more those superior beings, whose attributes, views, and nature are so totally unknown to us! Suret superis sua jura; the gods hav maxims of justice peculiar to themselvs.—Hume's Essays.

How calm was Pericles when, crushed by misfortunes, deserted by the Athenians, all his family perishing by the plague, to which at last he fell a victim himself, still ordering the affairs of the state till the last, counting the least of them important, and his own life nothing! How calm was Socrates, when the fatal poison was already working within him, parting from life without a sign of emotion, and with words of wisdom still lingering upon his lips! Such calmness in the highest trials hav been; and wherever it has been, it was an evidence of the utmost unselfishness. We must veil our sorrows, and make little of our griefs, nor trouble others with our afflictions. We must not pity ourselvs so much, nor nurse our sorrows, but look up from our own little lives to those great eternal orbs that work above and around and within us; we must bow to the inevitable and confide in the invisible.—Felix Adler in Radical Pulpit.

To hide the truth is evil, and beseems
But ill the soul of one of noble birth.

AT past forty years of age I began to relish life without drawbacks; for ten years I hav been vividly conscious of its delights.—Miss Martineau's Autobiography.

THE SEVENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION;

Where Held—The Speakers Engaged—The Hotels, Railroads, etc.

THE NEW YORK STATE FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION, in accordance with its established custom, has invited the Freethinkers of all the other states, and also of Canada, to meet them in annual Convention, at Cassadaga Lake, N. Y., on the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th days of September next.

THE SPEAKERS.

The following well-known speakers hav been engaged to address the Convention: Thaddeus B. Wakeman, of New York; Miss Helen H. Gardner, of St. Louis; Courtlandt Palmer, of New York; Charles Watts, of London, England; Allen Pringle, of Selby, Canada; Col. John R. Kelso, of Modesto, Cal.; George Chainey, of Boston; J. H. McCormick, of Franklin, Pa.; John E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kansas; Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y.; M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Iowa; Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa.; Charles B. Reynolds, of Rochester, N. Y.; Samuel P. Putnam, of New York; Dr. William F. McCormick, of Franklin, Pa.; and Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., orthodox, of Philadelphia, Pa. And the following hav also been invited, the most of whom are expected to be present: Hon. Elizur Wright, of Boston; F. E. Abbot, Cambridge, Mass.; Horace Seaver, Boston; Luther Colby, Boston; Judge Arnold Krekle and Mrs. Judge Krekle, of Kansas City, Mo.; James Parton, of Newburyport, Mass.; Judge Carter, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; and B. F. Underwood, editor of the Index, Boston, Mass. It is possible that Col. Ingersoll will be present and address the Convention.

THE SINGING.

Professor A. D. Lane, of Olean, N. Y., one of the most popular professional singers in the state, accompanied by as good a quartet of voices as can be found in Western New York, has been engaged to provide the musical entertainment for the occasion. Professor H. H. Hall, who sang for the Rochester Convention, has also been engaged.

THE PLACE OF MEETING.

The location where the Convention is to meet is one of the most pleasant and picturesque in the state. It is described as follows in a circular issued by the Association: "The Cassadaga Lake Camp-meeting Grounds are eight miles from Lake Erie, and seven hundred feet above it; situated midway between New York and Chicago, one and a half hours by rail from Buffalo, five from Cleveland, nine from Pittsburgh, fourteen hours from Cincinnati, sixteen from Philadelphia, eighteen hours from New York, twenty hours from Boston and Washington, and twenty-one from Chicago. It lies on the shore of a beautiful chain of lakes, three in number, and at an elevation of nearly fourteen hundred feet above the level of the sea." The Association last year erected on the grounds an amphitheater, with a seating capacity of twenty-five hundred people, with the seats in a semi-circle, which givs every one present an opportunity to hear all that is said from the speaker's platform.

ROUTES OF TRAVEL AND RAILROAD RATES.

Eastern and western passengers over the Nickel Plate, Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad, and eastern passengers over the New York, Lake Erie & Western (formerly Erie) railroad, change cars at Dunkirk, N. Y., and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to the "Cassadaga Camp-meeting Grounds."

Eastern and western passengers over the New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio railroad (formerly Atlantic & Great Western), and eastern passengers over the Buffalo & Jamestown railroad, change cars at the Atlantic & Great Western Crossing, and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to Lily Dale Station.

To be more definit, persons coming to the Convention from most of the cities and large towns in the United States will find it the cheaper to purchase excursion tickets to Chautauqua Lake. These can be obtained very cheap; and then leave the cars at the crossing of the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad near Jamestown, and then take the last mentioned road to Lily Dale Station, near the camping grounds. Persons coming from any station on the New York, Lake Erie & Western railroad, or any of its branches west of Binghampton, will pay full fare to Dunkirk, and then be returned at one-third fare home. The Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad will sell excursion tickets at two cents a mile from any station on that road.

THE HOTEL RATES.

The following prices hav been established at the hotels for board: $1.50 per day, for one day and less than three days; and over, $1 per day. Table board: breakfast, 40 cents; dinner, 50 cents; supper, 30 cents. Lodgings, 25 to 30 cents. The hotel accommodations are sufficient to entertain all who may attend.

H. L. GREEN,
Salamanca, N. Y. Secretary New York State Freethinkers' Association.

P. S.—I am glad to announce that the Truth Seeker Company will hav an agent on the grounds with a large assortment of Freethought publications for sale. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER will, as heretofore, make full reports of the proceedings. Other reports of the Convention will be published in the New York Herald, the Buffalo Courier, and other secular papers.

H. L. G.

On Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 8th and 9th, the

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE

WILL HOLD ITS

EIGHTH ANNUAL CONGRESS

At the same place.

In his call for the Congress the President of the League invites "all citizens of the United States, whether they hav acted with this League or not, who believe in a secular republic, separation of church and state; the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all, and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press as the basis of universal suffrage."

All Charter and Life Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Each Auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates—its president, secretary, and three other members—to the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats in the Congress, and to votes by the permission of the Congress.

Odds and Ends.

TIGHT pants are going out of fashion. The number of tight men in pants will probably always remain just the same, however.

TWO heads may be better than one; but somehow it takes considerable argument to convince a man who has been up all night of that fact.

"SAMBO, kin you tell me why dey inwariably take de pennies from de children at de Sunday-school?" "Course I kin. Dat is to get de cents ob de meetin."

THE most trying circumstances in which a boy can be is when another boy is in the alley winking at him and his father is offering him a nickel to carry in a load of wood.

MILD GENT (to fisher-boy): "I'm sorry to hear you were the worse for liquor last night, Sam; you take after your father." Sam: "No, sir; father never leaves none to take."

THE country girl gets even with her city cousin when she writes: "Pa has got the house full of paying boarders, you know, else we should like to hav you all here spending the summer."

"PA," said Brown's little Tommy, "if you died would you still be a lawyer?" "I guess so," answered Brown. "For how long?" asked Tommy. "For attorneyty," replied the inhuman Brown.

THE definition of a kiss given by our hired girl is very expressiv: "A kiss is an awful bolt of lightning mixed up with very little thunder, and spread upon one pair of lips by another with a stave from a sugar barrel."

"SEE here," he said to his clerk. "I don't mind letting you off a day now and then to attend your grandfather's funeral, but I think you ought to hav the courtesy to send a few of the fish around to my house."

NEW YORK has discovered that divorces are being procured there very secretly. This is a shame. The greatest publicity should be given in all cases. Some people would rather read divorce trials than dime-novels.

IN reporting a summer-night festival last week, a Jersey City editor spoke of a Miss McGee as being "au fait," and the next day the paper had it "all feet." And yet Governor Cleveland recently pardoned a proof-reader.

NEW YORK girls hav been kissing horses. We judge from this that there is a great dearth of negro murderers in the jails of the metropolis. The country learns too late that Chastine Cox filled a longfelt want.—Atlanta Constitution.

"LET us go down to the depot and see if any of our friends hav come in on the train." "But the train is two hours behind time. What's the use of going down there now?" "What's the use?" exclaimed the other. "Why, the saloon across the street from the depot is not shut up, is it?"

THEY were sitting on the sofa in the front parlor, and he was holding her little hand in his own. Suddenly a thought seemed to strike her, and she asked sweetly: "Adolphus, are you a 'bolter?'" Just then the old gentleman's footsteps sounded on the top stair, and as he wildly grabbed his hat, Adolphus answered: "Yes, darling; good-bye."

A LADY residing at the North Shore recently took her little three-year-old daughter in bathing with her. The water was very cold, and the little one clung closely to her mother's neck, her teeth chattering in anticipation of a dip. It came at last, and as she emerged dripping from the water she gasped: "O mamma, tell Jesus to turn on the hot water!"

A MISS is as good as a mile,
A kiss is as good as a smile,
But four painted kings
Are the beautiful things
That are good for the other man's pile.

A BEAUTIFUL maid at White Bear
Sat down on a bumble-bee's lair,
And then the soft breeze
Was full of mad bees,
And shrieks, and wild wailings, and swear!

HE was tall. He was dilapidated. He was dead broke. He waved his arms around and shouted: "Last January, Jay Gould said that Union Pacific was worth par. Where's U.P. now?" Echo answered. "Last March," continued the dilapidated, "Jay Gould said that Union Pacific was worth 90. Where's U.P. now?" Echo answered some more. "Last May," the dilapidated shouted at the top of his voice, "Jay Gould said that Union Pacific was a bargain at 60. Where's U.P. now?" Echo whooped up for the third time. "Last June," he said, as he wildly pawed the air, "Jay Gould said that Union Pacific was a fat thing at 50. Where's U.P. now?" "Been down to 28, and don't you forget it," said a bystander. "And where mi?" "Bound for the Jay Gould idiot asylum!" "K'rect! Shake! Come and see me!" he chuckled, as he disappeared towards the river.—Wall Street News.

AT a meeting of the Spiritualists of Washington, D. C., it was decided to organize into a society to advance Spiritualistic views in the fall of the year. Mr. John B. Wolff was elected president, M. THE Mahdi is a radical total abstinence man, down to coffee and tobacco, which he won't even allow in his camp; in fact, he lately gave a refugee 150 lashes for smoking a cigarette. But he makes up for this by having thirty-nine wives, and keeps within the letter of the law, which only allows four wives at a time, by an ingenious system of temporary divorce, by which he always has thirty-five spare wives in waiting.

WHILE the jury was deciding whether or not Mr. Bradlaugh had, at the moment of his taking the Parliamentary oath, such a belief in a supreme being as rendered his taking of the Parliamentary oath valid in the eye of the law, report has it that the Lord Chief-Justice and his two learned colleagues, waiting for the verdict, whiled away the time by constituting themselvs a rough-and-ready jury to decide whether or not there is any supreme being at all.—Star.

MR. WILLIAM L. While waiting for the train he put the basket down in one corner of the room and busied himself explaining to the people the advantages of economy. The train came, Mr. Gilbert got on board and went off, forgetting to take his basket.

A NEW savings bank, with the attractiv name of "The Security," began business in Newark, N. J., yesterday. It was formally dedicated with prayer by the Rev. Dr. Taylor, of the First Baptist Church. This is an excellent idea, says a daily paper. Banks should be opened every morning with prayer for the special guidance of the presidents and cashiers. But the stockholders should watch while the clergymen pray. "Watch and pray," should be especially the motto in the Newark savings banks.

BEFORE the Maori king leaves England he will get so shrewd an idea of the worth of our missionary enterprise and our Christian morality that he will probably learn to call one bigotry and the other pocket. I remember a colonial baronet telling me of a certain old Maori servant of his who had ridden behind him for twenty years, and professed all that time to be a devout Christian. One day his master engaged him in confidential talk, and begged him to say what he recommended as the best means of converting the Maoris to Christianity. The worthy baronet was taken aback at the rejoinder of the old Maori, whom he trusted implicitly, and whose fidelity had hitherto borne every test. "Master," said he, with an odd twinkle, "you ask me, you no ask me. Me tell what believe; me believe your Christian religion—all damn nonsense!" I fear the Maori king will be of the same opinion at no very distant date. Christians who preach one thing and practice another must expect these little snubs from—well, "the noble savage."—Liverpool Evening Express.

IN accepting the Democratic nomination for governor of Illinois, Carter Harrison said: "Gentlemen, I hav carefully read the platform adopted by your convention, and cordially accept and indorse it; and your declaration that men are capable of self-government and are not to be molested in their personal rights, while they do not injure their neighbors, is especially to be commended. Here this issue between the parties is broadly defined. It is the province of the Democracy to stand between the people and any and all attempts to curtail their personal liberties." If Mr. Harrison practices what he preaches he ought to make a good official.

LIZZIE MINER, a bright, pretty girl, who worked in Brainard & Armstrong's silk mill in New London, and who was made insane by the religion preached at the street meetings of the Salvation Army, has been placed in a hospital for the insane. She fancied that Satan was in pursuit of her soul, and that only by the constant singing of Salvation songs he might be kept away. Members of the Army called on her, but she became more violent, and had convulsiv fits. She is getting well. At a recent meeting of the Salvation Army an exhorter advised a large gathering of women to discard corsets, as they "are an invention of the devil." Many of the women went home and cast away the offending article of dress.

Truth, of this city, the enterprising young paper which three years ago prosecuted a crusade against the "dives" of New York which resulted in their almost total extinction, is now agitating for the extirpation of a large proportion of the employment agencies of the city, which it has discovered to be merely panders to prostitution. Shocking stories are told of the ruin of thousands of honest and friendless young foreign girls seeking work. Meanwhile, the police and detectiv authorities, under whose eyes these and all the other iniquities of the city hav been going on for years, remain as inactiv as ever, save for an occasional scurrilous denunciation of Truth and like reformers for their "interference in affairs outside their legitimate field."

"I WAS mighty thankful for that rain we got yesterday," said a Texas Siftings man. "Yes, it did the corn a world of good. How many acres hav you got planted of corn?" "I've got no corn planted this year at all. I wasn't thinking about crops." "Well, then, how can the rain benefit you?" "You see, I don't often get a decent dinner at home, as my wife says she can't cook in hot weather; but yesterday there was to be a church picnic, and she fixed up a lunch basket for the preacher's table, but it rained so the picnic could not come off. To keep the preacher's lunch from spoiling we had it for dinner, and it was the best dinner I've had since we were married. There was no end of chickens and jellies and that sort of alleviations. Don't tell me that rain yesterday didn't do any good. It was the most refreshing shower we hav had for years." Texas Siftings.

PEOPLE who profess religion should try to be just a little consistent. It is certainly not in accordance with the teachings of the scripture to backbite, dead-beat, and belittle those who honestly differ with them on a question which greatest minds hav tried to solve. Two things we despise. One is the narrow-minded bigot and hypocrit, who thinks he has secured a mortgage on heaven, but who in fact is working hard, consciously or unconsciously, to take up his abode in those regions to which he would hav all go who are not as narrow-minded as he. The other is the meddlesome, backbiting creature of the feminin gender, who so far forgets herself as to "wear the breeches," who is only happy when she is in her element of prying into the affairs of others, meddling, and backbiting. Such a creature cannot expect the consideration and respect due a lady. Those who consider these remarks as intended for them will of course criticise us. If they do we shall feel that we hav not used our pencil in vain, and if showing up the folly and meanness of their ways can induce them to reform for the good of society we shall be amply rewarded.—Dayton Gazette.

IT is quite plain that the moral tone of the West is a little higher than that of the East. A few days ago the city of Louisville was torn up about the exposure of a nude picture in the shop windows of the prominent fine art dealers, and now the towns of Hillsboro and Mattoon, Ill., are making war on the "Mother Hubbard" dress affected by the young ladies. This picturesque costume is held to be improper, "because it tends to an indecent exposure of the person." The marshal of the town of Mattoon, in order to prevent the demoralization of society, has issued an order directing his subordinates to arrest all women found on the street wearing the "Mother Hubbard" dress. We do not know what variations hav been added to the "Mother Hubbard" since it wound its way to the breezy prairies, but here in the East it is considered neither immoral not demoralizing, even when worn by big girls. It is simply picturesque. We fear, adds the World, that Kate Greenaway's heart will be broken when she hears of the performances of these wild Western officials.

THE execution of the provisions of the recent treaty between Germany and Russia, whereby the former power agreed to expatriate the Nihilist refugees and other subjects who hav fled to Germany from Russia, has been begun in earnest, and is working great hardships on scores who hav settled down in Germany and made therein new homes for themselvs. The majority of the immediate victims of this treaty are the newcomers, all of whom hav been officially ordered to leave the country within a fortnight. Those whose affairs hav become so fixed by long residence as to require more time to settle up hav been given permits with a six months' extension of residence; but only on the security of good bondsmen that they will at the termination of the specified time peaceably quit the empire. As might be supposed, the ordinance has been the cause of great hardship and suffering to many who hav long resided in Germany, and become socially connected with the districts in which they hav dwelt. Many of this class, to avoid expulsion, hav applied for letters of naturalization from the German government, but, although able to comply with all the conditions of the law, hav been invariably refused the privilege. This conduct on the part of the German government has provoked an outburst of indignation on the part of the Liberal press.

LAST winter the Faubourg St. Germain introduced what were known to French society as bals blancs, and this summer the Socialists of Paris hav organized what they call les fetes rouges, for the instruction, diversion, and profit of children and very young people, who, they hope, will be a generation of Freethinkers in their riper years. The first of this year's Atheistical fetes has been held at Belleville, and well bore out its name, everything being red, from the dresses of the children, most of whom wore the Phrygian cap, to the decorations of the hall, the flowers on the bonnetts of the citoyennes or in the button-holes of the (we should say citoyens) present being also crimson. Amusement was not the only object in view, nor, indeed, the principal one. Freethought principles and doctrins were inculcated on the young folks, as well as Socialistic theories. They were exhorted between their games to hate religion and to hold priests in contempt. The flagrant injustice of the existing order of things was illustrated by Citoyenne Rouzade, who reminded her youthful hearers that "stonemasons, miners, and carpenters were less paid than the deputies of President Grevy; that railway servants received a lower salary than railway engineers," and so on, all of which was iniquitous, seeing all men were equal and should enjoy identical advantages.—London Standard.

The Ghost of Religion.

From the Nineteenth Century.

In the January number of this review is to be found an article on Religion which has justly awakened a profound and sustained interest. The creed of Agnosticism was there formulated anew by the acknowledged head of the Evolution philosophy, with a definitness such as perhaps it never wore before. To my mind there is nothing in the whole range of modern religious discussion more cogent and more suggestiv than the array of conclusions the final outcome of which is marshaled in those twelve pages. It is the last word of the Agnostic philosophy in its long controversy with Theology. That word is decisiv, and it is hard to conceive how Theology can rally for another bout from such a sorites of dilemma as is there presented. My own humble purpose is not to criticise this paper, but to point its practical moral, and, if I may, to add to it a rider of my own. As a summary of philosophical conclusions on the theological problem, it seems to me frankly unanswerable. Speaking generally, I shall now dispute no part of it but one word, and that is the title. It is entitled "Religion." To me it is rather the ghost of religion. Religion as a living force lies in a different sphere.

The essay, which is packed with thought to a degree unusual even with Mr. Herbert Spencer, contains evidently three parts. The first deals with the historical Evolution of Religion, of which Mr. Spencer traces the germs in the primitiv belief in ghosts. The second arrays the moral and intellectual dilemmas involved in all anthropomorphic theology into one long catena of difficulty, out of which it is hard to conceive any free mind emerging with success. The third part deals with the Evolution of Religion in the future, and formulates, more precisely than has ever yet been effected, the positiv creed of Agnostic philosophy.

Has, then, the Agnostic a positiv creed? It would seem so; for Mr. Spencer brings us at last "to the one absolute certainty, the presence of an Infinit and Eternal Energy, from which all things proceed." But let no one suppose that this is merely a new name for the Great First Cause of so many theologies and metaphysics. In spite of the capital letters, and the use of theological terms as old as Isaiah or Athanasius, Mr. Spencer's Energy has no analogy with God. It is Eternal, Infinit, and Incomprehensible; but still it is not He, but It. It remains always Energy, Force, nothing anthropomorphic; such as electricity, or anything else that we might conceive as the ultimate basis of all the physical forces. None of the positiv attributes which hav ever been predicated of God can be used of this Energy. Neither goodness, nor wisdom, nor justice, nor consciousness, nor will, nor life can be ascribed, even by analogy, to this Force. Now a force to which we cannot apply the ideas of goodness, wisdom, justice, consciousness, or life, any more than we can to a circle, is certainly not God, has no analogy with God, nor even with what Pope has called the "Great First Cause, least understood." It shares some of the negativ attributes of God and First Cause, but no positiv one. It is, in fact, only the Unknowable a little more defined; though I do not remember that Mr. Spencer, or any Evolution philosopher, has ever formulated the Unknowable in terms with so deep a theological ring as we hear in the phrase "Infinit and Eternal Energy, from which all things proceed."

The terms do seem, perhaps, rather needlessly big and absolute. And fully accepting Mr. Spencer's logical canons, one does not see why it should be called an "absolute certainty." "Practical belief" satisfies me; and I doubt the legitimacy of substituting for it "absolute certainty." "Infinit" and "Eternal," also, can mean to Mr. Spencer nothing more than "to which we know no limits, no beginning or end," and, for my part, I prefer to say this. Again, "an Energy"—why an Energy? The Unknowable may certainly consist of more than one energy. To assert the presence of one uniform energy is to profess to know something very important about the Unknowable—that it is homogeneous, and even identical, throughout the Universe. And then, "from which all things proceed" is perhaps a rather equivocal reversion to the theologic type. In the Athanasian Creed the Third Person "proceeds" from the First and the Second. But this process has always been treated as a mystery; and it would be safer to avoid the phrases of mysticism. Let us keep the old words, for we all mean much the same thing; and I prefer to put it thus. All observation and meditation, Science and Philosophy, bring us "to the practical belief that man is ever in the presence of some energy or energies, of which he knows nothing, and to which, therefore, he would be wise to assign no limits, conditions, or functions." This is, doubtless, what Mr. Spencer himself means. For my part, I prefer his old term, the Unknowable. Though I hav always thought that it would be more philosophical not to assert of the Unknown that it is Unknowable. And, indeed, I would rather not use the capital letter, but stick literally to our evidence, and say frankly "the unknown."

Thus viewed, the attempt, so to speak, to put a little unction into the Unknowable is hardly worth the philosophical inaccuracy it involves; and such is the drawback to any use of picturesque language. So stated, the positiv creed of Agnosticism still retains its negativ character. It has a series of propositions and terms, every one of which is a negation. A friend of my own, who was much pressed to say how much of the Athanasian Creed he still accepted, once said that he clung to the idea "that there was a sort of a something." In homely words such as the unlearned can understand, that is precisely what the religion of the Agnostic comes to, "the belief that there is a sort of a something about which we can know nothing."

Now let us profess that, as a philosophical answer to the theological problem, that is entirely our own position. The Positivist answer is, of course, the same as the Agnostic answer. Why, then, do we object to be called Agnostics? Simply because Agnostic is only dog-Greek for "don't know," and we hav no taste to be called "don't-knows." The Spectator calls us Agnostics, but that is only by way of prejudice. Our religion does not consist in a comprehensiv negation; we are not forever replying to the theological problem; we are quite unconcerned by the theological problem, and hav something that we do care for, and do know. Englishmen are Europeans, and many of them are Christians, and they usually prefer to call themselvs Englishmen, Christians, or the like, rather than non-Asiatics or anti-Mohammedans. Some people still prefer to call themselvs Protestants rather than Christians, but the taste is dying out, except among Irish Orangemen, and even the Nonconformist newspaper has been induced by Mr. Matthew Arnold to drop its famous motto, "The dissidence of Dissent, and the Protestantism of the Protestant religion." For a man to say that his religion is Agnosticism is simply the skeptical equivalent of saying that his religion is Protestantism. Both mean that his religion is to deny and to differ. But this is not religion. The business of religion is to affirm and to unite, and nothing can be religion but that which at once affirms truth and unites men.

The purpose of the present paper is to show that Agnosticism, though a valid and final answer to the theological or ontological problem—"What is the ultimate cause of the world and of man?"—is not a religion nor the shadow of a religion. It offers none of the rudiments or elements of religion, and religion is not to be found in that line at all. It is the mere disembodied spirit of dead religion; as we said at the outset, it is the ghost of religion. Agnosticism, perfectly legitimate as the true answer of science to an effete question, has shown us that religion is not to be found anywhere within the realm of Cause. Having brought us to the answer, "No cause that we know of," it is laughable to call that negation religion. Mr. Mark Pattison, one of the acutest minds of modern Oxford, rather oddly says that the idea of deity has now been "defecated to a pure transparency." The evolution philosophy goes a step further and defecates the idea of Cause to a pure transparency. Theology and ontology alike end in the Everlasting No with which science confronts all their assertions. But how whimsical is it to tell us that religion, which cannot find any resting-place in theology or ontology, is to find its true home in the Everlasting No! That which is defecated to a pure transparency can never supply a religion to any human being but a philosopher constructing a system. It is quite conceivable that religion is to end with theology, and both might in the course of evolution become an anachronism. But if religion there is still to be, it cannot be found in this No-man's-land and Know-nothing creed. Better bury religion at once than let its ghost walk uneasy in our dreams.

The true lesson is that we must "hark back," and leave the realm of Cause. The accident of religion has been mistaken for the essence of religion. The essence of religion is not to answer a question, but to govern and unite men and societies by giving them common beliefs and duties. Theologies tried to do this, and long did it, by resting on certain answers to certain questions. The progress of thought has upset one answer after another, and now the final verdict of philosophy is that all the answers are unmeaning, and that no rational answer can be given. It follows then that questions and answers, both but the accident of religion, must both be given up. A base of belief and duty must be looked for elsewhere, aud when this has been found, then again religion will succeed in governing and uniting men. Where is this base to be found? Since the realm of Cause has failed to giv us foothold, we must fall back upon the realm of Law—social, moral, and mental law, and not merely physical. Religion consists, not in answering certain questions, but in making men of a certain quality. And the law, moral, mental, social, is pre-eminently the field wherein men may be governed and united. Hence to the religion of Cause there succeeds the religion of Law. But the religion of Law or Science is Positivism.

It is no part of my purpose to criticise Mr. Spencer's memorable essay, except so far as it is necessary to show that that which is a sound philosophical conclusion is not religion, simply by reason that it relates to the subject-matter of theology. But a few words may be suffered as to the historical evolution of religion. To many persons it will sound rather whimsical, and possibly almost a sneer, to trace the germs of religion to the ghost-theory. Our friends of the Psychical Research will prick up their ears, and expect to be taken au grand serieux. But the conception is a thoroughly solid one, and of most suggestiv kind. Beyond all doubt, the hypothesis of quasi-human immaterial spirits working within and behind familiar phenomena did take its rise from the idea of the other self which the imagination continually presents to the early reflections of man. And, beyond all doubt, the phenomena of dreams, and the gradual construction of a theory of ghosts, is a very impressiv and vivid form of the notion of the other self. It would, I think, be wrong to assert that it is the only form of the notion, and one can hardly suppose that Mr. Spencer would limit himself to that. But, in any case, the construction of a coherent theory of ghosts is a typical instance of a belief in a quasi-human spirit-world. Glorify and amplify this idea, and apply it to the whole of Nature, and we get a god-world, a multitude of superhuman divine spirits.

That is the philosophical explanation of the rise of theology, of the peopling of Nature with divine spirits. But does it explain the rise of Religion? No, for theology and religion are not conterminous. Mr. Spencer has unwittingly conceded to the divines that which they assume so confidently—that theology is the same thing as religion, and that there was no religion at all until there was a belief in superhuman spirits within and behind Nature. This is obviously an oversight. We hav to go very much further back for the genesis of religion. There were countless centuries of time, and there were, and there are, countless millions of men for whom no doctrin of superhuman spirits ever took coherent form. In all these ages and races, probably by far the most numerous that our planet has witnessed, there was religion in all kinds of definit form. Comte calls it Fetishism—terms are not important; roughly, we may call it Nature-worship. The religion in all these types was the belief and worship, not of spirits of any kind, not of any immaterial, imagined being inside things, but of the actual visible things themselvs—trees, stones, rivers, mountains, earth, fire, stars, sun, and sky. Some of the most abiding and powerful of all religions hav consisted in elaborate worship of these physical objects treated frankly as physical objects, without trace of ghost, spirit, or god. To say nothing of fire-worship, river, and tree worship, the venerable religion of China, far the most vast of all systematic religions, is wholly based on reverence for Earth, Sky, and ancestors treated objectivly, and not as the abode of subjectiv immaterial spirits.

Hence the origin of religion is to be sought in the countless ages before the rise of theology; before spirits, ghosts, or gods ever took definit form in the human mind. The primitiv uncultured man frankly worshiped external objects in love and in fear, ascribing to them quasi-human powers and feelings. All that we read about Animism, ghosts, spirits, and universal ideas of godhead in this truly primitiv stage are metaphysical assumptions of men trying to read the ideas of later epochs into the facts of an earlier epoch. Nothing is more certain than that man everywhere started with a simple worship of natural objects. And the bearing of this on the future of religion is decisiv. The religion of man in the vast cycles of primitiv ages was reverence for Nature as influencing Man. The religion of man in the vast cycles that are to come will be the reverence for Humanity as supported by Nature. The religion of man in the twenty or thirty centuries of Theology was reverence for the assumed authors or controlers of Nature. But, that assumption having broken up, religion does not break up with it. On the contrary, it enters on a far greater and more potent career, inasmuch as the natural emotions of the human heart are now combined with the certainty of scientific knowledge. The final religion of enlightened man is the systematized and scientific form of the spontaneous religion of natural man. Both rest on the same elements—belief in the Power which controls his life, and grateful reverence for the Power so acknowledged. The primitiv man thought that Power to be the object of Nature affecting Man. The cultured man knows that Power to be Humanity itself, controling and controled by Nature according to natural law. The transitional and perpetually changing creed of Theology has been an interlude. Agnosticism has uttered its epilog. But Agnosticism is no more religion than differentiation or the nebular hypothesis is religion.

We hav only to see what are the elements and ends of religion to recognize that we cannot find it in the negativ and the unknown. In any reasonable use of language religion implies some kind of belief in a Power outside ourselvs, some kind of awe and gratitude felt for that Power, some kind of influence exerted by it over our lives. There are always in some sort these three elements—belief, worship, conduct. A religion which givs us nothing in particular to believe, nothing as an object of awe and gratitude, which has no special relation to human duty, is not a religion at all. It may be formula, a generalization, a logical postulate; but it is not a religion. The universal presence of the unknowable (or rather of the unknown) substratum is not a religion. It is a logical postulate. You may call it, if you please, the first axiom of science, a law of the human mind, or perhaps better the universal postulate of philosophy. But try it by every test which indicates religion and you will find it wanting.

The points which the Unknowable has in common with the object of any religion are very slight and superficial. As the universal substratum it has some analogy with other superhuman objects of worship. But Force, Gravitation, Atom, Undulation, Vibration, and other abstract notions hav much the same kind of analogy, but nobody ever dreamed of a religion of gravitation, or the worship of molecules. The Unknowable has managed to get itself spelt with a capital U; but Carlyle taught us to spell the Everlasting No with capitals also. The Unknowable is no doubt mysterious, and Godhead is mysterious. It certainly appeals to the sense of wonder, and the Trinity appeals to the sense of wonder. It suggests vague and infinit extension, as does the idea of deity; but then Time and Space equally suggest vague and infinit extension. Yet no one but a delirious Kantist ever professed that Time and Space were his religion. These seem all the qualities which the Unknowable has in common with objects of worship—ubiquity, mystery, and immensity. But these qualities it shares with some other postulates of thought.

But try it by all the other recognized tests of religion. Religion is not made up of wonder, or of a vague sense of immensity, unsatisfied yearning after infinity. Theology, seeking a refuge in the unintelligible, has no doubt accustomed this generation to imagin that a yearning after infinity is the sum and substance of religion. But that is a metaphysical disease of the age. And there is no reason that philosophers should accept this hysterical piece of transcendentalism, and assume that they hav found the field of religion when they hav found a field for unquenchable yearning after infinity. Wonder has its place in religion, so has mystery; but it is a subordinate place. The roots and fibers of religion are to be found in love, awe, sympathy, gratitude, consciousness of inferiority and of dependence, community of will, acceptance of control, manifestation of purpose, reverence for majesty, goodness, creativ energy, and life. Where these things are not, religion is not.

Let us take each one of these three elements of religion—belief, worship, conduct—and try them all in turn as applicable to the Unknowable. How mere a phrase must any religion be of which neither belief, nor worship, nor conduct can be spoken! Imagin a religion which can hav no believers, because, ex hypothesi, its adepts are forbidden to believe anything about it. Imagin a religion which excludes the idea of worship, because its sole dogma is the infinity of Nothingness. Although the Unknowable is logically said to be Something, yet the something of which we neither know nor conceive anything is practically nothing. Lastly, imagin a religion which can hav no relation to conduct; for obviously the Unknowable can giv us no intelligible help to conduct, and ex vi termini can hav no bearing on conduct. A religion which could not make anyone any better, which would leave the human heart and human society just as it found them, which left no foothold for devotion, and none for faith; which could hav no creed, no doctrins, no temples, no priests, no teachers, no rites, no morality, no beauty, no hope, no consolation; which is summed up in one dogma—the Unknowable is everywhere, and evolution is its prophet—this is indeed "to defecate religion to a pure transparency."

The growing weakness of religion has long been that it is being thrust inch by inch off the platform of knowledge; and we watch with sympathy the desperate efforts of all religious spirits to maintain the relations between knowledge and religion. And now it hears the invitation of Evolution to abandon the domain of knowledge, and to migrate to the domain of no-knowledge. The true Rock of Ages, says the philosopher, is the Unknowable. The paradox would hardly be greater if we were told that true religion consisted in unlimited Vice.

What is religion for? Why do we want it? And what do we expect it to do for us? If it can giv us no sure ground for our minds to rest on, nothing to purify the heart, to exalt the sense of sympathy, to deepen our sense of beauty, to strengthen our resolves, to chasten us into resignation, and to kindle a spirit of self-sacrifice—what is the good of it? The Unknowable, ex hypothesi, can do none of these things. The object of all religion, in any known variety of religion, has invariably had some quasi-human and sympathetic relation to man and human life. It follows from the very meaning of religion that it could not effect any of its work without such quality or relation. It would be hardly sane to make a religion out of the Equator or the Binomial theorem. Whether it was the religion of the lowest savage, of the Polytheist, or of the Hegelian Theist; whether the object of the worship were a river, the Moon, the Sky, Apollo, Thor, God, or First Cause, there has always been some chain of sympathy—influence on the one side, and veneration on the other. However rudimentary, there must be a belief in some power influencing the believer, and whose influence he repays with awe and gratitude and a desire to conform his life thereto. But to make a religion out of the Unknowable is far more extravagant than to make it out of the Equator. We know something of the Equator; it influences seamen, equatorial peoples, and geographers not a little, and we all hesitate, as was once said, to speak disrespectfully of the Equator. But would it be blasphemy to speak disrespectfully of the Unknowable? Our minds are a blank about it. As to acknowledging the Unknowable, or trusting in it, or feeling its influence over us, or paying gratitude to it, or conforming our lives to it, or looking to it for help—the use of such words about it is unmeaning. We can wonder at it, as the child wonders at the "twinkling star," and that is all. It is a religion only to stare at.

Religion is not a thing of star-gazing and staring, but of life and action. And the condition of any such effect on our lives and our hearts is some sort of vital quality in that which is the object of the religion. The mountain, sun, or sky which untutored man worships is thought to hav some sort of vital quality, some potency of the kind possessed by organic beings. When mountain, sun, and sky cease to hav this vital potency, educated man ceases to worship them. Of course all sorts and conditions of divine spirits are assumed in a pre-eminent degree to hav this quality, and hence the tremendous force exerted by all religions of divine spirits. Philosophy and the euthanasia of theology hav certainly reduced this vital quality to a minimum in our day, and I suppose Dean Mansel's Bamton Lectures touched the low-water mark of vitality as predicated of the Divine Being. Of all modern theologians, the dean came the nearest to the Evolution negation. But there is a gulf which separates even his all-negativ deity from Mr. Spencer's impersonal, unconscious, unthinking, and unthinkable Energy.

Knowledge is of course wholly within the sphere of the Known. Our moral and social science is, of course, within the sphere of knowledge. Moral and social well-being, moral and social education, progress, perfection, naturally rest on moral and social science. Civilization rests on moral and social progress. And happiness can only be secured by both. But if religion has its sphere in the Unknown and Unknowable, it is thereby outside all this field of the Known. In other words, Religion (of the Unknowable type) is ex hypothesi outside the sphere of knowledge, of civilization, of social disciplin, of morality, of progress, and of happiness. It has no part or parcel in human life. It fills a brief and mysterious chapter in a system of philosophy.

"By their fruits ye shall know them" is true of all sorts of religion. And what are the fruits of the Unknowable but the Dead Sea apples? Obviously it can teach us nothing, influence us in nothing, for the absolutely incalculable and unintelligible can giv us neither ground for action nor thought. Nor can it touch any one of our feelings, but that of wonder, mystery, and sense of human helplessness. Helpless, objectless, apathetic wonder at an inscrutable infinity may be attractiv to a metaphysical divine; but it does not sound like a working force in the world. Does the Evolutionist commune with the Unknowable in the secret silence of his chamber? Does he meditate on it, saying, in quietness and confidence shall be your strength? One would like to see the new Imitatio Ignoti. It was said of old, Ignotum omne pro magnifico. But the new version is to be Ignotum omne pro divino.

One would like to know how much of the Evolutionist's day is consecrated to seeking the Unknowable in a devout way, and what the religious exercises might be. How does the man of science approach the All-Nothingness? and the microscopist, and the embryologist, and the vivisectionist? What do they learn about it, what strength or comfort does it giv them? Nothing—nothing; it is an ever-present conundrum to be everlastingly given up, and perpetually to be asked of one's self and one's neighbors, but without waiting for the answer. Tantalus and Sisyphus bore their insoluble tasks, and the Evolutionist carries about his riddle without an answer, his unquenchable thirst to know that which he only knows he can never know. Quisque suos patimur Manes. But Tantalus and Sisyphus called it Hell and the retribution of the Gods. The Evolutionist calls it Religion, and one might almost say Paradise.

A child comes up to our Evolutionist friend, looks up in his wise and meditativ face, and says, "O wise and great Master, what is religion?" And he tells that child, "It is the presence of the Unknowable." "But what," asks the child, "am I to believe about it?" "Believe that you can never know anything about it." "But how am I to learn to do my duty?" "Oh! for duty you must turn to the known, to moral and social science." And a mother wrung with agony for the loss of her child, or the wife crushed by the death of her children's father, or the helpless and the oppressed, the poor and the needy, men, women, and children, in sorrow, doubt, and want, longing for something to comfort them and to guide them, something to believe in, to hope for, to love, and to worship—they come to our philosopher and they say, "Your men of science hav routed our priests, and hav silenced our old teachers. What religious faith do you giv us in its place?" And the philosopher replies (his full heart bleeding for them), and he says, "Think on the Unknowable."

And in the hour of pain, danger, or death, can any one think of the Unknowable, hope anything of the Unknowable, or find any consolation therein? Altars might be built to some Unknown God, conceived as a real being, knowing us, though not known by us yet. But altars to the unknowable infinity, even metaphorical altars, are impossible, for this unknown can never be known, and we hav not the smallest reason to imagin that it either knew us, or affects us, or anybody, or anything. As the Unknowable cannot bring men together in a common belief, or for common purposes, or kindred feeling, it can no more unite men than the precession of the equinoxes can unite them. So there can never be congregations of Unknowable worshipers, nor churches dedicated to the Holy Unknowable, nor images nor symbols of the Unknowable mystery. Yes! there is one symbol of the Infinit Unknowable, and it is perhaps the most definit and ultimate word that can be said about it. The precise and yet inexhaustible language of mathematics enables us to express, in a common algebraic formula, the exact combination of the unknown raised to its highest power of infinity. That formula is (x^n), and here we hav the beginning and perhaps the end of a symbolism for the religion of the Infinit Unknowable. Schools, academies, temples of the Unknowable, there cannot be. But where two or three are gathered together to worship the Unknowable, there the algebraic formula may suffice to giv form to their emotions; they may be heard to profess their unwearying belief in (x^n), even if no weak brother with ritualist tendencies be heard to cry, "O x^n, love us, help us, make us one with thee!"

These things hav a serious side, and suggest the real difficulties in the way of the theory. The alternativ is this: Is religion a mode of answering a question in ontology, or is it an institution for affecting human life by acting on the human spirit? If it be the latter, then there can be no religion of the Unknowable, and the sphere of religion must be sought elsewhere in the knowable. We may accept with the utmost confidence all that the evolution philosophy asserts and denies as to the perpetual indications of an ultimate energy, omnipresent and unlimited, and, so far as we can see, of inscrutable mysteriousness. That remains an ultimate scientific idea, one no doubt of profound importance. But why should this idea be dignified with the name of religion, when it has not one of the elements of religion, except infinity and mystery? The hallowed name of religion has meant, in a thousand languages, man's deepest convictions, his surest hopes, the most sacred yearnings of his heart, that which can bind in brotherhood generations of men, comfort the fatherless and the widow, uphold the martyr at the stake, and the hero in his long battle. Why retain this magnificent word, rich with the associations of all that is great, pure, and lovely in human nature, if it is to be henceforth limited to an idea that can only be expressed by the formula (x^n); and which by the hypothesis can hav nothing to do with either knowledge, belief, sympathy, hope, life, duty, or happiness? It is not religion, this. It is a logician's artifice to escape from an awkward dilemma.

One word in conclusion to those who would see religion a working reality, and not a logical artifice. The startling reductio ad absurdem of relegating religion to the unknowable is only the last step in the process which has gradually reduced religion to an incomprehensible minimum. And this has been the work of theologians obstinately fighting a losing battle, and withdrawing at every defeat into a more impregnable and narrower fastness. They hav thrown over one after another the claims of religion and the attributes of divinity. They are so hopeless of continuing the contest on the open field of the known that they more and more seek to withdraw to the cloud-world of the transcendental. They are so terribly afraid of an anthropomorphic God that they hav sublimated him into a metaphorical expression—"defecated the idea to a pure transparency," as one of the most eminent of them puts it. Dean Mansel is separated from Mr. Spencer by degree, not in kind. And now they are pushed by Evolution into the abyss, and are solemnly assured that the reconciliation of Religion and Science is effected by this religion of the Unknowable—this chimera bombinans in vacuo. Their Infinits and their Incomprehensibles, their Absolute and their Unconditioned, hav brought them to this. It is only one step from the sublime to the unknowable.

Practically, so far as it affects the lives of men and women in the battle of life, the absolute and Unconditioned Godhead of learned divines is very much the same thing as the Absolute Unknowable. You may rout a logician by a "pure transparency," but you cannot check vice, crime, and war by it, nor train up men and women in holiness and truth. And the set of all modern theology is away from the anthropomorphic and into the Absolute. In trying to save a religion of the spirit world, theologians are abandoning all religion of the real world; they are turning religion into formulas and phrases, and are taking out of it all power over life, duty, and society.

I say, in a word, unless religion is to be anthroporphic, there can be no working religion at all. How strange is this new cry, sprung up in our own generation, that religion is dishonored by being anthropomorphic! Fetishism, Polytheism, Confucianism, Medieval Christianity, and Bible Puritanism hav all been intensely anthropomorphic, and all owed their strength and dominion to that fact. You can hav no religion without kinship, sympathy, relation of some human kind between the believer, worshiper, servant, and the object of his belief, veneration, and service. The Neo-Theisms hav all the same mortal weakness that the Unknowable has. They offer no kinship, sympathy, or relation whatever between worshiper and worshiped. They, too, are logical formulas begotten in controversy, dwelling apart from man and the world. If the formula of the Unknowable is (x^n), or the Unknown raised to infinity, theirs is (nx), some unknown expression of Infinity. Neither (x^n) nor (nx) will ever make good men and women.

If we leave the region of formulas and go back to the practical effect of religion on human conduct, we must be driven to the conclusion that the future of religion is to be, not only what every real religion has ever been, anthropomorphic, but frankly anthropic. The attempted religion of Spiritism has lost, one after another, every resource of a real religion, until risu solvuntur tabulæ, and it ends in a religion of Nothingism. It is the Nemesis of Faith in spiritual abstractions and figments. The hypothesis has burst, and leaves the Void. The future will hav then to return to the Knowable and the certainly known, to the religion of Realism. It must giv up explaining the Universe, and content itself with explaining human life. Humanity is the grandest object of reverence within the real and the known, Humanity with the World on which it rests as its base and environment. Religion, having failed in the superhuman world, returns to the human world. Here religion can find again all its certainty, all its depth of human sympathy, all its claim to command and reward the purest self-sacrifice and love. We can take our place again with all the great religious spirits who hav ever molded the faith and life of men, and we find ourselvs in harmony with the devout of every faith who are manfully battling with sin and discord. The way for us is the clearer as we find the religion of Spiritism, in its long and restless evolution of thirty centuries, ending in the legitimate deduction, the religion of the Unknowable, a paradox as memorable as any in the history of the human kind. The alternativ is very plain. Shall we cling to a religion of Spiritism when Philosophy is whittling away spirit to Nothing? Or shall we accept a religion of Realism, where all the great traditions and functions of religion are retained unbroken?

FREDERIC HARRISON.

"God's Ways are not Man's Ways," and Mr. Butler's are Different from Both.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The question is agitated in your columns, How ought Liberals to vote? A correspondent, "Liberta," discusses the subject at some length, but leaves us at last with the question unanswered. He expresses a preference, however, for Grover Cleveland, and claims that the said Grover Cleveland is a sturdy defender of the people against the aggressions of the Catholic church. Here surely we hav an anomaly. The writer admits—what we all too well know—that the Democratic party, which Cleveland represents, is the party of the Catholic church. As the chief executiv of the state of New York Grover Cleveland put his official veto on a bill that unlawfully proposed to take money from the public treasury for the benefit of the Catholic element in his party. In doing so he simply performed an act of duty that ought reasonably to be expected of any executiv officer sworn to support the constitution of his state, or who agreed to do so in accepting the office. Surely the people hav a right to demand this much of every officer, no matter by what party elected. But in these days of degeneracy in politics it indeed seems to hav become a rare virtue in any public officer to serve his country before his party. And this, in the view of your correspondent, is a matter of such importance and significance that he proposes Liberals should vote for Cleveland to reward him in some measure for his good conduct while governor of New York. Are Liberals prepared to vote for the Catholic party in this country? We think not. The sacrifice that every Liberal would make in doing so—voting with and for a church that in numbers and organization is the most powerful and dangerous of all the creed-bound foes of liberty—is altogether out of proportion to the little service received in exchange.

We hav often been told the Liberal vote is neutralized because divided among the various political parties. All reform movements are suffering in the same way. The thinking, progressiv, and the truly patriotic element among America's voting population hav never received due recognition from the government. The present machinery of political party organization in its working effectually places the power entirely in the hands of the ignorant masses. Back of these the demagog rules and rides triumphantly in power. Party machinery, as at present organized, was designed by aristocrats, and for a monarchical form of government. It is just the thing on which demagogs and despots may flourish, and well calculated to make public life odious and distasteful to honorable men. It supports at public expense an army of idlers who contrive to get a living out of politics, but who, otherwise, might seek a more honorable means of livelihood, and become useful citizens. It givs the ignorant masses the almost entire voice in shaping affairs of government, and in effect offers a standing premium for inefficiency, or for dishonesty in public office. With such political machinery, the people of the United States cannot reasonably expect much of their elected officers, whether in high station or in low. The stream does not rise higher than its source. As long as such machinery prevails, the thinking and progressiv citizens of this nation can do but little for their country. Their influence may be felt, but it is indirect. The only direct action is by and through the ballot-box. But here we are confronted with defectiv machinery, made so designedly, that, whatever else it might do, it should serve first of all the conservativ and despotic elements existing in all governments. It is, consequently, altogether out of place in a republic founded on the great truth that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. If, then, all power has its source in the people, the more direct and simple the machinery is made the better and more efficient it becomes. The machinery at present in use possesses none of these qualities. It is encumbered with endless complications until it is almost worthless. It offers a good illustration of "how not to do it." Let us look at it a moment. If the truth set forth in the Declaration amounts to anything, it is this. We, the people, are the power and the government. We go to the ballot-box to elect or select our officers. We know what policy we want carried out, and know who we think will best execute the duties of the various offices to that end. Every voter then feels directly his responsibility, his dignity, and his independence. His natural desire to promote by his vote the general welfare would be stimulated. With minds free from the slavery and prejudice which party machinery inflicts, reformers could appeal to the people with some hope of efficient results at the ballot-box. But while enslaved to party there is little hope. Year by year passes, and no decided progress is seen. The demagog is master; the voter a slave. The man elected to public station is in the same humiliating situation. He owes his place to party. The welfare of the country becomes a matter of secondary importance—with many, a matter of no importance at all. These things are all apparent to practical observers. Politicians make no secret of their corrupt methods. And why should we expect any better fruits from such a vicious system of machinery, or why try to reform and then lament our ill success as long as we are compelled to work with such defectiv tools? But he is a good workman, indeed, who can produce a good piece of work while yet using poor tools, and this is the requirement it seems that is laid upon the reforming and progressiv elements in society and government at the present time. Let us see if we can master it.

The practical question, of course, is, What shall we do now? The Liberals hav been voting for the past twenty years, mostly with the old parties. The principles and platforms of these parties—barring the slavery question—are the same to-day as they were twenty years ago. The Liberal vote has, therefore, exerted no direct influence either upon the party policy or upon the workings of the government. The reforms accomplished hav not been achieved by means of the ballot-box. A vote cast for either of the old parties is, therefore, practically equivalent to not voting at all. Liberals are asked again to repeat this folly. Is there anything, we ask, in the present situation that would encourage the belief that if we did so the results of the future would be any different from those of the past. We fail to find it. If experience teaches anything, it is that there is nothing gained by voting with the old parties. Let us glance at the new.

Prohibition may be a good cause. Certainly very little can be said for maintaining the American grog-shop. But the present organization, as shown by the party platform, reveals the cloven hoof and dragon's teeth of priestcraft. The primary object appears to be, from the platform, to put God in the Constitution. The cry for temperance is simply a shout in the wrong direction, to deceive the unwary and catch votes, as also to keep enthusiastic but misguided women at work, only to rob them at last. No Liberal can vote with the Prohibition party. There is but one way that Liberals can consistently vote, and the rule will hold good for all time. It is to vote the ticket that presents, in both platform and candidate, most largely the feature of progress. Of all party platforms now before the people the Greenback and Anti-monopoly are in this respect alone worthy of support. Gen. Benjamin F. Butler is the nominee of both. No man has been more unjustly maligned. We notice "Liberta" falls into the common error. It is not "spoons" this time, but "hypocrit." People who stigmatize thus mistake the man. There is nothing inconsistent in his position as delegate in the Democratic convention, because he had been by a portion of his fellow-citizens named as their nominee for president. A great man's methods are not like those of everybody. Butler is a great man.

A. L. KERN.

The Tariff Question.

It is eminently proper that THE TRUTH SEEKER should try to find out the truth upon all questions having a bearing upon the welfare of humanity in this life, and since the tariff question is one of these, I would be pleased to hav something to say on this subject.

The question of tariff is a part of the greater question of taxation, and cannot be properly discussed or understood until the greater question is disposed of. The question of taxation arises out of that of raising a revenue for public purposes. To discuss the question fairly, we should resolve it into its simplest form—How should public revenues be raised? This question might bring us to consider a second question first, namely, How are public revenues raised, and how much do we raise?

The people of the United States raise by all kinds of taxation, federal, state, and municipal, about $700,000,000 annually. Reckoning interest at ten per cent, this represents nearly one-quarter of the entire wealth of the country. In other words, we hav by taxation made nearly one-quarter of the entire wealth of the country public property. Let us consider how this tax is levied.

We raise $366,000,000, or more than one-half of the entire sum, by a tax on consumption. That is, we add the tax to the price of goods, and people must either pay the tax or do without the goods. We raise $220,000,000 of this tax on consumption in the shape of a tariff, and $146,000,000 is raised as internal revenue. Now, it will be observed that people pay this tax on consumption in proportion to what they consume, and they should consume in proportion to the number of consumers, i.e. in proportion to the size of their families. Therefore the tax on consumption may be regarded as a national fine inflicted upon people for having large families. To punish people for having large families will cause them to avoid having families altogether. It will cause young men to remain single, and when young men do not marry, young women cannot. This in turn leads to demoralization, to prostitution and fœticide, and all other forms of the social evil. To illustrate this, let us suppose that A and B are two young men, each having a capital of $1,000. A marries, and in the course of time he is the father of eight children. He spends his earnings, and the $1,000 too, in feeding, clothing, and educating his children. B does not marry, and the girl he should hav married becomes a social wreck. B invests his $1,000 so that at the end of twenty years it is worth $5,000. The United States government has made A pay ten times as much of the tax on consumption as B, because A married and lived a respectable life. This has helped to make B a rich man, and A and his children poor. Other young men notice the result and act accordingly. Our cities and villages are full of young men who do not marry, hence the social evil. Let those who advocate a tariff, or any kind of tax on consumption, distinctly understand that they are promoting and encouraging prostitution, fœticide, and all those horrible evils which are caused by people not marrying and becoming heads of families. They are advocating that a fine should annually be levied on those who do marry, and upon those who, after marrying, increase the size of their families. Let those who advocate a tariff clear themselvs of this charge if they can.

A large portion—probably one-half—of the remainder of the $700,000,000, or $167,000,000, we raise by a tax on improvements. People work, build houses, barns, mills, stores, etc., and we tax them on these things. That is, we raise $167,000,000 by taxing people in proportion to the amount of work they do; and, just as there is no way of escaping the tax on consumption but that of having no family (and in thousands of cases this means the murder of offspring), so there is no way of avoiding this tax on improvements but that of ceasing to improve, or, in other words, ceasing to work. Just as the tax on consumption is a fine levied upon people for marrying and having children, so the tax on improvements is a fine levied on people for working. But these methods of taxation are unjust and diabolical. No true Liberal or moral man should uphold either of them.

But the meanest of all the methods of raising public revenues is that of fining people who violate the law. A man gets drunk, or beats his wife, and society, under the pretext of correcting the wrong, takes a portion of his property from him. If there were only two families in the world and the head of the one family should get drunk, or beat his wife, would that justify the head of the other family appropriating his neighbors cow? Can two wrongs make a right? Can society improve the morals of the individual by taking from him property to which society has no claim? Society has no more right to property that it has no claim to, than a private individual has, and the fact that a man does wrong does not giv society any moral right to his property.

With the exception of the poll tax, about which I need say nothing, the only remaining tax to consider is the land tax. We hav seen that people pay the tax upon consumption in proportion to what they consume, that they consume in proportion to the size of their families, and that it may be regarded as a fine levied upon people for marrying and having children. We hav seen that they pay the tax on improvements in proportion to how much they improve or work, and that it may be regarded as a fine placed upon people for working. But people pay the tax upon land in proportion to the amount and value of land they occupy. The only way to avoid paying the tax on consumption is to liv single, or, if married, to liv without having children. The only way to avoid the tax on improvements is to stop working, liv in idleness. But the way to avoid the land tax is not to occupy more land than one needs. The one crying evil of this country is that the land is being bought up and held by those who do not need it and do not want to use it. In the state of Michigan, for example, there are 36,000,000 acres of land, 28,000,000 of which are held by their owners in an unimproved condition. Now, if we should increase the tax on land values the only way the owners of these lands could avoid paying it would be to let go of the lands. Bnt this, instead of being an evil, would be the greatest blessing that could possibly occur, for then the lands would be open for settlement by those needing them for homes. If we would abolish the tax on consumption and on improvements and raise the $493,000,000 now raised by those taxes, on land values, in less than ten years there would not be 1,000,000 acres of unimproved lands held by private individuals in Michigan; 27,000,000 out of the 28,000,000 would either be owned by small farmers or else added to the public domain. It would be the same in all the states of the union, and young people would not then hav to go fifty miles from civilization to find government land on which to start homes. Nor would they hav to pay anybody else for the privilege of locating on unimproved land.

Let those who advocate a tariff, or any tax on consumption, understand that they are advocates of immorality, of prostitution, of fœticide, of poverty, and all the evils of a degraded state of society. Let them understand that they are opposing the principles of freedom and a higher and grander civilization. Let them understand that there is only one honest and just tax, and there never can be any other, and that is the tax on privileges, the tax on land values, on mines, and everything which nature has given for the equal benefit of all. Raising our public revenues from these things is the simplest and most effectual method of making these things public, or, in other words, dividing them equally among all, as they should be. J. G. MALCOLM.

Topeka, Kansas.

Mr. Walker Explains.

Yes, "Mr. Walker's coming around"—coming around to correct some of your little mistakes, friend Macdonald.

It may hav been the "Milwaukee platform that we [you] had in mind when replying to Seward Mitchell," but it was not the Milwaukee platform that I had in mind when writing "Re-forming the Lines," and that was the article which you first criticised, and in that criticism you made no reference to the Milwaukee platform. Mr. Mitchell attacked you, not because of anything that you had said, or even hinted, in regard to my position on that platform, but because you antagonized me partially in regard to the obscenity statutes.

Here is the clear and indisputable proof of this. Mr. Mitchell said: "Sir: To defend a principle do I take my pen to address you. I read with interest your criticism on E. C. Walker's position as stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 31st."

Now, this was the "position" of mine which you had assaulted. Let the reader turn to THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 31st and he will at once perceive that that "position" in no wise trenched upon the Milwaukee platform, that it had to do solely with the obscenity statutes. It is no use, comrade; it is a clear case of "mistaken identity" on your part.

So much for the original subject; now a few words in reference to some other matters which you brought up in your last article. It is true that I accepted a position on a committee on political action, appointed at the St. Louis Congress of 1882. I was yet slightly imbued with state Socialistic ideas, though in an informal meeting of that committee at the rooms of Dr. and Professor Severance I took decided grounds against any new plank that should commit the League to political action in defense of principles for which I subsequently refused to vote at the Milwaukee Congress. And during the year, in my correspondence with Messrs. Garrick and Stephens, members of the committee, I found myself at variance with them on almost all new planks proposed.

When the time for holding the Congress of 1883 arrived I had become convinced that political action was no part of the League's proper work, and I started for Milwaukee intending to make a fight against most of the resolutions which I had reason to believe would be submitted, and which were submitted. But I was coming down with malarial fever and was unable to activly participate in the deliberations of the Congress. I was not present at all the sessions, and when there was scarcely able to keep my feet, speaking but for a few minutes twice, and voting but a few times. If I remember rightly, I found myself in the majority but twice, once on the adoption of the famous Seventh plank, and again when a proposition to levy a compulsory tax upon all members of local Leagues for the support of Man was voted down.

As to the "thirty new propositions," it is necessary to say that several that are called such are directly or indirectly derivable from the old platform of the League, while as to the one-third of these which I am credited with supporting—why, they exist only in the imagination of our genial editor. But suppose that more than this was true, suppose that I had favored all the propositions, "new" or otherwise, what then? Still the statement, "a large number of side issues," would not hav been justifiable, for neither Mr. Mitchell, I, nor Mr. Macdonald, in his first article, had the slightest reference to the Milwaukee platform.

"Had the platform been entirely Anarchistic, anti-prohibitory, and radical on the marriage question," Mr. Macdonald thinks that I would hav been satisfied. My good sir, had the majority of the delegates been Anarchists, there would hav been no vote for political action at all. Then we should hav had none of this talk about a political platform. Try again.

As I said in my previous article, I am not anxious to hav the League commit itself on the liquor traffic question, and I had no hand in introducing that plank at Milwaukee, but voted for it in preference to remaining silent and dodging the issue.

And the "marriage question!" Who said anything about that? That charge is an old one, owing its paternity to Mr. H. L. Green, and it was born some time late in the fall of 1880, shortly after that gentleman's ignominious defeat at the first Chicago congress. It was as true then as it is now, and it had not then, nor has it at this time, even a bowing acquaintance with the facts. I never hav tried to influence the actions or utterances of the League on the marriage question. I never spoke in any of the four congresses which I hav attended upon that subject, nor introduced a resolution touching it.

Nevertheless, it is my undoubted right to do either or all of these things, and I may yet; but up to date there has not been the slightest occasion for the accusation. E. C. WALKER.

Liberal Principles and Orthodox Practices.

"The kingdom of heaven" and the republic of man are based upon opposit principles and purposes. In attaining to the one we are to "do all for the glory of God;" while the other is based upon the glory and grandeur, the worth and significance, the growth and enjoyment of man.

God-ism is a pyramid inverted, with its base in "airy nothing," while man-ism, or humanity, has the broad earth or universe for its basis, and its superstructure will be a fully developed selfhood or manhood. Gods and devils must be killed, that humanity may liv. As truth and science advance, so error and mythical beings recede and vanish. The living temple of humanity of the future must be based upon the firm rock of nature's truth and her higher law of right, justice, and humanity.

How many who call themselvs Liberal are truly and fully inspired by humanitary impulses, and the higher and better life to which their professed principles, when practiced, will lead them?

The true and consistent Liberal will not only oppose orthodoxy with tongue and pen, but denounce, and renounce, all its dishonest and unmanly practices, laws, customs, usages, fashions, and institutions. The work of Liberals has been, so far, necessarily distinctiv, but it is time they began to be constructiv—and try to practice what they talk and write. I care but little how Liberally a man talks while I know that he is scheming to get something for nothing, to liv off from the labor of others—who is a land-monopolist, usurer, or belongs to any ring or corporation that robs and enslaves the wealth-producer, and is thus a God-ite in character and practice, and not a Liberal or humanitarian. I worked two years in this county to get up a Liberal League, and when it was organized some its members refused to pay twenty-five cents to get a charter, and so we "played out."

The truth is, not a few Liberals (?) are so pervaded by the spirit of greed that they hav no deep and abiding love of truth and humanity. The love of the "almighty dollar" is "spread wide and deep," as Blair says, "over the soul." Their Liberalism is a negativ, passiv power, a "light under a bushel." Oh, if Liberals had the zeal and enterprise in the cause of humanity which the orthodox hav in "the cause of Christ," what a power they would be! We would hav five papers well sustained where we now hav one struggling to liv. We would hav ten times as many free halls and lecturers. We would hav a national university of a thousand students, where naught but truth and humanity would be taught. We would hav a capacious and comfortable retreat for the infirm and aged veterans who, like myself, hav pioneered in poverty and persecution, and "borne the heat and burden of the day." We would hav co-operativ industries, where the Liberal laborers would be justly paid and receive their own. Were Liberals organized and combined as are their enemies, the Nine Demands of Liberalism would be respectfully heard and considered, and soon granted. Liberality is, in fact, a mighty force, but as yet mostly latent and unorganized. Very little of that force is yet in working order. Liberals are so different in the kind and degree of their Liberality and reforms that they often obstruct and oppose each other.

When we are all impelled by the right motivs, and pervaded by the true altruistic, instead of the egotistic, spirit, we shall feel that humanity is our objectiv point, and to make all free and happy, and supply all wants, and help each other, is the only real life worth living.

O ye Liberals who can spare much, and hav enough left, who wish to inaugurate the anti-orthodox, human life on earth, and develop true manhood, I implore you to realize the joy of doing good, to giv that you may reap more abundantly. Let us liv and act like Liberals, not bigots. J. H. COOK.

Excursion Rates to Chautauqua.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: There is hardly a town of any size in the Northern states from which there are not established excursion rates to Chautauqua. These tickets can be used by persons desiring to attend the Freethinkers' Convention. Allow me to giv a few of these rates from some of the principal towns:

The Laws of Logical Proof.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It has been with some degree of interest that I hav watched for what to my mind would be a satisfactory answer to those Christian believers who deny the force of Infidel or skeptical arguments on account of their negativ character.

While I am ready to admit that skepticism as to any positivly established religious belief must necessarily be negativ, yet to fully comprehend the subject it seems necessary that we first understand exactly what relation skepticism really bears to such belief. Were we discussing the merits and demerits of affirmativ as compared with negativ evidence on a legal question, from a legal standpoint, these objections might hold good, but they will hardly apply to religion. All laws brought into existence by man, whether by legal enactment or established by usage, and whether observed by savage or civilized societies, are artificial and arbitrary, and supposed to be based upon the principles of justice and equity, the violation of which renders the transgressor liable to prosecution; but the evidence in the case is not to prove whether the law itself is based on certain principles, but whether he has actually violated a law already established and understood. Therefore positiv evidence proving a different fact may be necessary as rebuttal or as an offset against the affirmativ. But if we were absolutely ignorant of law, and knew nothing either as to the intent or meaning of the laws given by the great law-giver Lycurgus, except what we learn by studying the effect produced on those who lived under them, it might be a long time before we would be able to prove affirmativly their exact intent and force, while many probable or assumed theories might be positivly asserted.

Thus it is especially with unenlightened or primitiv man in his study of religion and natural law. His conclusions must be drawn through inductiv reasoning, much of which as he advances necessarily negativs previously established beliefs. Being ignorant of causes, he mistakes appearances for the real, and accepts effect as cause, upon which he builds a pyramid of positiv deductions, and, like the student ignorantly starting out with wrong figures in a problem, his error continues to increase as he proceeds; yet positiv evidence to his mind of its correctness lies in the fact that his additions and subtractions hav been made strictly in accordance with mathematical rules. Let us take as an illustration the savage who believes his own shadow, as well as the reflected image in the water, to be spirits, and that the echo is the voice of the dead, and determin, if possible, what part negativ truths play in the evolution of mind from the savage to an enlightened state, assuming, as we must, that superstitions are gradually dispelled in proportion as a better understanding of natural law is had. When the ignorant savage believed his shadow to be a spirit, there was no skepticism to negativ the belief, and to him it became a fixed fact by actual observation as presented to his senses. But when the laws of light became better understood, what was proven? Simply that the absence or the absorption of light causes shadows, a positiv scientific fact, it is true—but no positiv or conclusiv evidence to him against the existence of spirits, even in the form of shadows, because spirits are not supposed to be governed by natural laws, and would be as likely to appear in the form of shadows as any other way. Now, if his belief in spiritual shadows has been shaken by science, there still remain reflections, in regard to which science may be as much in the dark as religion, therefore with the ignorant and superstitious they must yet be regarded as spiritual. There is no positiv evidence to the contrary, and the fact that skepticism and science fail to bring such proof becomes one of the strongest arguments in its favor.

In the absence of generalized ideas no grounds for skepticism exist, and there is not lacking positiv proof that the reflected image is a supernatural existence.

As yet there is but one way for a skeptical thought to hav crept in, and that is to look back and remember how he was deceived as to shadows—so might he not be mistaken as to reflections?

But the superstitious were never known to reason thus. It is the nature of religion to let loose when it can hold on no longer, and then again to fortify just beyond the lines gained by natural philosophy.

Now when science has made another stride, and is able to show philosophically that reflections are appearances caused by the reflected rays of light in a natural way, what has been done?

Simply one more fact has been added to the scientific world, and possibly seeds of skepticism sown among believers in old errors. But it has not been proven that spirits cannot, nor do not, actually appear in the pool over which he stands; and should religion solemnly affirm that departed spirits do appear in this manner, Infidelity would be powerless in offering a single positiv proof to the contrary; because science deals exclusivly with natural things, and can not penetrate the spiritual realm for its evidences, therefore scientific facts can only displace religious assumption by their negativ influence, and notions of the supernatural can be removed only by long familiarity with negativ truths. Yet, after having become familiar with the interpretations of science as to shadows and reflections, having learned to look upon them as simple and altogether natural, and having forgotten how ignorant and superstitious he once was in making these a part of his religion, he triumphantly points to the towering cliffs, from whose craggy walls responsive shouts are returned to him who calls, seemingly to challenge the skeptic for an answer.

During the long childhood of mankind and the tardy development of natural science the mind became fortified in its belief of the supernatural, and the echo, in the absence of correct data, like many other unaccountable things, became a positiv spiritual phenomenon.

But when, after long ages of experience, science is able to explain echoes upon philosophical principles, let us again ask ourselvs what kind of evidence wrought this change in belief. Was it not the development of a positiv scientific fact, the effect of which was to stimulate negativ thought, instead of any attempt of proof that ghosts do not or cannot answer him who calls in this identical manner?

When the mind becomes fixed in the belief of any supposed supernatural phenomenon, which, from its very nature, cannot be positivly disproven, nothing but the negativ effect of some other real or supposed fact can cause a change in belief.

Let us now come down to a period in which we may hav a better realization of religious credulity in superstitions that were established by positiv evidences—to the time when bad spirits were known to be the torment of almost every household; when in every churn was found a witch, and in every boiling-pot a hideous tormentor or when demoniacal spirits rode every storm-cloud, and innumerable witches twirled through space on broomsticks. No demons in hell, nor angels from heaven; no immaculate conceptions, nor heavenly ascensions; no risen Christ's, or crucified gods, ever presented such a phalanx of positiv proof in their support as witchcraft is able to boast. Not only is it fortified with the evidence from priests, but from the humble and honest citizen. Not only do we hav the word of honest Christians, but evidence upon oath of the most trustworthy individuals. Not only is the truthfulness of witchcraft testified to by legal enactments, but by holy writ. Against the blighting curse of these witches high courts of justice hav lent their protecting arm—not in the support of truth, or in defense of the helpless, but in obedience to a positiv religious idea. Innocent men and women were made to pay the death penalty upon the evidence of the best and most devout Christians. Indeed, was there ever a belief in supernatural agencies better attested by affirmativ evidence?

Now, will he who harps upon the negations of skepticism inform us when, where, or what positiv proof was ever produced that witches did not ride through air on broomsticks; that those who were cast into the water and rose to the surface were not possessed of devils; and that ghosts and hobgoblins are not actual existences? But we do not believe in them now. And Why? Is it owing to any positiv evidence brought against it by religion? The Bible said, "Suffer not a witch to liv," and Christians followed the imperativ command. But in spite of positiv evidence and divine commands, the gradual blending of skepticism and common sense in which the masses learned a reasonable and rational interpretation of natural phenomena has forced out the most positivly proven superstition with which mankind was ever cursed.

Now, I am aware that all religions when they become unpopular are regarded as superstitions. But can there be shown a single instance where religion ever freed itself from a superstition without its votaries first becoming skeptic, or by giving weight to negativ proofs?

Truth will bear us out in the statement that, with comparativly few exceptions, twenty-five years ago the entire orthodox world believed in the existence of a literal hell of fire and brimstone, where wicked souls were punished "according to the deeds done in the body;" where it was taught that "the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched;" where the "smoke of their torments ascendeth up for ever and ever." Few in those days had the hardihood to express a doubt in the existence of that awful pit which Jehovah declared was "prepared for the devil and his angels." But it is nevertheless true that in our day it is almost as difficult to find a man who will admit that he ever believed in a literal hell, as it is to find a slave-holder who will admit that he once defended negro slavery because of its divine establishment. Now, why this decline in faith? Why should the interest in an institution whose stock till recently had been at a premium—it being so valuable in saving sinners—meet with so sudden a decline? One explanation, however, may be given, namely, that Farrar, Beecher, and other skeptics had been watering the stock with the negations of skepticism, until many of the lesser shareholders began to entertain doubts whether the whole might not be merely a positiv superstition, especially since Col. Ingersoll has been able of late to make more money out of it than the clergy.

Now will some believer inform us what kind of evidence we hav, and from whence came the proof, that a lake of fire and brimstone does not exist? Hav we not the same high authorities in its favor? Has there ever been any positiv proof to the contrary? Can there be any such proof, except as some positivly assumed or demonstrated fact or facts tend to negativ such a belief? Nevertheless, all along down the line religion shrieks: "Negations!" "What has skepticism done to enlighten man?" when, in fact, it is the negations of skepticism that religion dreads, because this is the rock upon which religions hav more than once gone to pieces.

It is true that skepticism has not been able to bring positiv proof from a religious standpoint that the world was not made out of nothing by a personal God about six thousand years ago, but skepticism has demonstrated a positiv scientific fact which negativs such a belief, and stamps it as a positiv superstitious error.

It is true skepticism could not giv positiv proof to one viewing it from a supernatural standpoint that the earth was not made flat, and that the stars were not set in a solid firmament, like so many brass rivets in a boiler-head, while the whole was held in position by the outstretched arm of an industrious Providence. But in the mind of a Copernicus was conceived a positiv scientific fact, which developed into skepticism, and its negations were found powerful enough to explode positiv religious theories.

It is true skepticism was never able to step upon the platform of faith and prove by eye-witnesses or positiv evidence that Sakya-Muni, the ninth incarnation of Vishnu, did not descend from heaven as a white elephant conceived as a five-colored ray of light, and that he was not borne from the right side of the Virgin Maya; nor has skepticism attempted to prove by positiv evidence that a ghost did not descend from heaven and hover over a virgin, or that the creator of a thousand worlds did not become a father unto himself. But skepticism has performed a greater and grander work. Instead of wasting its energies upon superstitious dogmas, it has erected the breastwork of science before whose facts religion stands aghast, and in whose ranks the enlightened mind is steadily moving on to truth. Positiv errors hav never been able to withstand the neutralizing effect of scientific knowledge. While science moves slowly, especially in a savage age, it does not stop to war against spirits, ghosts, or hobgoblins, but moves steadily forward, establishing a fact here and one there. It seeks not to prove or disprove positivly established dogmas. Skepticism cares not whether they stand by positiv assumption, or fall by the battering and grinding process of experimental knowledge. Thus one by one they go, while step by step the mind of man is freed. And it is from this view that religion has ever regarded skepticism its most deadly enemy. But this it has ever been, from the Bushman who had positiv proof of the spiritual entity of his own shadow, down to the enlightened Christian of to-day, in imagining the shadows of nature to be supernatural. But after skepticism has forced superstition, step by step, backward, in ages yet to come, there will doubtless still remain enough that is mysterious out of which to formulate positiv dogmas and supernatural religions. And partially established scientific facts must ever appear as negations to accepted theories until such facts become so well established and so overwhelming in their character as to preclude positivly assumed errors.

Liberalism in Marshall, Minn.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A more delightful state in which to travel in the summer time does not exist, as far as I know, than this, Minnesota. You will bear me witness that I hav been singing its praises in prose for the past dozen of years, and every summer season has found me, wh n practicable, moving up and down and across this land of promis and, unlike Palestine, fulfilment. Here among these lakes —Lake Benton, Lake Crystal, Lake Sylvan—the scenery is so enchanting that one has a longing after endless life to secure time enough to enjoy it all. As I passed near Lake Benton, on the railroad train, a gay party of young folks were tripping along from the tiny steamer upon which they had just taken an excursion all around the island to the summer resort hotel.

An old friend of mine, Dr. J. L. Armington, who formerly lived in Northfield, this state, and one of the attendants of my course of lectures there in 1870, wrote me the Macedonian cry to come and try my hand on Marshall. From Pipestone on hot Friday afternoon by rail and stage, I reached Elkton, D. T. Thence to Tracy, Minn., where I landed at 6:30 Saturday night—and no train on the branch to Marshall, for the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad spoils about two days a week on account of its superabundant piety. I had telegraphed the doctor that notwithstanding railroad delays I would get there if I had to walk. To three livery stables I went—all they hav in Tracy—and could not hire a span of quick steppers to take me twenty-one miles to my lecture appointment. Here was a fix. The liveries all engaged for Sunday rides. If the railroad was too pious, the Jehu's were not pious enough. A lecture course to begin on Sunday at three o'clock was at stake, as well as my word. It looked like a twenty-mile walk. In desperation, I turned to a drayman—"I want to hire a span to take me to Marshall." Said he, "I hav a brother who will take you there." At half-past four o'clock in the morning we were whirling over the prairie, and made the twenty-one miles in two hours and fifteen minutes, for which the doctor paid my driver five dollars. As I grasped him by the hand I said: "Doctor, it is fourteen years since I saw you. It seems good to greet old-time friends."

Marshall is a pretty prairie town, surrounded by a magnificent country. The orthodox churches hav a strong hold here, albeit there are many wandering goats that do not like sheep-pens. At three o'clock a fair-sized audience greeted me, and the attendance has steadily increased, although it is mid-summer, and short evenings. The fact is, summer time is as good for lecture work as winter time. We hav learned that the time to hold lectures is the whole year round. One of the most interesting debates I ever held was in the hot month of July, in Linesville, Pa., with the Methodist, Rev. A. N. Craft. It lasted twenty-four sessions, two hours each, two sessions each day. Men left harvest fields to come and hear. Camp-meetings held by Freethinkers, Spiritualists, and Christians, thronged for weeks together, show that the old objection that people are too busy in the summer to attend meetings has no force. Any speaker who can instruct and interest will find hearers at any time; he will compel a hearing.

Nearly all my supporters here are Spiritualists, which is the strangest thing that has happened in my public work for the past six years, ever since I hav taken up my heretical abode in "Doubting Castle." The family with whom I am stopping during the delivery of my five lectures are Spiritualists, Mr. Joseph Scott and wife, formerly of Lake City, Minn. Dr. Armington is a Spiritualist—the gentleman who engaged me to come here and stir up the orthodox pool. But they are the broad-gauge kind. They are not like orthodox sectarians who cannot affiliate with a man that does not believe as they do, no matter how much he may work for the good of mankind. The Spiritualists here are Liberal enough not to expect a man to muffle his convictions though antagonistic to their own. This is mental freedom. On no other platform hav I consented to stand during twenty-four years of public speaking.

The National Liberal League.

The Nine Demands of Liberalism and complete secularization of our government can be secured, thousands of honest hearts be released from the shackles of superstition, and the Liberal League become a mighty power for the defense and promotion of the freedom and happiness of mankind, if all Liberals will but earnestly unite and work—not for self and pet notions, but for the general good.

One of the great needs of the National Liberal League is a lecture bureau, so that loss of time and long journeys to and fro over the same ground may be avoided, and the cost of lectures materially lessened. Opportunity should be afforded for consultation and mutual instruction of its lecturers in regard to the services required of them, and the best and most effectiv methods of work. Instead of the repetition of the same manuscript or stereotyped matter at all places, the bureau officers should consult with the leading Liberals of the place in regard to the wants and condition of the people. Then select the most available lecturer, who shall prepare to speak on just what shall especially meet the wants of that particular time. Explaining the aims and objects of the League, and inducing all who are in favor of the secularization of our government, and the Nine Demands of Liberalism, to become members of the League, should never for a moment be lost sight of.

The work on the rostrum, although its importance cannot be overrated, is really but a small part of the labor League lecturers should do. Their whole time while in the field should be devoted to arousing a spirit of emulation in the work of distributing Liberal literature, encouraging the workers, awakening from apathy the indifferent, convincing the almost persuaded, soliciting donations from the affluent, and inducing all to become activ, zealous members of the League. Lecturers should diligently study and be prepared to advise members in regard to the best, most economical, and efficient methods of distributing Liberal literature, and they should, in every place they visit, both by precept and example, encourage the faithful, persevering attention to this work. The printing-press is the great chief educator, and is really our main reliance. Every lecturer should be an agent for the sale of Liberal and scientific books, as well as canvasser for our leading Liberal papers, and use diligent endeavors to induce all to subscribe, and pay in advance, not alone for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and two or more of our other leading periodicals, but urge upon all able to do so the duty and advantage of taking extra copies to loan to friends and neighbors, who thus in their turn will become subscribers. By so doing our lecturers would promote the happiness of our patient, hard-working, long-suffering Liberal editors and publishers, confer vast benefits on those they visit, and help double the numbers of the League. But while efficient officers and lecturers may be very great helps, and our dependence in time of special need, the main dependence of every Liberal should be on self, all doing their very best, all they can, all the time. In every school district in which five Liberals reside, why not at once meet and organize as a Liberal League, commence holding regular weekly meetings, and, if no suitable hall can be obtained, meet at each other's houses? Seek to attain independence; develop home talent. Let each one commence canvassing for our Liberal papers, and loaning Liberal books and pamphlets. Then at the meeting relate experience and items of interest. Name subjects to read up and discuss. Should several be suggested, decide by lot. Let one be appointed to make an opening speech of fifteen minutes; then hav five-minute speeches, pro and con, and the chairman keep all sharp up to the subject and time. Strive to excel in making all speeches easy to be understood, and, above all, interesting to the children. If there is any musical ability—vocal or instrumental—cultivate it to the utmost. Remember success in any enterprise can only be attained by vigorous, persevering effort. Many a noble enterprise has failed from lack of unity. Energy and slackness are equally contagious. Some fear that at best they could accomplish but very little, so they do nothing. Yet if all will do the little they can, the grand object will be speedily attained.

CHAS. B. REYNOLDS.

The Incorrectness of Vivisection Reports.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., makes so misleading a statement in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 2, 1884, and one so eminently unjust to the anti-vivisection cause, that I must beg a brief space to "show it up." I think it is his "last straw," and he clutches at it most tenaciously; but, nevertheless, I must deprive him of it in the interests of justice and humanity. He triumphantly quotes the last English "Vivisection Report," to prove the extremely small amount of cruelty practiced in England at present, under the vivisection license act. I quote the following complete refutation of Dr. Foote's claim from a very able article on this subject by Miss Frances Power Cobbe, foundress, and, for nearly ten years, honorary secretary, of the Victoria Street Society for Protecting Animals from Vivisection. It appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette of June 17, 1884, and was reprinted in the Zoophilist (the organ of the society) for July, 1884.

"But there is a reason for something more than vague suspicion of the untrustworthiness of these roseate returns. It is, that during several years, when Mr. Busk has cried 'Peace! peace!' to the compassionate heart of England, there has certainly been no peace to the unhappy victims of vivisection. In the returns issued in 1879 for 1878, the inspector says that 'in sixteen cases alone is there reason to believe that any considerable amount of suffering was directly inflicted.' This, however, was one of the years during which Professor Rutherford was activly carrying on those experiments on dogs which hav been denounced on all hands as of almost unparalleled severity, and of which his own reports are to be found in the British Medical Journal of 1877, 1878, and 1879. Again, in the inspector's report of 1882 for 1881, Mr. Busk, after mentioning the inoculation experiments performed during the year, goes on to say: 'In the other experiments of a different kind the only pain endured would be that attending the healing of a wound and the necessary confinement, or, in some cases, by the action of drugs administered. The number of cases in which trifling suffering of this kind was caused might be ten or twelve.' Yet in that same year of 1881 there took place at Cambridge, according to Professor Michael Foster's Journal of Physiology (January, 1882), the whole series of Dr. Roy's experiments on dogs, which included displacing the spleen, and dissecting out all the principal nerves of the body, and irritating them for hours; experiments which hav been described by an experienced physiologist as 'truly awful,' and of which it is enough to say that the reflex actions described could not hav been obtained from animals rendered insensible by anesthetics.

"Such is the confirmation which Mr. Busk's reports receive from some of the few authentic extraneous sources of information to which the public has had access!"

And, again, in another portion of the same article (Miss Cobbe's):

"In the above remark, that Mr. Busk is a 'great partisan against the anti-vivisection movement,' Mr. Reid was supported by an official letter in my hands, wherein Mr. Busk styles that movement a 'senseless and mischievous agitation.' With this knowledge of his sentiments it is not uncharitable to suppose that when he, a wealthy gentleman, undertook the inglorious and (if fairly carried out) invidious office of inspecting the doings of his brethren, members of the Royal Society, and other physiologists, Mr. Busk was moved rather by a desire to see justice done to science, of which he is a votary, than to animals, for whom he has never, I believe, manifested the smallest sympathy."

A pretty man, certainly, to put on guard over a body of vivisectors to see that they did not exceed their license! About a parallel to that of "a good shepherd" (in this case the British government) selecting a supposably amiable wolf to stand guard over a flock of sheep, said shepherd being fully persuaded that the wolf would keep off his brother wolves much more efficaciously than would a shepherd dog.

I am greatly surprised that Dr. Foote did not hasten to exalt Pasteur's recent (alleged) discovery of a cure for hydrophobia. That is the latest humbug put upon the tapis.

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

Honorary Member Victoria Street Society, Life-Member Great German League, etc.

P.S.—I second with all my mind the nomination of Col. Ingersoll for the president of the League. I believe his name would wield greater power than those of any twenty Liberals who could be named, and his eloquence is second to Shakspere alone.

Christianity and Progress.

How amusing it is to see with what dogmatic egotism our Christian believers cling to the idea that the Bible and Christianity were the only foundation of civilization, and claim that all progress and advancement in all that tends to benefit mankind originated in it: Not long ago I heard a Baptist preacher say in his very knowing and original style that if it had not been for the Bible and the Christian religion man would be no further advanced than a mule. I hav just been reading the St. Louis Evangelist (I think that truth seekers should read all sides), and I notice a piece from one who signs himself "B. H. B.," which, I presume, means "Big-Headed Blockhead."

He says: "Did you ever realize in all its force the truth that it is the freedom of the gospel alone which has made many of the inferior forms of freedom possible?" And again he says: "The political liberty of which we boast is in a large measure, if not wholly, due to the gospel of Christ." "Hume, who hated the religion of the Puritans, had the candor to confess that they had been the great conservators of English freedom, and American freedom is in a great measure the harvest sprung from seed sown by the Puritan fathers of New England."

"B. H. B." takes the position that because the Puritans as a class had faith in the gospel of Christ Mr. Hume stood ready to admit that all their noble efforts toward advancing education and freedom came from the Bible and their faith in its teachings. He might as well hav said, and with a great deal more propriety, that he knows the history of the United States because he had read "Robinson Crusoe." I would like to hav "B. H. B." inform us where in the Bible he can find any teaching that could hav suggested ideas of freedom and liberty. On the contrary, I can show, and Infidels are continually showing, that the Bible teaches physical slavery; and certainly our daily experience with such people as "B. H. B." shows conclusivly that its effects upon the minds of believers leads to a mental slavery not calculated in the least to stimulate that sense of political freedom possessed by our Puritan fathers.

He says again, "The best common school system of the old and the new world owes its origin to the Bible and the church of Christ." This last statement doubtless, at first thought, may seem to many quite true, but I propose to show it to be false. If it be so, then Christianity is indirectly the cause of Infidelity, because Infidelity is the direct result of education. Our common school system springs from a desire to educate our children, that they may know of themselvs the false and the true, and not be obliged to take somebody's say-so for it, as the hordes of church people do.

That desire for education was fostered by the art of printing, and for centuries the Bible was the book of instruction, especially among the poor. I doubt if the Mayflower had on board, when it landed on Plymouth Rock, any other book. Consequently the young were obliged to obtain their knowledge of reading and spelling from that book. Even in the past century the common schools of New England had no other books in school than the Bible, Webster's Elementary Spelling-book, and Daball's Arithmetic. The Bible was the reading-book, and was read three times a day, and the teacher was compelled to be a devout Christian that he might learn the young idea how to shoot, and then ye bigoted Godlings get up and tell us that the Bible is the foundation of knowledge. The history of the United States, history of England, or any other printed book, would hav done as well—and far better, because the youthful minds of our ancestry would not hav been poisoned by the dishonest dogmas of their teacher.

While it is true that some Christian denomination is generally at the head of educational institutions, it will not do to say that they appreciate education more than Infidels. The Christian church is and ever has been ambitious to convince the world of its faith. The educational institutions are generally founded by charity, and some denominational church generally circulates, through its ambition to get ahead of the others, a paper, and the Infidel, with the rest, pays his money. And our "B. H. B." tells us that it never would hav been done but for the Bible and the religion of Christ.

In all great movements for public good some organization is obliged to act, and until the Infidels of our country become better organized they will act with any organization to further their cause, which is to promote education and reason, which the Bible and the religion of Christ does not favor.

☞ We wish that our subscribers who are in arrears would make a special effort to pay up. During the summer months our book sales are small, and we hav to depend upon the subscriptions coming in to pay expenses, which are just as heavy now as ever. We know that business generally is dull, that "times are hard," but the amounts are so small individually that it would seem no one can be inconvenienced by paying his dues, while in the aggregate they foot up large, and mean everything to us. It is unpleasant to us to dun our friends, and money is never asked for till imperativly needed; now we must hav it to pay bills with. A good many hundreds of dollars are due on subscriptions, so we are not asking a favor, but simple justice and square dealing between friends. It is usual for papers to exact pay in advance, but we hav never adopted the rule, believing that Liberals are honest enough not to cheat the printer. But the accommodation sorely tries our resources, and the readers ought not to force us to wait longer than they can help.

The Bible in the Schools.

The writer of the following is in a hotbed of Christian bigotry, and on several occasions has applied for aid in his contests with the bigots, but no question is easier answered than this:

GLENVILLE, CONN., July 26, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you please state through your paper what you consider the best answer to the Christian statement that "If the reading of the Bible in the public schools does no good, it certainly does no harm."

Yours truly, H. J. M.

Leaving aside all considerations of good or ill, there are many reasons why the Bible should be excluded from the schools. In the first place, our government is not religious. The intention of the Revolutionary fathers was to separate church and state. That they are separated when the tax-payers are compelled to pay for the reading of a religious publication in the public schools is a preposterous claim. The school is a creature of the law, carried on for secular education only, and its use to teach a sectarian religion is a plain perversion of its purposes. As well might the Koran be introduced—"If it does no good it certainly does no harm," the Mohammedans might say. But the question is a much broader one than the mere "good or harm" of the practice. It is a question of principle. Section III of our Bill of Rights was intended to prevent the establishment by state legislatures of any state religion. This necessarily stops the teaching by the state of any religion, Christian or pagan. Yet the state is now compelling by law the reading of a religious book, and its reading is a teaching of the doctrins it contains. In most states compulsory education bills are in force. A child is bound to go to school, and of course bound to read the Bible. How can any one contend that in such cases our guaranty of religous liberty is not violated?

In a suit to restrain the teachers from reading the Bible in the common schools, brought by F. W. Moore, of Bloomfield, Iowa, the trustees in their own defense used this argument of "if no good, no harm," and quoted the opinions of several eminent gentlemen upon the subject. They also "considered the Bible merely as to its literary merits." In his brief in answer, Mr. Moore, the appellant, used the following sharp language: "We started out in this case with the proposition that the public school is not the place in which to teach any kind of religion, and we propose to stick to that text. In the wish-wash of unrestrained gush of section IV of appellees' argument there is an evident attempt to divert us from the true question at issue in this case. There is a great to-do made over what some men, not unknown to fame, may hav said about the Bible. Whether they said it or not, we don't know; no book and page are cited; some of the men purport to hav been sick when they used the language attributed to them. However that may be, their opinions do not prove the facts to be as they say. We lesser lights, unknown to fame, also hav our opinions, and are protected by law in them.

"Whether the Bible, 'considered merely as to its literary merits,' is a great and good book, is a question of taste, and this court may well refuse to consider that matter. It is a question for the literary dude, the expert in the esthetics of literature. A lie is a lie, no matter how gorgeously decorated; a saloon is a sink of iniquity, no matter how gorgeously furnished. If the Bible, as a literary production, is of the character claimed (and remember that that is only opinion), it is so much the more dangerous to the peace of parents upon whose children all its blandishments are used. We object to the Bible being read to appellant's children, or their being compelled to stay out of school to avoid it, and appellees answer, in effect, that it is one of the most taking and seductiv literary works in existence. A queer defense, certainly.

"Suppose these teachers should introduce into the school, as paper-weights, on the children's desks, a lot of Smith & Wesson No. 38 caliber revolvers, loaded. If we should attempt to enjoin their use in that manner they would probably urge in their defense that 'considered merely as to their artistic and mechanical merit they were unsurpassed; that as a source of esthetic delight, no other mechanism could for a moment compare with them; that they were not there to shoot anybody, but simply as paper-weights—very necessary things.' No court could for a moment consider such a defense. This same reasoning applies to the 'sacred songs' of which we complain.

"Now, this Bible is a religious book; it is so admitted on all hands; it is loaded with doctrins about gods and devils, and is liable to go off at any time. We complain of the matter of the book; appellees praise the manner of the book.

"We allege in our petition that the Bible contains many passages that are unfit to be read in a mixed assembly of people, and are especially unfit to be read in the presence and hearing of persons of tender age. Appellees do not deny this allegation, but try to break its force, by saying that they read such passages as are calculated to inculcate (what they deem) morality, purity, and honesty, and recognize and teach the existence of a God, a future state, etc."

We do not see, either, how anyone with a knowledge of what the Bible contains can say that if its reading does no good it certainly does no harm, nor how such a plea can for a moment be admitted. If it is wrong to teach falsehood, those who force a book filled with errors upon children unable to help themselvs are certainly doing harm. And before the Bible can become a fit book for children to study its truth must be demonstrated. Although revised many times, the Bible has page after page of filth certainly calculated to do harm to youthful minds. The book is the keystone of polygamous teachings, and has always been the inspiration of bigotry, the reference book of intolerance, the fountain from which flow narrowness, jealousy, and sectarian wrangling. It is inconceivable to us how anyone can gain the truth by studying a falsehood, become moral by poring over stories of immorality, or pure-minded through reading an obscene book. We know the teachers never require the children to read the bad portions; but do they for a moment think the child does not? The book lies on the school desks all day long, and the teacher cannot watch every scholar every moment to see that he does not surreptitiously glance at the forbidden pages. But leaving its immorality out of consideration for a moment, we do not think the Bible makes a desirable companion for a studying child. Before it is fit for that the erroneous physical errors must be eliminated. To say that God created the world by a word is unsatisfactory to the child, for even a child's reason will question the manifestly impossible. Who created God? comes as naturally to its lips as the question, what he made it from. The child who has seen the wriggling snake trying to crawl under a stone by the roadside as he came to school has hard work to understand how it ever talked; and it will take more than assumption of infallibility to make him believe that the forefather of the donkey cropping the thistles in the field ever preached a sermon to a man. It is cruel to make him say he believes this or go to hell. That 175,000 birds, from the humming-bird to the vulture; 3,600 animals, from a mouse to a mammoth; 1,300 reptils; and about 2,000,000 insects, were crowded into a box 550 feet long, 92 feet wide, and 55 feet high, with provisions enough to last over a year, and that they lived with only what air they could get from a little hole twenty-five inches square on the top, is very hard for the most youthful mind to understand. To be compelled to do this or go to hell seems to us as very cruel.

The Bible is crammed full of utterly incomprehensible mysteries, and yet it must be believed. It can not be expected that what furnishes innumerable points of controversy for learned theologians will be simple to school children, and the only object of sectarian school boards in placing the Bible in public schools can be to make converts to Christianity by bending the twig that the tree may grow up leaning toward the orthodox vineyard, so that the fruit can drop into the priests' wide-open mouths. In their eyes the end is so important that it justifies any means, however unconstitutional and unfair.

The Republic and the Church.

Mgr. Capel is out West, and has been lecturing to limited audiences. At St. Paul, the other night, he spoke to the text, "The Catholic Church the Best Friend of the Republic." The substance of what he said is found in the following:

It requires no small courage to venture on such a subject as I announce for my lecture this evening. It has been always and repeatedly asserted that the Catholic church is the opponent of liberty and progress as exemplified in American civilization. It is therefore a bold thing for me to affirm that the Catholic church is the best friend of the American republic. I trust that you hav all come here in one spirit, to hear the truth in a fair-minded way. In order to clear the way for what I hav to say, I will first consider an objection which I hav heard raised again and again. The point raised is this: If your church makes the best sort of citizens, as you say, why is it that they are so numerous in the prisons and penitentiaries? I do not admit the truth of the assertion that a majority of the inmates of these institutions are Catholics. I insist that we endeavor to educate our children up in physical, mental, and moral matters in such a way as to make them good citizens. The trouble is the American people hav demanded of us that we omit everything above the mental in school disciplin. As long as they prevent our carrying out our idea, they hav no right to charge us up with the consequences of their restrictions. Moreover, it is to be remembered that a large proportion of those within the sway of the church are foreigners, who hav recently come to this country, and hav yet to learn to obey its laws and be educated up to good citizenship.

I assert that the best and greatest friend that this country has is the Catholic church. There are three reasons why this is so: First, It is the essence of the Catholic teaching—that is, Catholic civilization to develop the individual. Second, It is the essence of Catholic doctrin to hold sacred the family as the basis of the state. Third, We regard all power in the state as coming from God Almighty, and so worthy of respect.

The recognition of the importance of the individual man is a distinctiv characteristic of the English-speaking races. We hold that the redemption of Christ is effectiv for each individual man, as if no other man existed, though we are often accused of making nothing of Christ and everything of the Virgin Mary. We look upon each individual man as a manifestation of God's glory. We believe that every individual man comes into the world with so much grace as will enable him to do the work given him to do. We believe there is an individual creation, an individual redemption, an individual work, an individual responsibility. We train our children from very early years to regard their individual responsibility, their capability of sinning and of receiving salvation and absolution. In impressing on the individual citizen his duty of avoiding ill and doing good are we not conferring the greatest benefit on the community at large? It is for just that end that every archbishop and priest in this country is working every day. It is charged that the only object of the church is to acquire territory, to extend its sway, to overthrow the Constitution, and provide for the pope what he does not enjoy in other countries. It is false. Our one object is to make men good, honest, and virtuous, worthy citizens here, and fit for the citizenship in the world beyond this.

I pass to my second point—the sacredness of the family, as the basis of the state. In the agitation of the matter of divorce you will always find the Catholic standing up boldly and repudiating the demoralizing influence of divorce. No priest will perform a marriage in which either party has violated a former marriage vow. Husband and wife may be obliged to liv apart, but if true Catholics, neither considers himself or herself free to marry again. Then we teach our children that they must love and honor their parents throughout life. In thus honoring and exalting the home and the family, cherishing the individual duty and responsibility, and providing for its proper unfolding in the home life, I again repeat my proposition that the Catholic church is proving itself the country's best friend.

The Catholic church says all power is of God. The parent has no real authority over the child except as it is given him by God. In like manner, the right to liv together in society and constitute a government is of God. The authority of your president is one thing, the fact that this man is president is another. It is not you that givs the power to your president, though you constitute one of your number to exercise the God-given authority. The Catholic church makes no contest with any form of government. Recognizing in the government the authority of God, we teach our people to respect and obey that authority, whatever form it takes. The state does not make the citizens, though the citizens constitute the state. The object of the state is to conserve to us our liberties and rights, only restraining them where one individual's liberties interfere with another's. The Catholic church does not interfere with the domain of the state in any way, but considers it its duty to teach me to respect its authority. Religion and politics do not conflict with the Catholics. In the matter of politics, the church bids every man to act according to the dictates of his own individual conscience.

Having thus gone over my three main points, I wish to touch upon one or two general features of the question. This is the most heterogeneous people on the globe. Representativs of every land and clime flock to your shores, and are to be kneaded and molded into a unified people. In this work of unification the Catholic church is playing a most important part. There is a struggle going on between capital and labor. Your public schools—I say it unreservedly—are fostering a disdain of common toil. Your girls coming forth from your schools are unwilling to stoop to domestic service. Your young men think that they are not expected to toil in the common callings. The Catholic church discourages all such ideas, and is performing a valuable service in developing a class of faithful, conscientious working men and women.

Mgr. Capel is a brilliant Jesuist, but if the foregoing is the best he can do for his client the case is desperate indeed. It certainly does require a good deal of courage to stand before even such unintelligent audiences as are usually found listening to Catholic orators and deliberately affirm that Catholicism is in any sense a friend to popular government and general education. But priests are generally credited with possessing elastic consciences, and this new proof was hardly needed.

Mr. Capel may himself believe what he told his hearers, but we doubt it, He is not the only Catholic in this country, though perhaps the ablest apologist in the lecture field. The Catholic prelates are supposed to speak with authority in their pastoral letters, and if this republic is receiving aid from that church, the utterances of the Cincinnati council are strange reading. That council, it will be remembered, stated plainly and authoritativly the attitude of the church toward the government of the country. A slight comparison of the principles there set forth with the claims of Mgr. Capel will enable all to see the hollowness of his pretensions.

A famous declaration, well known to Americans, proclaims that "all men are created free and equal." We were told by this Cincinnati council only two short years ago that this "doctrin is pernicious. God alone is free; the church is the interprter of his revelations, and men hav no right to reject it. Nor are all men equal," continued this council. "It is ordained by God that some shall rule and some shall be ruled. Those who are appointed to rule hav rights that subjects hav not. Bishops and priests are appointed to rule; if to rule, then they are above those whom they rule. The cry of equality is the cry of the idle and the weak."

Another most significant utterance, and one we desire to set out in contrast with Mgr. Capel's boast that Catholicism is friendly to republicanism, is this:

"With the popular doctrin that all men are equal, there is also steadily growing the doctrin that 'all power is from the people, and that they who exercise authority in the state do not exercise it as their own, but as intrusted to them by the people, and upon this condition, that it may be recalled by the will of that same people by whom it was confided to them.' This is not Catholic doctrin, nor is it the doctrin of the scriptures which teach, 'By me kings reign, by me princes rule, and the mighty decree justice.' 'Giv ear, you that rule people, for power is given to you by God, and strength by the most high.' 'Let every soul be subject to the higher power; for there is no power but from God and those that are ordained of God.'

"While on the one hand the Catholic doctrin thus distinctly teaches that all power comes from God, we must not be understood as teaching that the people are not permitted a voice in the form of government under which they shall liv; on the contrary we teach with the sovereign pontiff, Leo XIII., now gloriously reigning, 'that they who are to be set over the republic may, in certain cases, be chosen by the will and decision of the people without any opposition or repugnance to Catholic doctrin. By this choice the ruler is designated, but rights of government are not conferred, and power is not given, but it is determined by whom it is to be wielded. There is no question here of the forms of government, for there is no reason why the rule of one or several should not be approved by the church if only it is just and tends toward the common good. Accordingly, justice being observed, people are not forbidden to provide themselvs with that kind of government which is most suitable to their genius or the institutions and customs of their ancestors.'

"There is also a growing disposition among a class of Catholics to teach that in some things the priest receives his power from the people. There is also a disposition to draw lines, and to confine the priest within limits that neither God nor religion can permit. The priest is not appointed by the people, nor does he receive his power from the people. He receives his power from God, and the people are commanded to seek the law from his lips, 'for the priest's lips should keep knowledge.' 'He that hears you hears me,' said Christ, speaing of his priests, and 'he that despises you despises me.' 'Go teach' are words that leave no doubt as to the right of priests to teach, or the duty of the people to listen.

"Because the people supply the means for the support of religion they frequently assume that they, and they only, are to manage the temporalities of the church. Frequently even under the plea of assisting in the management of the temporalities, the laity also assume to dictate to the priest in spirituals, the more when he teaches the law of God on matters appertaining to government, or the duties of subjects to rulers. The assumption of this class of men is that in matters of state the priest must be silent, forgetting that governments and states, and the relation of citizen to citizen, must be founded on the law of God, and that the priest is guardian, and, under the direction of the church, the interpreter of the law of God, and that consequently in all matters of civil life appertaining to faith and morals the priest has a right to speak, and the people are required to listen.

"This will no doubt be a doctrin offensiv to modern Liberalism, that seeks to eliminate God from society, and to teach that all power comes from the people. But because a doctrin is unpopular it does not prove it untrue. Truth is often very unpopular. Neither Christ nor his doctrin was popular. Governments and states and peoples are alike subject to the law of God equally as the humblest. Governments hav no more right to do wrong than individuals. 'All power comes from God,' and the church is the witness and guardian of revelation, as well as the interpreter thereof. From her the world must learn the law of God, and the law of man must ever be subordinated to the law of God. It is untrue to assert 'that all power comes from the people.' 'All power comes from God,' by whom 'princes rule and the mighty decree justice.'

"Guided by these doctrins, Catholics can easily see that though they may be associated with the clergy in the management of temporalities of the church, yet they must never forget the reverence and respectful obedience due to their pastors, nor the loving and mutual co-operation due them in all the works of religion. Let, therefore, the laity heartily cooperate with the clergy, being ever mindful that in unity there is strength, and in love and harmony there is peace and union with God."

How Mr. Capel can justify his lectures with these plain words is more than we can see. If he is not ignorant of them—and it would be impudent to accuse him of being—he certainly is unscrupulous in his advocacy of religion.

A Contrast.

The managers of Girard College would do well to study the example of the editor of the London Secular Review, Mr. W. Stewart Ross. A gentleman who much admires his teachings having made over to him a house and grounds, together with nearly five thousand dollars, with which to conduct a secular school, Saladin (Mr. Ross's nom de plume) placed the money in bank in his own name and that of a Christian gentleman, who must countersign every check before it can be paid. This arrangement was entered into by Saladin's express desire, so that he can furnish the best evidence at any time that the benefaction never enriched himself personally, even to the extent of a single farthing.

The difference is great between the act of the Freethinking guardian of a Freethought school and the conduct of the trustees of Girard's magnificent bequests.

Editorial Notes.

A FEW weeks ago Dr. J. L. York visited Bozeman, Mont., delivering a series of Freethought lectures. The result was a League with seventy members. Comment is superfluous.

IN England some of the merchants find it pays to advertise themselvs as Freethinkers. The proprietor of the "Coach and Horses" attaches to his announcements "Freethinker and National Reformer taken."

CHARLES WATTS will reach this country Sept. 1st, in the Cunarder Gallia, which leaves Liverpool the 23d inst. He will accompany the New York delegation to the Cassadaga Lake meeting, at which he will deliver two or three addresses. He is open to lecture engagements, and may be addressed at this office.

WE hav received several copies of a Western paper containing a ministerial attack on Col. Ingersoll's character. The charges are a revamp of Clark Braden's mendacious pamphlet, and we cannot see that any good would come by further stamping them as lies. Braden is too dishonest to be authority, and the minister's influence too insignificant to need counteracting.

FOR exhibiting in a shop window copies of an English Freethought paper, the Sydney Tribune says the members of the Secular Association are to be prosecuted. The police, it says, "are on the track of these shameless blasphemers," and it hopes they will be sent to jail where they will be "brought to their senses." The Sydney Tribune is devoted largely to chronicling the doings of gambling sports.

THE Salvation Army in England hav been pounced upon so often that they hav put the following stanza in their songbook, and sing it lustily when arrested:

"There'll be no policemen there,
There'll be no policemen there,
In the mansions above,
Where all is love,
There'll be no policemen there."

THE complacency with which the Catholic church teaches one thing and practices another is seen again in the recent declaration of the Superior-General of the Jesuits, who says that secret societies bring "ruin" to Christian states, "while the Virgin Mother's help of the Christians has alone destroyed all heresies in the whole world." If there is a worse secret society in the world than these self-same Jesuits the world is not yet apprised of the fact. In view of the great number of heresies now rampant it looks, also, as though the statement regarding the Virgin was a little apocryphal.

WILLIS MCDANNALD, of Milton, Oregon, is making an effort to secularize the government of his state. To that end he has had petitions prepared, and wants the address of every Liberal in the state to whom to send them. We do hope that he will receive prompt and generous help in this reform. We are convinced that there are thousands of Freethinkers scattered throughout Oregon, and if they will put their shoulders to the wheel they can accomplish great good. It was much easier to prevent the extension of slavery than to put down the war it led to. So it will be easier to get religion out of comparativly new state governments than out of the old ones where it is so firmly intrenched. Let every Freethinker in Oregon write to Willis McDannald, Milton.

WE print this week Mr. Frederic Harrison's criticism of Herbert Spencer's Unknowable, with some incidental setting forth of his own interpretation of Positivism. Mr. Harrison calls the Unknowable the "Ghost of Religion." Our next issue will contain Mr. Spencer's defense of his Unknowable, with something more than an incidental attack on the "theology" of M. Comte, which he labels "Retrogressiv Religion." It is only fair to Mr. Harrison, however, to say in advance that a criticism of Auguste Comte is not a criticism of Frederic Harrison, who, while holding to the fundamentals of Positivism, is not a slavish follower of the eminent Frenchman, but a man his equal in ability, and in some respects his superior. The discussion is a big one, between big men, and all Liberals interested in "Constructiv Liberalism" will do well to read both men carefully.

J. M. WHEELER, associate editor of the London Freethinker, who was driven insane by the cruel imprisonment of his friends Foote, Ramsey, and Kemp, has recovered his reason, and is again at work. His affliction he owes to Christian bigotry and superstition; for the happy hours of recovery he has, he says, been indebted solely to Freethinkers. In resuming work upon the paper he writes:

"No thinking person can pass through so terrible an illness as mine without reviewing those great problems of life and death upon our ignorance of a complete solution to which the priests in all ages hav traded. My return to sub-editorial duties on the Freethinker is proof that my convictions are unaltered, and that I deem my best work lies in the old path of endeavoring to eradicate superstition. Without disparaging any who take part in the world's necessary labor, it seems to me that there is no nobler task than to aid in mental emancipation. Our worst enemies are always within. Superstition is the fellest of tyrants, blighting and devastating the whole life. Political and social reform are hopeless where the people are slaves to religious terrors. Everywhere freedom and progress hav gone hand in hand with emancipation from superstition. At the present time we hav a still worse enemy. Superstition is countenanced by hypocrisy. Many who hav given up the time-worn dogmas, and who in private entirely repudiate Christian nonsense, are foolishly afraid of avowing their unbelief in public. While these are playing at pretending to believe that they believe, the bigots are allowed to hav their own way. The clergy, enraged because they know that we know that they know they don't know, are banded to keep down Infidelity, which really means information upon things supposed to be sacred. They fight under the protection of a long established and well endowed organization. On their side are the wealth and inherited prejudices of ages—on ours, modern science and criticism, with new hopes and aspirations for the future of man upon this earth. It behooves, then, all who throw in their lot with the new cause to fight its battle earnestly and determinedly. No Freethought soldier can be spared. Recruits ready to speak out on occasion are wanted, and are happily appearing on all sides."

A Wisconsin Meeting.

The Wisconsin State Association of Spiritualists will hold its first annual meeting, for election of officers and other business, in Omro, Wis., Sept 5th, 6th, and 7th. The speakers engaged are A. B. French, of Clyde, Ohio, and Mrs. H. S. Lake, of California. The Cross Concert Troupe will furnish the vocal music. The Chicago & North-Western Railway will return all who pay full fare to Ripon or Oshkosh for one-fifth fare. The St. Paul road will not giv reduced rates, consequently those coming on that road will buy round-trip tickets. Hotel rates as formerly —$1.25 per day. Should the Wisconsin Central road giv reduced rates, will publish in time for those interested. All Liberals invited. A limited number will be entertained by the Omro friends.

MR. EDITOR: As I hav gone into the fruit-growing business here I would be pleased to correspond with a few readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who are in that business in California, Oregon, Washington, and other parts of the country. Am also in hopes to hear from parties in foreign countries, such as Australia, Japan, China, and southern Europe.

Yours truly, THOMAS PAINE FRANK.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., July 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will please find $3 to apply on my subscription to the good TRUTH SEEKER. My time was up the first of June. I was not waiting to be dunned. I had the money put away all this time for you, waiting to be able to go to the post-office with it. I am no longer young, and often very feeble in warm weather. This is my excuse for this neglect of you.

And now that you are in trouble I wish you to know that I sympathize with you with my whole heart, and hope all who are in debt to the Truth Seeker Company will send the small amount right away to you. ELIZABETH B. DILLON.

MR. EDITOR: Liberals must kill the devil—if he is ever killed—as R. G. Ingersoll did the policeman, only more so. Don't let them crawl off and die; kill them on the spot.

Can't you get up a good thing on the pagans of Madagascar? From the best information that I hav they are governed by the same laws that the Jews were in regard to their religion, and the missionaries had to quit the country on that account.

This is what I want to say, and say loud—Liberals, if you are going to do anything, unite and take the word of truth in your mouths and kill all the devils that you may meet, and do it quickly. Selah. S. D. GREEN.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, July 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for another year. I am happy to say I cannot do without THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is really the best paper published on this continent—allowing me to be judge. I hope you will excuse me for being so negligent in not remitting when due. Many thanks for your confidence in me.

The death of Father Bennett was a terrible blow. I could not hav felt it more to hav lost a brother, for I feared his place could not be made good. I really trembled for the dear old TRUTH SEEKER, for fear it might go down, but am happily disappointed to know that his successor is capable of filling his place so acceptably. There are few such men as D. M. Bennett in this world. D. BODIFIELD, M. D.

WHITEHALL, MICH., July 20, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.50. Please send TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL and "Answers to Christian Questions," and the balance apply on the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER. And now I will say a few words in regard to the old superstition called the Christian religion. The pietists hold meetings in our schoolhouse Sundays, and sometimes evenings during the week. The attendance is, as I am informed, from ten to twenty. We hav a Liberal Literary society here, that meets in the same house once in two weeks during the winter. The average attendance is about two hundred.

And right here I will allude to a reprehensible practice of my brother Liberals, and that is the practice of giving money that goes to sustaining the church. The old hag would die out in less than ten years if it were not for that most pernicious habit of Liberals. JOHN SHUEY.

CINCINNATI, O., July 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The last copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER contains much interesting reading. What has been said at the dedication of the Monument was well said. I much admire the structure. It looks unique, and is a fitting emblem to the memory of a brave man. I had much respect for Brother Bennett, although he gave me an awful scolding once because I would not believe in the dogma of a future state of existence. But all that is bosh, and I respect his memory just as if we believed alike. Since his death, I hav wished that he, if alive, could make known to me the bottom facts of this disturbing dogma. Nothing as yet has changed my views. They are sound to the core that death is the end of life. Materialized effigies are impotent with me. My sense is quite too hard for such bungling necromancy. It won't do.

Yours, etc., T. WINTER, Materialist.

WENTWORTH, DAKOTA, July 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find draft for $8. Please send me "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," leather bound, and "The Champions of the Church," leather. Last list of books received and placed where I think they will be most needed. Hav examined Col. Kelso's book, "The Bible Analyzed," and think it the best thing I ever saw. No one but a poor, worthless, blind bigot can read Col. Kelso's book without being impressed with the solid truths and sound reasoning given by him. As a reference-book I consider it priceless. My office has become headquarters for several stanch Liberals, and the calls for Freethought works are increasing daily. I am in hopes I can interest enough in the work so we can start a League here this fall. It makes the pillars of the church groan when they see me scattering such works as the last ones sent among their flock. But still I find that more and more of them come to me and ask for something to read.

Yours respectfully, W. L. HORTON.

LA CROSSE, WIS., June 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just discovered in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 7th that Mr. Watson has been reviewing my article on "Free Agency," and, as I think, contradicted himself. He says, "We act from choice freely," and then adds, "We are necessitated to act just as we do." If this is the case, where is our choice? And, to cap the climax, he asserts: "If I go to New York, I go impelled by motiv, and still I am 'a free agent to do just as I do!'"

Now, let me ask Mr. Watson a few questions. Can you believe that two and two make five? Can you believe that black is white? Prove that man can hate that which is agreeable, and like that which is disagreeable to him. Prove, also, that man by the force of his willing can think snow is black. Then you will gain your point. My opinion is, we never move a a joint or think a thought without being moved to it; and as in physics there can be no effect without a cause, so in morals there can be no opinions or feelings without cause. And what cause is in the physical, motiv is in the moral world; so that there is nothing free in the world. And, I will add further, man is the sport of circumstances, and circumstances are the sport of him. Your well-wisher, J. PETTEY.

WILLIAMSTOWN, OHIO, July 22, 284.

MR. EDITOR: The explanation of the Augusta, Ga., Chronicle of the modus operandi of Miss Hurst, July 19th, calls my own case to mind, and I will ask some astute philosopher to explain. I am what is called a medium for spirit manifestations. Through my influence or occult power, I cause a heavy stand to float through a room. I will then retire into a remote corner of the room, or even leave the room and shut the door after me, after saying to the controling spirits, "Do not let any person or persons cause that table (or stand) to touch the floor," and then I will defy all the human force that can be applied to cause it to touch the floor until I ask the controling force to allow it to be done. I will say, "Put that stand or table on Mr. A.'s, B.'s, or C.'s head," and it will be done instantly, notwithstanding all the opposing force that may be applied, and there will be no mistaking of the one named, though the room be crowded, as is generally the case. This I hav been doing for the amusement of the spectators, with scores of other manifestations. This power has only developed in me within the last six months, notwithstanding I am now in my fifty-sixth year. I do not attribute it to spirit power. Yours truly, B. D. EVANS, M.D.

LEMOORE, CAL., July 15, 284.

MR. EDITOR: If we understand aright, the indebtedness on the Monument Fund has been fully canceled. And in reading of Mrs. Bennett's devotion and deep solicitude, with attendant honors, for him in whom her very being was centered, sympathizing so truly in his grand life-work; and inasmuch as we rejoice in the monumental symbol reared to his blest service, in immortal token of the universal cause of spiritual liberty, we ask, as co-workers too in this benign field of living justice, that she accept our small offering to assist in beautifying the sacred spot consecrated in memoriam with that towering shaft to him.

Many thanks, Mr. Editor, for knowledge obtained of your early experience, and that of your brother. I am glad the mother soul voiced her devotional sentiments, that your interested patrons may learn of some possible struggle in early life in manly youthful ambition for so noble a cause. The mother love is the warp through her whole speech. It is right, it is well. Receive our tribute, editor and assistant editor, for the stand you hav taken in sustaining those mighty pillars resting upon your shoulders, received from those dear hands and that mind which established our glorious TRUTH SEEKER. Never may its future become darkened or its wide influence lessened, is the ardent wish of your faithful subscriber, SARAH GREGG FOX.

P.S.—It does our hearts good to look upon the picture of that fine monument. We hav ours already framed, and want, when they are ready, one of the lithographs, as an adorning presence in our home. With dear Elmina, we worship all beautiful things. S. G. F.

BURLINGTON, KAN., July 29, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER the remarks of Professor O. S. Fowler, as given in the Kansas City Times, in answer to Col. Ingersoll, in the first Baptist church of Kansas City. Why I request the publication of his remarks is because in 1846 Professor Fowler was denounced and anathematized as one of the vilest of Infidels by about all of the clergy all over the country; and I know whereof I speak, for I was a subscriber and an attentiv reader of the Phrenological Journal of that day, and I was admonished by our pretended soul-savers not to read it, for it was a very dangerous publication. But the Fowlers' writings were Homeopathic potions of Infidelity. Still, they in part commenced the evolution of our present force of Liberals. And I know for myself and others of my acquaintances, and about my age, that they first commenced the agitation of thought which is always the beginning of wisdom in our minds, and by which we hav evolved out of the quagmires of superstition.

CHRIS. BROWN.

PROFESSOR FOWLER CONCLUDES THAT THERE IS A GOD, AND THE SOUL IS IMMORTAL.

Professor O. S. Fowler delivered an interesting lecture last night, by request, at the First Baptist Church, to a large audience, upon the subject of "God and Immortality." Speaking phrenologically, Professor Fowler said there was ample evidence both as to the existence of a God and the immortality of the soul. The science of phrenology showed conclusivly that the mind of man was adapted to faith, just as much as it was adapted to food, or to light, which presupposed light. From the fact, therefore, that the mind of man was adapted to faith, it was a logical proposition that it must hav faith in something, which it acknowledges to be its superior. From the fact that man was provided with moral organs, ample proof was adduced that he was intended as a moral and religious being, and not merely as an automaton.

The moral organs were placed on the top of the brain, which went to show that man's moral nature was intended to predominate over everything else, and from the positions of the organs of intellect it was evidently intended that the intellect and the organs of morality were intended to be co-existent, and to work in harmony one with the other; and from the very fact of the existence of the reasoning organs it was proved that men should hav an intelligent philosophical religion, and not merely a blind and senseless faith.

Professor Fowler argued that the fact of the existence of an organ of adoration of the deity in man was absolute proof that there was a God to worship and to receive such worship, and it was equally true that such organs had to be used and exercised in order to keep them in full and activ existence. It was also necessary that the exercise of these functions should afford pleasure in order that the other faculties might be operated and work in concert.

The same arguments were applicable to the theory of the immortality of the soul. The continued and steady longing for a future life which existed in the human mind showed that there must be a counterpart. Human life was the steady instance of progress from its infancy to dissolution. After death men became superior beings. Their animal faculties were subordinated to their intellectual, which were perfected and spiritualized. In ordinary life age marked the increase of the faculties; therefore it was superior to youth, and young people were inferior to old people. It was impossible to believe that after man had fully developed his mental and spiritual faculties, and after the deity had raised him to an exalted pinnacle, that he would dash him into atoms, provided that immortality was the better thing. One of the faculties which was quickened on earth was the love which existed between parents and children; and in a future state this faculty would be perfected, recognition taking place, and a more acute intensity of the power of love being prevalent. Beyond the grave none of the faculties were destroyed, merely perfected; the limited human understanding would there be limitless, the desires satisfied but etherealized—the soul and mind, in fact, wrought out to their highest point of spiritual exultation and glorified immortality.

ARROWSMITH, ILL., July 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find one of Livezey's circulars. I think by the reading of it and its general ring that he has been converted to Infidelity. The very fact that he has concluded Talmage is a hypocrit is proof that he is sincere in what he says. Reprint his circular. It will speak for itself, and do the cause good. Score one more. Livezey says he knows "that Infidelity is as catching as cholera." He ought to know—he seems to "hav it bad" in this circular.

Respectfully, PENN KIRK.

LIVEZEY TAKES AN INFIDEL VIEW.

"Mr. Edholm, having lived among the Mormons for the last twenty-three years, and having been a close observer of their tendencies, comes out in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 19th with the rather novel proposition that Congress appropriate a few thousand dollars to pay a few Infidel lecturers to go out as missionaries to argue with the Mormons and spread the sweets of Infidelity over the acidities of their custom. This plan, as revolting as it may seem to the churchman, is certainly more humane, just, and even Christian, than the barbarous extermination policy advocated by hypocrit Talmage. For my purposes, insomuch as I hav found Infidelity the best vantage ground for my own reformations, I heartily approve of it, though I would regret the loss hereabouts of the missionaries. I know that Infidelity is as catching as cholera."

MOSCOW MILLS, MO., July 29, 284.

MR. EDITOR: With a light heart I am seated at my desk to express my high appreciation and admiration for your paper, the grandest and best reform journal in America, if not in the world. Long may its precious and glorious banner wave o'er the land of the free and home of the brave—until, at least, all the evil of the Christian church may be swept from the face of the globe. I can say without any fear of contradiction that the filthy, polluted jaws of the Christian's pitiful God are growing weaker all the while. In my community, Lincoln Co., the churchmen are so near being buried in and with the past that they hav no more preaching. There are many good Liberals here. They are young in the faith, but we all know the suckling babe has to crawl before it can walk. We hav thousands of Infidels in Missouri, but the most of them as yet keep still about their faith in Infidelity. Mr. William Foster, of this vicinity, says that we Liberals cannot prove that Infidelity has got one good principle in its platform. I told Mr. Foster that I would prove to him that our platform had not got any flaw in it—but Mr. Foster was not there. He would not argue the subject in question at all. Mr. Livezey, of Catonsville, Md., sent me one of his "Circulars to Infidels," stating that he silenced thirty or forty of our most scientific Liberal writers and lecturers of this country, Hon. Robert G. Ingersoll included. The civilized world knows that Mr. Livezey's statement is a black lie. I wrote an open card to the liar in question and told him to please keep his Christian slime at home. I suppose he has done so; at any rate I hav not heard from the sneak since.

Your for universal mental liberty, C. B. HUNTER.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., July 29, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Is our country progressing? It is doubtful. Why? Behold the untaxed temples of superstition, scattered in vast numbers over our beautiful land, where bigotry, superstition, and consummate nonsense are forced upon an enlightened public, through the indirect aid of state legislation. O shades of Paine, Franklin, and Jefferson! look down with scorn and contempt upon these theological cranks. The self-conceited Jo Cook, the wide-mouthed maniac, Talmage, the half-and-half go-as-you-please Beecher, and thousands of their stamp, are confusing the people in this enlightened nineteenth century. And with what? With beautiful selections from the holy scriptures. For instance—how God so loved the world at one time that he submerged it in water nearly five miles deep; and, later on, in order to persuade the world to "fear the Lord their God, and serve him, and cleave unto him, and swear by his name," allowed his servant Joshua to stop the sun, that he might see to exterminate his enemies. Sanctified nonsense! senseless blunders! A school-boy could make up a better tale. No wonder that the Jews were always in trouble and never succeeded in anything until their God forsook them. But our holy cranks tell us that the ways of God are past finding out. The more is the pity. What in the name of reason is the use of a God if we are never to understand him or find out his ways? But alas! we never shall, unless his partner, who is sometimes called the devil, divulges the secret, as he did when God lied about the fruit of the tree of knowledge. "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die," said God. "Thou shalt not surely die," said his partner. Now, who lied? For instead of dying in that day, it must hav seemed as though he never intended to die, for he lived to be almost a thousand years old. However, if the Westminster Abbey crowd don't succeed in finding out some of God's ways after spending about twenty years' time and several hundred thousand dollars, we may as well save our time and money and wait a few thousand years for a new revelation. But, my friends, we must hope that not only in our own country, but wherever Christianity has left its damning blight, there is or will be progress.

NELSON HUNT.

BUTLER, N. J., Aug. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I received book and tracts in good order. Was highly pleased with same, and was abundantly rewarded for so trifling a cost.

In addition to this, I will add the following feeble effort—one drop, as it were, in the falling of the great freshet of Free-thought, from which many may drink and be satisfied—and request its publication, if space will allow, in THE TRUTH SEEKER, for the benefit of all who read its pages and share its sentiments, and worship at the shrine of universal mental liberty.

OUR CREED.

Tune: "Safe Within the Veil."

Universal mental freedom
Is the standard of our creeds;
This we hold in brilliant colors;
'Tis the coming, pressing need.

Chorus:—Orthodox and priesthood fail
Since the bark of science set sail.
Drop the falsehood out of sight;
Liv for freedom, truth, and right.

Truth reclaims us from all darkness;
Frees us from the sword, the jail.
Error leaves our mental vision—
Science lifts the mystic veil.

The Christian's mental dream of heaven,
Paved with gold for human tread—
What an error to befall them,
When the earth reclaims her dead!

Martyrs of our creed hav perished;
Hav they lived for us in vain?
This the source of all progression,
And our high and noble aim.

GEORGE KRAHMER.

EL MONTE, CAL., July 18, 284.

MR. EDITOR: The last five-dollar lot of books came to hand in good condition, and is feeding crumbs of common sense to a few emaciated brains who are in need of a morsel of Liberal food in order to improve their mental health.

I see in your quotations from Article IX of the California constitution in your issue of July 5th that "No sectarian or denominational doctrin shall be taught, or instruction thereon be permitted, directly or indirectly, in any of the common schools of this state." Yet in this county, and, I think, all over the state, "Gospel Songsters" are used indirectly as text-books to teach Jew, Infidel, and all non-sectarian families' children that old orthodox myth, "Jesus is my all, and in him I trust." These Protestant hymns are sung three or four times a day, to mold the plastic brains of our youth to believe in the Christian dogmas, in order that when they grow up to be men and women they will think it a duty to help support the 81,-717 parsons, who toil not, neither do they spin. And only that many in these so-called free and republican United States! Think of the cool assurance they possess when they say to their sleepy audiences: "We [the preachers] are the chief engineers that run the car of progress that has enlightened and civilized humanity." While the real truth is, all they do, or ever hav done, is to hold up to the mental view of their deluded hearers an ideal painting, tinted, spotted, striped, and darkly shaded in the stale blood of a mythical Christ. Yes, from four to six times a week, not to mention protracted meetings, their hearers are washed, bathed, and pretendedly sanctioned in the blood of Jesus—a man who, if ever he did liv, was only a human being—taking the Bible evidence, for there is not a place in it where he said he was truly the son of God. Make all we can of the priestly story, he was only an itinerant preacher, who, parrot-like, repeated the maxims and sayings of his pagan superiors. As a doctor, if he lived in this age his laying on of hands and his clay-and-spittle treatment would brand him a quack. As a citizen (take the Bible story for it), he was a rebel to the laws of the land in which he lived, and only suffered the death penalty of the capital punishment, which was in his time the law of the nation. Like the two thieves, he was a malefactor (see Luke xxiii, 32), and died like any other Christian criminal, calling on his God to help him, instead of relying on the muscles of his legs to keep out of the sight of old Judas, his Christian pal, who turned state's-evidence against his chum. Query: Why don't the parsons say anything about the blood of Judas? He surely took an activ part in the salvation game, for he saved God from coming down from his throne and tramping about among the common soldiers and crying out, "My son, where art thou?" as he did when he wanted Adam in the garden. And then if Judas had not pointed out Jesus, who can (if Christians), doubt but Christ could hav escaped to the mountain, and there by praying and preaching succeeded in appeasing the wrath of his heavenly father, and maybe got a change of venue, and fared better outside of Pilate's jurisdiction? Then, if Christ had escaped the crucifixion farce, what a blessing it would hav been for humanity to hav saved the vinegar, gall, wine, myrrh, and hyssop, and many thousands of hard-earned dollars that hav been paid to the priests for the many shiploads of splinters and nails from the reputed veritable cross on which the Christians pinned their blessed redeemer! But how strange that the relic-hunters hav never found a little shoe, a bib, or tucker, or even one lock of yellow hair, that belonged to the infant savior! Why did not some taxidermist preserve one little sparrow that took wings and flew away when he was making mud cakes and mud sparrows with his playmate (see Apocrypha)? Can't they find anywhere one little pop-gun, or a little elder whistle, or one little box, or a jack-knife, a hammer, or any little tool used or made by Christ during his service as a carpenter with his father Joseph for eighteen long years? Strange! strange! not one of all these, nor even an emblematic one—not one fac simile! Still the priesthood can find an abundance of emblematic flesh and blood on every communion day. And they can commune as often as the chief of the band deems it requisit to re-swear his deluded followers, for fear they will mutinize and join in with those who uphold common sense and science.

J. E. CLARK.

MOUNT UNION, OHIO, Aug. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In our school district, which is chiefly composed of Methodists and United Brethren families, we concluded to hav a Literary Society started for the benefit of both children and parents, or whoever might choose to join the society. A protracted meeting was going on in an adjacent neighborhood a part of the time, and many of our members attended that, and thought it both proper and wise to favor the Literary Society with essays upon religious subjects, thickly interspersed with quotations from and eulogies upon the Bible, etc., which were quite edifying, no doubt, to the believer, and which the Liberalist or skeptic was no doubt expected to swallow whole, and keep his mouth shut afterward. But one of the members, being somewhat exercised, wrote and read the following essay, which caused as much of a sensation as though a thunderbolt had fallen in their midst:

"THE BIBLE.

"Inspiration is the good which shines into our souls from God, or from good in whatever form. And as God is good, the inspirations from him must necessarily be good and for our good. Truth, wherever found, is a righteous inspiration, and evil, as the reverse, should be denounced and eradicated. Why, then, should our love and reverence of any book lead us so far as to tolerate the bad, and call that truth which, were it by itself placed before us, we would shun and despise? We are endowed with discernment to discriminate right from wrong. Why not use it alike in all cases? If in our works on science and morality we find anything which, measured by our discernment of truth and right, would be found wanting, we relentlessly cast it out. But in an isolated instance we stick to the whole, both good and bad, of a certain book, and denounce to the bitterest end anyone who may question its divinity, and by so doing allow reason to be overthrown by superstitious prejudice. The Bible contains many true and beautiful things, but while it is looked upon as a divine book it cannot but be a curse to humanity. Were its teachings carried out it would be destructiv of the intelligence, liberty, and happiness of mankind. It has maintained slavery, burnt witches, beaten and frightened thousands of children to death, obstructed and denounced science and education, declaring that the wisdom of man is foolishness and that we can only get wise through faith and prayer, drugged the souls of its devotees to sleep, made them indifferent to the possibilities of human progress, destroyed the finest works of art, burnt the greatest libraries, encouraged licentiousness, degraded woman to a slave, upheld the monstrous infamy of polygamy, authorized Jesuitism, which says it is right to do evil that good may come of it, encouraged dishonesty and insincerity, made thousands insane, filled the heart of man with hatred for his own flesh and blood, haunted his mind with horror, and covered the world with blood. What other book can boast so long a catalog of errors and horrors? Yet we are told to peruse it prayerfully and these unseemly portions will melt away as the dew before the rising sun, and we will see and take it as a whole, will accept all between its lids. But is this our highest idea of right? Much of the very best contained in the book was uttered long before Christ came to earth. Why revere the copy more than the original? We are a people in captivity, held in thraldom by the teachings of our forefathers, who thought it sacrilege to utter a word against the Bible. But a day will come—yea, has already dawned—and the spell is broken, and men worthy of the name are stepping forth, daring to think for themselvs, halting not for ancestral belief, public opinion, or pecuniary advantage, ready to subscribe to no creed but to the truth and right. But the true brotherhood of humanity will never come save through the destruction of every idea of a God in whose name men hate and persecute each other, who encourages a man to do a wrong on a credit, who sends good men to hell and bad ones to heaven. These things hav done harm enough. They hav cast a shadow in the sunlight of the heart of every good and tender man and woman. We must not weave laurels round these absurdities for fear we may shock the sensibilities of those who hav believed them to be divine. Friends, regret not that the anchor has broken from the old moorings, and that you are invited to sail forth upon the sea of being in search of new truths. Many white sails dot the joy-crested billows before you; while those on board cheer each other in their search for a land of summer and beauty. What though you know not the end of the voyage? Truth will be your polar star, and the breath of love will fill the sail, and the joy of life your hearts, and a desire to do right and act grandly each one's part triumph over the old belief in the absurdities of an ancient production, with its contradictions and untruths, palpable to every close observer."

One of the members was heard to remark after the reading of the above: "That essay contained my sentiments exactly, but I should not hav thought it the place to read them." And why not? The religionists think all times and all places proper to dish out their hash to us poor Infidels, but if we return the compliment it is a terrible thing. For my part I think we hav held back, borne and forborne long enough, and it is now our duty as Liberals to put away our fears of losing our popularity and step manfully forth and defend our cause.

Respectfully, R. M. MCCALLUM.

TEMPERANCE "COUNTRY COOKING."

NEWPORT, ME., July 19, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: When Horace Greeley edited the New York Tribune he took a trip in the country among farmers, and when he returned he wrote an article for his paper on "Country Cooking," criticising severely the manner of cooking of farmers' wives.

I hav taken a great many such trips myself, one of which I hav just returned from, and for the benefit of your over-zealous prohibition correspondents I hav a word to say. I hav long been satisfied that the food question underlies the drink question—that intemperance can never be abolished until there is a radical reform in the kind of food people eat, but especially in the manner of cooking. It is no libel on anyone to say that at least three-quarters of all the food to be found on the tables of farmers is not fit to be taken into the stomach. My present feelings are nothing new on the all-important subject, for some five years ago, when I was in Washington, D. C., I offered a resolution in a meeting that "the stomach is the seat of war." Many times I hav since thought how I ever could hav stood up before an audience and offered such a resolution, but experience has proved the truth of my words, "the stomach is the seat of war"—that never until the people hav clean stomachs, made so by a more healthy and better-cooked food, can intemperance or war be abolished. That people's passions are set on fire by the unhealthy and badly-cooked food I hav not a doubt. I hav seen men sit down to eat fried ham when the thermometer registered ninety degrees in the shade, with a pint of clear fat in the platter, when I know that said fat was worse for their stomachs than alcohol. And most of the bread is only an apology for bread. The longer I liv the more I am satisfied that as an article of food pork is an abomination, and, as a physician once said, "fit only for savages." And where is this article, pork, which Christians take into the same stomach they do a part of their God, made? In a filthy sty, reeking with the stench of the hog's own excrement. And a large part of the food of hogs is eaten in a trough that is never washed, and thousands of hogs eat their food thrown in among their own excrements.

And this food is washed down with what Horace Greeley called "a muddy preparation called coffee." I am sorry to say that not only Christians, but Spiritualists, keep these filthy brutes, hogs, and eat them, and sell their nice lambs to the drovers because they are too ignorant to keep them for their own use. But this is not all of the sad story. A large portion of the men, and sometimes a woman—and a Spiritualist, too—use the twin abomination, tobacco.

And with this state of things universally with the young and old, our prohibition friends try to make themselvs think they can stop the spread of intemperance by law. Wait a hundred years, my friends, and your children will see your folly. I would not hav it understood there are no exceptions to this state of things, for there are—noble exceptions. But I do say that seventy-five per cent of the food taken into the stomach is not fit to eat; that it causes disease, insanity, and premature death; that fried hog, and the heating, poisonous grease that has come out of it, and is eaten by millions of gallons, has done more to curse the race than ever rum did; that all the laws that can be made and backed up by an army, and a navy as strong as the Spanish Armada, can never stop the tide of intemperance until the people hav clean stomachs.

When the seventy thousand priests in this country, together with the so-called temperance lecturers, will teach the people the laws of health, take up the questions of food, right generation, advocate shorter hours of labor, and an increase of pay for the same amount of work, the abolition of all laws that make usury legal, the abolition of the army and the navy, and many other reforms that must some time come, and then wait patiently for the people to grow up to a knowledge of these things, we may hope to see a better state of society.

The fanatical crusade to drive the people to become temperate is only retarding the real, the true, lasting temperance work, making it far more difficult to redeem mankind than it otherwise would be if they were saved by education, the world's true savior.

The above words, hastily written after hanging up the scythe are put on paper for the sake of doing good, and if they are not true, he or she who will point out their errors is my best friend.

SEWARD MITCHELL.

P. S.—Who is it that is going to be a traitor to the cause of liberty and an enemy to D. M. Bennett by proposing to get back into the Liberal League that detestable traitor, John C. Bundy? Does he suppose that D. M. Bennett has no friends left to remember the deep-dyed scoundrelism of Bundy and Abbot when they made their simultaneous attack on that grand and noble man when he was bound in prison? It is time enough to take back an enemy when he asks forgivness and shows signs of repentance. Look at the villainous attack on the pure and spotless character of Moses Hull and Juliet H. Severance by Bundy, and copied into Heywood's last Word. A person who will take the hand or be seen in the society of John C. Bundy is an enemy to D. M. Bennett and the cause of liberty. The attack that Bundy made on Mr. Bennett was worse than murder, and I hav more detestation for him than I hav for the miserable Comstock. Let him cleanse his foul soul before he attempts to appear in decent society. S. M.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

Her Birthday.

How well I mind me of the day,
Tinted with August gold,
I held her, laughing in my arms,
Our baby, one year old!
How fond I watched her infant charms,
And kissed her dimpled face,
While close I folded to my breast
Her form of matchless grace!

And when, on silver wings, Time sped
Twelve months again away,
Then sweetly lisped her loving voice—
"I two 'ears old to-day!"
Her little feet had learned to climb,
Her hands learned mischief, too;
Yet, watch and ward o'er her to keep
Was pleasure sweet and new.

And when three years had seen her mind
Unfold in beauty bright—
To her the earth a wonder-land,
An Eden of delight—
I kissed her pure and stainless lips,
Hoping, trusting, the while,
That she might never know earth's woe,
Its harshness or its guile.

Four years flew gaily, swiftly on,
Four joyous years of love;
With brilliant hopes and many plans
Each year was thickly wove.
Her prattling voice, her merry laugh,
Made happiness complete;
And music sweet was to our ears
The patter of her feet.

Five years old! her precious mind
Unfolded day by day,
And promis gave of gracious worth—
A gem of brightest ray.
Proudly we watched her onward growth,
As fled the hours away,
Nor thought we that our jewel bright
Was shrined in mortal clay.

Six years, at length, came quick and sure,
Rose-crowned and diamond-tipped;
As bright as though each year had been
In rainbow colors dipped.
In sympathetic grace she grew
A sweetest friend to be;
Before her words—"I love you, dear!"
All clouds would quickly flee.

Seven years old!—this August day
Is gay with birds and flowers;
The purple pansies bloom as bright
As when, in other hours,
We wreathed them on our darling's head,
With leaves of ivy green—
Herself the fairest, brightest flower
Our eyes had ever seen.

Her birthday! and, through misty tears
I look in vain to see
Her lovely face, her wondrous eyes,
With love-light turned to me;
For silent is the voice I loved,
Still are the dancing feet;
And wrapped in dust are all the hopes
That once made life so sweet.

The Instincts of Animals.

Many persons hav an indistinct idea of what is called instinct in animals, and to show that it is a feeling which has by usage impressed itself upon the memory, I will relate what I hav often witnessed in dogs that were trained to hunting.

It will be noticed that different breeds of dogs hav different instincts, or, in other words, there are some kinds of dogs that can scent a fox much better than any other kind of animal, while a setter, or pointer, will smell birds a long way off, which a dog trained to fox-hunting would not notice. This, then, depends on training, and shows a development of memory of the different kinds of odor. One peculiarity in far-smelling animals is owing to their long noses. A short-nosed dog will not be as acute in detecting game as one that has a long nasal protuberance. The greyhound, which has the longest nose, however, is an exception to this rule, simply because he, by a constant habit of depending on his eyes, has not developed the sense of smell. He, being so long-legged and sharp-eyed, has acquired the faculties of keen sight and extraordinary speed, but is a failure on a still hunt.

It seems hard to understand why a dog can smell a bird, or a fox, and know the direction it has gone, and follow up the trail until it is overtaken, but when we consider that the air is permeated with the odor, and that it affects the nerves by a certain kind of chemical action, just as pepper would affect our noses if thrown into the air, it becomes a very simple and easy problem for any boy or girl to understand. There is nothing so simple, when the natural conditions are all taken into account, and there is even no mystery about it. The habit of relying upon cause and effect to settle all seemingly strange things in nature will, by study, unravel them all.

The odor of musk is so fine a material and permeates the air so fully that one drop placed in a corked vial, by which the odor can pass off, will last for twenty years.* There is an insensible perspiration passing from our bodies, by means of which all wild animals detect us a long way off. For this reason a hunter who understands his trade will always get on the wind side, or will hunt against the air current so as to giv his dog a chance to get the first sniff of the game he is in search of before it gets away, as it surely would if the wind were blowing in the direction of the animal. And it is by means of this fine material passing from our bodies that our dog, who is familiar with us, will be able to detect our trail and follow it, when a dozen other persons hav gone in the same direction, for the reason that no two persons emit the same odor. The reason, then, that dogs can hunt, is because of a keen sense of smelling what has passed off into the air and lodges on their nerves. I was very much amused upon one occasion to see the effects of this sense upon a dog. A gentleman had caught a red fox, and after securing him with a muzzle and chain, brought him from the mountain into the village. When he got to the hotel steps, in showing his fox, the animal, anxious to escape, jumped into a drift of snow, and holding him by the chain, he had quite a tussle to get him out of it, but he finally did, and took him into the hotel. Standing upon the stoop I noticed a large red hound coming along in an unconcerned and careless way, but suddenly he took the scent of the fox, and bristling up in wonderful astonishment at such an odor in a village, his dogship hardly knew what to make of it, but knowing that he could not be mistaken, he made a ferocious bound into the snow-drift, and not finding the fox as he expected, he threw himself upon his haunches, and tossing his head into the air, he cried out with all the power of his lungs in disappointment, sorrow, and rage. It was the most expressiv howl I ever heard from a dog, and when he took up his line of travel, he seemed so dejected that I believe he must hav had some notion of committing suicide in disgust, as he kept up a low growling and moaning cry as far as I could hear him. I imagined he was swearing at his bad luck, as some foolish people are in the habit of doing when their emotions are too strong for their judgment. Scent acts precisely the same in regard to odors as hearing does in regard to sound—when we hear a noise we locate it, because the lines of vibration and their undulations act in such a way as to carry the mind to the most central point of disturbance, or center of commotion; and just in the same way are we sensible of the location of a stove, which we detect by means of the variableness of the radiations of its heat, so that in playing the game of "Blind man's Buff" we can always know how to avoid the hot stove, if we are careful enough to observe this rule.

I will close this lesson on dogs by relating a circumstance that took place once, which goes to show the persistency of some breeds, and the certainty of their knowledge. Dogs seldom lie, and can usually be relied upon in searching for game. They will not act like many men, endeavoring to deceive you with their hypocrisy, but are mostly honest and true to their instincts. Upon this occasion, on the way home after a hard day's hunt, we came to a rocky patch and noticed our dog, Spy, smelling around the heap of stones, first on one side, and then on the other. At last his master told him to come on, but Spy would cock his ears up and wag his tail, and look so pleased, as though he would say, "Come back, I hav something here," and then he would busy himself in smelling around again. We indulged him for some time, and finding him determined to stick to it, we went back and commenced kicking about the stone heap, but could get nothing out. At last his master told him he thought he must be mistaken, there was nothing there; but the dog put his head down and barked into the heap as much as to say, "I know better." We then went to work to uncover one stone at a time, and, after working until almost night, we came upon a splendid rabbit. That poor animal had its nerves so worked upon that when Mr. Sautee caught it, I never heard such pathetic cries; he dragged it out of its cosy retreat and held it in his arms, but its cries were too pitiful to withstand—in fact, it melted his heart into compassion, and he spoke to it in a consoling way, and said, "Well, since you take it so hard, and life seems so sweet to you, I will not be the one to deprive you of it; you shall hav another chance," and putting the rabbit on its feet, it bounded away, while the dog was held back, no doubt surprised at his lost labor.

Mr. Sautee, in commenting upon the incident, said, "If I had the government of this wicked world, and could not make it better than it is, rather than destroy it I would do as I did with the poor rabbit, I would giv it another chance." And, no doubt, everyone who reads this will agree that it surely needs it.

The lesson I wish to impart is that smelling is a chemical effect, produced upon the nerves by a deposit of material substances, which act upon them analagous to the touch felt on any part of the body, or the sense of a heat picture impressed upon the retina of the eye; in fact, smelling is like all the other senses, a feeling of a material substance, but so fine in its qualities as to evade all modes of measurement, and, in consequence, is said to be imponderable. If this explanation of the philosophy of smelling is too difficult for any of our intelligent boys or girls who read the Children's Corner to understand, I advise them to consult with older persons, and to use the dictionary, by which means the mystery of scent in animals will be exploded. J. R. PERRY.

GEORGE CHAINEY

Wishes to enter into correspondence with Liberals throughout the country in reference to lecture engagements for the coming season.

Mr. Chainey needs no recommendation from us. We print below a few of his indorsements, which certainly are the strongest testimonials ever given to any Liberal lecturer, except Ingersoll, in this country:

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL: "Mr. Chainey is one of the best thinkers in this country. He has a wonderful command of language, is full of imagery, comparison, antithesis, logic, and beauty. He feels what he says with his whole heart, and perceives it with his entire brain. He is perfectly honest, and for that very reason is intellectually keen. Downright honesty in such a man is genius. He givs a true transcript of his mind, and givs it with great power. He is well acquainted with the church, knows all the ways of the theologian, and understands the inside of the whited sepulcher of superstition. His lectures stir me like trumpets. They are filled with the loftiest spirit. Eloquent, logical, and poetic, they are as welcome and refreshing as the breeze of morning on the cheek of fever."

"Mr. Chainey is a large, well formed, though rather round-shouldered man, wears no beard, and in these days of crops would be called a long-haired man. He has a big head and broad face. He is an orator. His eloquence is his chief fascination. His periods are models of oratorical beauty, and though ordinarily unimpassioned he occasionally becomes intensely strong in his dramatic effects. He is singularly graceful of gesture. His methods inspire one with a conviction of his honesty. His elocution is masterly. His voice is magnetic, powerful, flexible, very pleasing. His sentiments are beautifully painted sacrilege. He would make a famous actor."—Scranton Daily Republican.

"Mr. Chainey's lecture was one of the most brilliant oratorical efforts ever delivered in Creston. We doubt if any lecturer, other than Col. Ingersoll, could use so much of beautiful metaphor."—Creston Commoner.

"Mr. Chainey's enunciation is perfect, his sentences forcible and impassioned. Like Ingersoll he has the happy faculty of clothing an idea in such a peculiarly taking form, that at first thought the contrary idea seems an absurdity and an imposture."—Syracuse Morning Herald.

*An entire room has been known to be perfumed with musk for thirty years, and no perceptible loss of weight in the musk observed; and specimens, it is said, hav been preserved for a hundred years, the odor remaining the same. It is the product of the male of an Asiatic animal known as the musk deer, and is supplied to commerce by China, chiefly, two or three drachms being worth fifteen dollars; but the crafty Chinese are in the habit of adulterating the same so that the genuin article is hardly known in trade. When musk is first taken from the animal, travelers say that those near its influence are in danger of hemorrhage from the nose, and it often brings on headache.—ED.

BEES! BEES! BEES!

FROM $2,000 TO $5,000 A YEAR KEEPING HONEY BEES.

The particulars are simply to prevent the great loss that most bee masters have to contend with annually. Then give the bees a chance to increase and collect surplus honey to their fullest capacity; all of which can be easily accomplished by using the kind of hive described in "Kidder's Secrets of Bee-keeping."

Send for the Book and see how easily it can be done with a few swarms of bees.

THIS BOOK IS A RELIABLE GUIDE

to all persons that keep bees, especially to the novice or new beginner, as it teaches how all of the troubles and disappointments that the bee master is liable to, can be successfully overcome, such as Foul Brood, Dysentery, Bee Robbery, Ravages of Moth Millers, Loss of Queen, loss of bees in Swarming time, by their flight to the forests, also the great loss in winter and early spring management, which is usually more than all other ways combined. This book will also inform the bee master HOW BEES WILL INCREASE AND THROW OFF SWARMS to an enormous extent, all conditions being favorable. The old stocks will frequently swarm three or four times each, and oft times the first swarms thrown off will swarm once or twice each, with a good hive and right kind of management. In warmer climates the bees will increase and swarm to a much greater extent.

GREAT YIELD OF SURPLUS HONEY.

This Book will inform the bee master how to get the greatest amount of surplus honey, and at the same time hav it in small packages weighing three-quarters of a pound to two or three pounds, as may be desired, which will command the highest price in market. In a good season the bee keeper may calculate on two or three hundred pounds of surplus honey from each old stock, and from fifty to one hundred pounds from the earlier young swarms, especially if they do not over-swarm.

NO MORE BEE-STINGS IN MANAGING BEES.

The Book will post the bee-keepers how to manage them when putting them on, or taking off surplus honey boxes, and not get stung in the whole operation.

BEE-KEEPING FOR OUR SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

It being the most pleasant, as well as the most profitable business that young people can engage in, and at the same time remain at home with their parents. The author has known of several young men who commenced the culture of the bee in their teens, and are now making more money than their fathers who run the farm, and doing it easily and with small investments. We must also remember that the women folks often make the best of bee-keepers, and not so liable to neglect them as the men folks.

KIDDER'S BEE BOOK

should be in the hands of all persons who like honey, and take an interest in the little honey bee. It contains more matter than many books that sell for two dollars, and is embellished with numerous cuts and drawings. There is no trouble, loss, or damage that a bee master has to contend with but what the book will give the proper remedy, by simply referring to the index, and that will point to the page where it is fully explained.

In order to bring this book more prominently before the mass of bee keepers, the Author proposes to give, as a premium to each purchaser of a book, from this date until Aug. next, the privilege of making his Celebrated Patent Bee Hive, as spoken of in book, for their own use (but not to sell) Free of Charge, otherwise there will be the usual Patent Fee of Five Dollars to each individual that wishes to make and use the hive

PRICE, BOARD BOUND, 85 cents.

N. B. The directions for hive making with cuts, drawings, etc., will be inclosed within each book sold, until Sept next, (not longer). Now is the time for all bee-keepers to avail themselves of this liberal offer, which is simply to buy a book at the Regular Price, before Sept. next

A BRIEF REVIEW OF A LECTURE BY THE REV. TE DEUM WITT(Y) TALMAGE, D.D. (DRIVEL DISPENSER).

This year I visited the pleasant summer resort of Island Park, in northern Indiana. The pious look which I wear when I vist such places probably deluded some people into the notion that I was a rather pious sort of person, perhaps a deacon, for in less than ten minutes after I reached the grounds a lively, pleasant-faced lady accosted me, saying, "Excuse me, sir, but aren't you interested in the Sunday-school?" As soon as I recovered my breath I was tempted to say that my soul was fairly bathed, as it were, in certain burning questions pertaining to the blessed Sabbath-school work, but for some reason such talk has grown somewhat unfamiliar to me, and I was obliged to confess that I was not completely absorbed in the work of leading little ones to the master during the hot weather. I heard three doctors of divinity lecture, and reverends of lesser note were there "too numerous to mention." Dr. Thomas, of Brooklyn, N. Y., seems to be a very fine man. He lectured on "Natural History," and his lectures were instructiv and interesting. I could not help thinking that if he would throw theology aside and devote himself to science and the diffusion of general knowledge he would be a very useful man. On Thursday, July 28th, Dr. Lyman Abbott, of New York, delivered an address to the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle. The address would hav been well enough at a political meeting, but it was inappropriate on that occasion. The doctor gave a picture of a poor man crowded into one of the tenement houses of New York, surrounded by want and disease, praying to the God who seems to hav forgotten him. I was in hopes Mr. Abbott would tell us why God refuses to answer that poor man, and the thousands like him. But he didn't. He hurried away from the unpleasant subject, and said something about Jay Gould and the workingmen. On Friday Talmage spoke on "Ingersollism" to an immense audience. He has a powerful voice, which, when allowed to flow out naturally at a certain pitch, is sonorous and pleasing, but harsh and guttural when he tries to be impressiv, and ridiculous when he attempts to be pathetic, and this is quite often.

It is a little strange that Talmage doesn't realize that he honors Ingersoll more than Liberals do. Liberals don't recognize any such thing as Ingersollism, and it is safe to say that Mr. Ingersoll never thought of having any ism attached to his name. The work of Freethought is many times too great to be fastened to the name of any man living, or who ever has lived. But perhaps the title was allowable, as Mr. Talmage said he spoke in reply to Ingersoll's lecture on what he was pleased to call "Talmagian Theology." He disclaimed any personal animosity, and, in proof of his sincerity, he invited Mr. Ingersoll, when he shall hav been converted to Christianity and joined the ministry, to preach his first sermon in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. When the chairman rose to present the speaker, fearing that the enthusiasm was oozing out, he requested everybody to wave their handkerchiefs and giv Dr. Talmage a grand salute. Of course hundreds responded, but it was a ridiculous farce. I doubt very much if the distinguished speaker felt highly honored at such applause as that. He said that Voltaire, after writing two hundred and forty volumes against Christianity, renounced Infidelity, and begged that he might be buried in consecrated ground. I don't care whether Voltaire recanted or not. A truth once uttered can never be anything but a truth. If Voltaire's writings were true, a thousand subsequent denials could not affect their truth; if they were not true, a thousand repetitions could not remove their falsehood. The speaker opened his court, and called the case of Infidelity vs. Christianity. First witness, Robert G. Ingersoll. "But how shall he be sworn? We shall be obliged to swear him by the spots on the sun and the nebular hypothesis and the aurora borealis, etc." He drawled out these words in a mocking, contemptuous tone, and several people giggled. And that is Talmagian logic. People who went expecting to hear an able argument were kept there in a densely packed crowd on an intensely hot day listening to such stuff as that. He said that John Adams, the founder of this government, was a good Christian. But he did not dwell long on this point. He seemed to think that he had blundered upon dangerous ground. The name of Adams might possibly recall the name of Adams's successor. Mr. Talmage utterly ignored Washington, and Jefferson, and Franklin, and, of course, he never heard that Thomas Paine and Ethan Allen had anything to do with the Revolution. Good Christians must hav been scarce among our noted men, for the speaker made a great leap from John Adams to Daniel Webster. He said that Webster declared that if he was possessed of any superior abilities, he ascribed it to his habit of reading the Bible carefully. I don't know whether Webster ever said that or not, but if he did he either uttered an untruth or he was as thoroughly steeped in superstition as any clown. Does Talmage believe that Webster or any other man ever acquired legal acumen and oratorical power by reading the Bible? He said the Infidel creed was something like this: "I believe in—nothing, the maker of—nothing, who descended into—nothing. I believe in the Agnostic church, the communion of—nothing, etc." He then repeated a part of the apostle's creed with great solemnity, after which he proceeded to demolish his opponent. But unfortunately his opponent was not Ingersoll. He was a little man who had been hiding among the mountains of Mr. Talmage's imagination. Ingersoll believes in something. The nothing party are those who believe in an incomprehensible, three-headed, old-bachelor God, with a son as old as himself—they are probably twins—and who made the world out of—nothing. Talmage denied the charges that the Bible sanctions polygamy and that it degrades woman. He said that Adam, and Noah, and several other gentlemen had only one wife each, that David had more, but he got well paid for it. (Perhaps that is the reason he took them.) The audience would hav been willing to grant that Talmage had made one point in the case if he had told them the chapters and verses where it is stated that David and Solomon were punished because they took more than one wife, and for no other reason. He said, "God permitted it, but he didn't sanction it, just as our government permits it, but does not sanction it." That kind of reasoning may deceive the very elect, but a man who has been born only once will be apt to remember that our government does not, as yet, lay claim to omniscience and omnipotence.

Mr. Talmage mentioned Miriam and Deborah and a few other ancient ladies who gained renown and ought to hav had the ballot if they didn't, and this proves that Ingersoll has slandered the good book. He said one well-established legal maxim was, "False in one thing, false in all." I thought the reverend gentleman was laying down a dangerous standard for himself, and so it proved. His false statements were many, but he took the chances in his eagerness to find just one false statement of Ingersoll's. He did his best to make the people believe that if Ingersoll should make an untrue statement at the commencement of a lecture, he might speak for two hours after that and every word of the lecture would necessarily be false. Every time he thought he had weakened Ingersoll's position he would repeat, "Fa-a-a-alse in one thing, false in all," speaking the word false in a very loud tone, and drawing it out nearly as long as he could without taking breath. He ridiculed Ingersoll for bringing in "that bone" so often in his lectures, meaning the bone that the Lord took out of Adam. He said that Ingersoll would make some sneering remark about the Bible, and five hundred idiots would say, "Oh, yes; that's so, that's so." Five hundred idiots in one audience! How large must that audience be? How many idiots are there to the thousand of our population? Say there are ten. That would giv an audience of 50,000. Again, it may be all right, but, being ignorant of Hebrew and Talmage, I can't quite see why a renowned D.D. from the great City of Churches should travel eight hundred miles to defend his Bible from the attacks of a man who can elicit only the applause of idiots. This seems to me very much like a reflection on the doctor's audiences. If he did not think they were likely to go to Ingersoll's meetings there would be no need of talking to them about Ingersollism. The reverend speaker said that it was absurd for a man who knew no Hebrew to attempt to expound Genesis, who knew no Greek to expound Sophocles, who knew no Latin to expound Horace, who knew no English to expound Shakspere. That is true enough, but when did Ingersoll undertake to expound Genesis? I am of opinion that he believes it is beyond the wit of man to expound Genesis in accordance with historical accuracy, scientific facts, and common sense. If I am mistaken in this statement, I hope I shall be corrected. Ingersoll's first attempt to expound Genesis will probably be in the course of that first sermon in Talmage's church. In reply to Ingersoll's question, "Why don't the clergy read all the Bible in the pulpit?" the doctor says, "There are parts of the Bible that were not intended to be read." Think of that. This noted divine makes a long journey to tell us that part of the Bible is not to be read. Where did he get his authority to say that? Who is to decide which parts are to be read, and which not? He said that you might as well say that the whole of a medical work should be read, or else throw away medical science altogether. What do you think of that logic for a D.D.? He compares the Bible to a medical work. The whole of those works are read, and, besides, they do not pretend to be inspired. The Bible is said to be the pure word of God, and is thrust into the hand of every man, woman, and child who will take it. Why is anything left in it that is not to be read? Does Talmage honestly believe that the authors of the Pentateuch considered part of that work indecent literature, or knew that it would ever be so considered? He denied Ingersoll's charge that the Bible is a cruel book. "Show us the victims of Bidle-reading," he says. He commenced at a large number and came down by degrees to ten, five, one. "There is not one," he solemnly declared. It is of no use for Ingersoll, or anyone else, to argue with a man who has the brazen impudence to stand up before an audience and make such a statement as that. He never heard of St. Bartholomew, of the Inquisition, of the Puritans, of Freeman, the child-slayer. He said that Infidelity scrapes no lint for the wounded, givs no bread to the hungry, etc. I tried to be charitable, but when he said that I could not resist the impression that he deliberately lied. He boasted that all the colleges of this country were under Christian control, and all those of Germany, except Heidelburg, and there, of course, everything is going to the bad. He had lived seven years near Girard College, and he knew that the faculty were all Christian. I fear his statement is too true, but no Christian minister could publicly mention Girard College unless his moral sense was terribly distorted. The doctor exhibited some ingenuity in constructing a series of ladders, precipices, etc., reaching down to the depth of meanness to which a man must descend who would take away Christianity and giv nothing in its place. He doesn't want any of the "don't know" religion of the Agnostics. "I know," said he. Perhaps he does know, but I was convinced that he was mistaken, for in a building only a few rods from where he was speaking were a number of Christian books for sale, and on the back of each was the single word "Creeds."

Talmage says he thinks the bone from which woman was made was taken from Adam's right side instead of the left. That settles it. Talmage thinks the bone was taken from the right side, and that smashes Ingersollism into very small pieces. And so he talked for about an hour and a half, shooting his arrows at random, and utterly failed to disprove one statement that Ingersoll has ever published. From beginning to end there was not a sentence in his lecture that showed scientific research or superior debating power. He did the best he could, but his subject presented difficulties that no talent could overcome. I was informed the next day, on good authority, that some church-members who attended were bitterly disappointed. There were many present, too, who went more to learn something about Ingersollism than to honor Mr. Talmage. It is safe to say that at least one-half of those who went expressly to hear the lecture would not hav been there if the subject had been anything else. The papers hav published accounts of many failures this summer, and now it is my sad duty to add another to the list. Sadness prevails.

A Few Words for "Man," if He Wants to Be Manly.

[The following article was sent to Man. But it was returned with the apology: "We hav so much about organization we cannot publish it all, and now the need of the discussion is pretty much over, so we return the manuscript." Will the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER please find room for it in his paper, so it may be known where I stand on this matter?—S. D. M.].

MR. EDITOR: I notice the subject of a reorganization of the National Liberal League has been brought forward for the consideration of its members, and that the present president and secretary hav given notice that they decline serving another year. In response to this, the Index lays down the plan to be adopted by the Liberals at large, if they wish to form a national Liberal organization, in something of the same dictatorial manner it assumed in giving advice to the League a few weeks before it met in annual convention at Syracuse in 1878; and it givs this timely warning to this national Liberal organization before it is born—that it is to hav nothing to do with the National Liberal League, or with any of its past issues, and the National Liberal League as such is to hav nothing to do with it.

In Man of May 31st you quoted from Lucifer an article headed, "Re-forming the Line.—The League and Liberty," and signed "W.," that gave the ring of a manly Man; and I want it now understood that on this question I stand with "W." in Lucifer, and will still stand by the League in helping to carry out the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and most fully indorse its position in reference to the repeal of what are commonly known as the Comstock laws—laws that were hatched in the Christian church, the object of which was to put a check on free speech, free mails, and a free press. And it was by the help of these laws that unprincipled men were enabled to persecute, prosecute, and imprison one of our noblest Liberal leaders, whose sufferings in a dungeon entailed on him a disease that laid him in an untimely grave. And I feel that I should belittle myself now to giv up these aims and fall in line with the Index, Religio-Philosophical Journal, Comstock, & Co., whom I charge with being at the foundation of this unjust, unrighteous, and malicious prosecution. No, Mr. Editor; others may take such a course as they choose, but as for me, I never can giv my name and means to work with such until they bring forth fruits meet for repentance, which as yet they never hav done.

"The Church the Worst House of Prostitution There."

C. C. Post in Chicago Express.

One day last week we had occasion to go to one of the railroad depots in the heart of this great city.

We were to meet there a friend who was to come on an afternoon train.

We walked from our office to the depot, and finding it a full half-hour to train time concluded to extend our walk beyond, and into a portion of the city with which we were unacquainted.

A very few minutes sufficed to bring us to a district of a character such as those of our readers who are unacquainted with cities, or whose acquaintance is limited to occasional trips to the principal centers of trade in cities, can hav little conception of.

Every second building was a house of prostitution, as was clearly evinced by the number of young women standing at the doors, or sitting idly at the windows gazing into the street.

The remaining buildings were occupied as saloons, dance-houses, second-hand clothing stores, pawn shops, and an occasional filthy-looking grocery or rag-picking establishment.

Squads of dirty children, from the little toddler of two years to the dwarfed and stunted child of six or seven, of both sexes, but all of them too young to be of any service in the pursuits of sin and crime by which their parents obtain a living, were amusing themselvs as best they could upon the sidewalk and in the alleyways.

Among them were many whose faces showed intelligence, but not one who was not filthy, few who were not ragged, while a portion were barefooted although it was in the first days of December, and the writer was clad in overcoat and fur cap. Through this district, and between the two rows of buildings devoted to such purposes and furnishing such a school for future citizens of the republic, flows a not inconsiderable tide of traffic; and laboring men, and possibly laboring women, must pass through it in going to and from their daily toil.

I hav said that the buildings not occupied by saloons, rag-picking establishments, dirty groceries, pawn shops, and the like—of each a few, except the saloons, which were numerous—were houses of prostitution. With these latter I include the church which stands near the beginning of the row, and which, if sins of omission are to be taken into consideration, is largely responsible for the existence of the others.

Oh, no; the church was not built there for the purpose of carrying a knowledge of Christ to these sinful outcasts.

The church was built first, as was proven by the evident age of the structure, and by the fact that costly brown stone churches are not built in such localities, or for such purposes.

No, the church was first built, and under the shadow of its steeple these pest-houses of sin and iniquity hav been established and are now flourishing. This could not hav been possible if the church had taught as Christ commanded, and this is why we say the church is the worst house of prostitution there.

And now to those who are tempted to condemn us for our saying we wish to put a question.

Do you believe that this state of affairs would hav existed in that community if that church had taught, both by precept and example, the things which Christ taught?

Had the pastor of that church, and its members, not shown that they loved wealth and so-called "respectability" better than they loved their fellow men and women; had they in their daily business transactions practiced the great truths which Christ taught, do you not believe that their influence would hav been sufficient to hav kept that community pure?

If you do not, then hav you less faith in the influence of Christ's teachings upon society and the hearts of men than has the writer of this article, for he believes that if the true doctrins of the great master were proclaimed from the pulpits of the land no such plague-spots would long exist anywhere, much less spring to life under the very shadow of the churches.

The church professes to teach righteousness, justice, and mercy.

What it really does teach is vastly different.

Unrebuked of its pastors and sanctioned by its teachings, the members of the church practice extortion without mercy, and weigh justice by statutory enactments of which they hav secured the passage by bribes.

For theft they hav substituted usury, and for highway robbery the safer crimes of stock-watering, and corners on the necessaries of life; and hav built churches and paid pastors with the money of which they hav thus robbed the people.

Do they think they can rob without impoverishing their victims?

Do they expect those whom they hav robbed and impoverished will respect the Christ who is preached of in churches built with the proceeds of the robbery?

Does the church think that the victims of such subtle schemes for robbing as usury and stock-watering will not attempt to match the cunning which devised those schemes, with the cunning of the pick-pocket and sneak-thief—the intellectual strength, which has forced upon society the acceptance of such infamous schemes, by the force of arm that wields the sand-bag and bludgeon?

Are they who hav prostituted their souls to devising or upholding such schemes for heaping up riches beyond their needs, fit to preach repentance and purity to those who hav prostituted their bodies in order to get bread?

The evidence in the case proves that they are not.

It proves that the prostitution of their bodies by the victims of such unholy schemes for wholesale robbery is but the natural fruit of the prostitution of souls to the spirit of greed, upheld and made respectable by its alliance with the church.

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Gems of Thought.

WHEN Cæsar happened to see some strangers at Rome carrying young dogs and monkeys in their arms and fondly caressing them, he asked, "Whether the women in their country never bore any children?" thus reproving, with a proper severity, those who lavish upon brutes that due only to mankind. In the same manner we condemn those who employ that curiosity and love of knowledge which nature has implanted in the human soul upon low and worthless objects, while they neglect such as are excellent and useful. Our senses, indeed, by an effect almost mechanical, are passiv to the impression of outward objects, whether agreeable or offensiv, but the mind, possessed by a self-directing power, may turn its attention to whatever it thinks proper. It should, therefore, be employed in the most useful pursuits, not barely in such contemplation as may nourish its faculties.—Plutarch's Lives.

THE young, if they know their own happiness, will carefully cherish the love of nature, not as a mere pastime, nor as a mere sensuous delight, but as a constant source of intellectual life and illumination. Let them go forth into its open face with the problems that torment them, with the books that puzzle them, with the thoughts that are often a weariness and distraction; and it is wonderful what a quiet radiance will often steal into their hearts—how burdens will be lifted up and the vision of a contemplativ faith dawn upon them in glimpses, if not in perfect outline.—Principal Tulloch.

NATURE never did betray
The heart that loved her; 'tis her privilege
Through all the years of this one life to lead
From joy to joy; for she can so inform
The mind that is within us, so impress
With quietness and beauty, and so feed
With lofty thoughts, that neither evil tongues,
Rash judgments, nor the sneers of selfish men,
Nor greetings where unkindness is, nor all
The dreary intercourse of daily life,
Shall e'er prevail against us, or disturb
Our cheerful faith that all we behold
Is full of blessings.

—Wordsworth's Tintern Abbey.

"BE still,
White Kantaka! be still, and bear me now
The farthest journey ever rider rode;
For this night take I horse to find the TRUTH,
And where my quest will end yet know I not,
Save that it shall not end until I find.
Therefore to-night, good steed, be fierce and bold!
Let nothing stay thee, though a thousand blades
Deny the road! Let neither wall nor moat
Forbid our flight! Look! if I touch thy flank
And cry, 'Oh, Kantaka!' let whirlwinds lag
Behind thy course! Be fire and air, my horse!
To stead thy lord; so shalt thou share with him
The greatness of this deed which helps the world;
For therefore ride I, not for men alone,
But for all things which, speechless, share our pain
And hav no hope, nor wit to ask for hope.
Now, therefore, bear thy master valorously!"

—Lord Buddha to His Steed, in Edwin Arnold's Light of Asia.

THE "intelligent reader" has, without doubt, observed that the more peculiar are our friends' opinions, the more "touchy they are about them;" that their sensitivness about them varies, in fact, in the nverse proportion to the popularity of their theories. Thus one may express one's own ideas in comparativ safety to a Tory or a Radical; but it is highly dangerous to venture on such a course with a Vegetarian, or a Liberalist, or a Homeopath. Always in expectation of ridicule, these good folks scent, in every word, the flavor of offense, and woe be to him who treads upon the tender topic. And of all susceptible gentry that adorn our planet, the believers in Spiritualism are the most thin-skinned.—James Payn's Under One Roof.

PERHAPS as correct a definition of the soul as can be given is: that part of man which enables him to think. It is, therefore, the same as the mind; and as that depends on the brain, there can be no soul or mind where the human brain is lacking or gone. This seems to be the teaching of physiology, and it is probably the truth. But it is common to speak of soul or mind as existing after the death of the body, yet this does not appear possible, from the fact that the soul or mind is part of the body, or allied with it. —Boston Investigator.

IN a popular point of view nothing can come up to, or, at any rate, exceed, Dr. Isaac Watts's deliverance on this subject. "How do you know, my good child, that you hav a soul?" "Because I hav something within me that can think and know; can wish and desire; can rejoice and be sorry, which my body cannot do."—Mather's Catechism.

BE of good cheer. Speak thou the truth,
And then thou shalt not fail.

N. Y. State Freethinkers' Association.

THE SEVENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION;

Where Held—The Speakers Engaged—The Hotels, Railroads, etc.

THE NEW YORK STATE FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION, in accordance with its established custom, has invited the Freethinkers of all the other states, and also of Canada, to meet them in annual Convention, at Cassadaga Lake, N. Y., on the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th days of September next.

Reynolds, of Rochester, N. Y.; Samuel P. Putnam, of New York; Dr. William F. McCormick, of Franklin, Pa.; and Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., orthodox, of Philadelphia, Pa. And the following hav also been invited, the most of whom are expected to be present: Hon. Elizur Wright, of Boston; F. E. Abbot, Cambridge, Mass.; Horace Seaver, Boston; Luther Colby, Boston; Judge Arnold Krekle and Mrs. Judge Krekle, of Kansas City, Mo.; James Parton, of Newburyport, Mass.; Judge Carter, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; and B. F. Underwood, editor of the Index, Boston, Mass. It is possible that Col. Ingersoll will be present and address the Convention.

THE SINGING.

Professor A. D. Lane, of Olean, N. Y., one of the most popular professional singers in the state, accompanied by as good a quartet of voices as can be found in Western New York, has been engaged to provide the musical entertainment for the occasion. Professor H. H. Hall, who sang for the Rochester Convention, has also been engaged.

THE PLACE OF MEETING.

The location where the Convention is to meet is one of the most pleasant and picturesque in the state. It is described as follows in a circular issued by the Association: "The Cassadaga Lake Camp-meeting Grounds are eight miles from Lake Erie, and seven hundred feet above it; situated midway between New York and Chicago, one and a half hours by rail from Buffalo, five from Cleveland, nine from Pittsburgh, fourteen hours from Cincinnati, sixteen from Philadelphia, eighteen hours from New York, twenty hours from Boston and Washington, and twenty-one from Chicago. It lies on the shore of a beautiful chain of lakes, three in number, and at an elevation of nearly fourteen hundred feet above the level of the sea." The Association last year erected on the grounds an amphitheater, with a seating capacity of twenty-five hundred people, with the seats in a semi-circle, which givs every one present an opportunity to hear all that is said from the speaker's platform.

ROUTES OF TRAVEL AND RAILROAD RATES.

Eastern and western passengers over the Nickel Plate, Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad, and eastern passengers over the New York, Lake Erie & Western (formerly Erie) railroad, change cars at Dunkirk, N. Y., and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to the "Cassadaga Camp-meeting Grounds."

Eastern and western passengers over the New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio railroad (formerly Atlantic & Great Western), and eastern passengers over the Buffalo & Jamestown railroad, change cars at the Atlantic & Great Western Crossing, and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to Lily Dale Station.

To be more definit, persons coming to the Convention from most of the cities and large towns in the United States will find it the cheaper to purchase excursion tickets to Chautauqua Lake. These can be obtained very cheap; and then leave the cars at the crossing of the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad near Jamestown, and then take the last mentioned road to Lily Dale Station, near the camping grounds. Persons coming from any station on the New York, Lake Erie & Western railroad, or any of its branches west of Binghampton, will pay full fare to Dunkirk, and then be returned at one-third fare home. The Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad will sell excursion tickets at two cents a mile from any station on that road.

THE HOTEL RATES.

The following prices hav been established at the hotels for board: $1.50 per day, for one day and less than three days; and over, $1 per day. Table board: breakfast, 40 cents; dinner, 50 cents; supper, 30 cents. Lodgings, 25 to 30 cents. The hotel accommodations are sufficient to entertain all who may attend.

H L. GREEN,
Salamanca, N. Y. Secretary New York State Freethinkers' Association.

P. S.—I am glad to announce that the Truth Seeker Company will hav an agent on the grounds with a large assortment of Freethought publications for sale. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER will, as heretofore, make full reports of the proceedings. Other reports of the Convention will be published in the New York Herald, the Buffalo Courier, and other secular papers. H. L. G.

On Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 8th and 9th, the

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE

WILL HOLD ITS

EIGHTH ANNUAL CONGRESS

At the same place.

In his call for the Congress the President of the League invites "all citizens of the United States, whether they hav acted with this League or not, who believe in a secular republic, separation of church and state; the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all, and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press as the basis of universal suffrage."

All Charter and Life Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Each Auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates—its president, secretary, and three other members—to the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats in the Congress, and to votes by the permission of the Congress.

Odds and Ends.

MR. EDMUNDS's feelings are hurt because Mr. Greely forgot to name an iceberg after him.

MISS MAMIE ANDERSON has made the interesting discovery that the tomb of the late Miss Jule Capulet is at the bottom of a cake-oven.

ALL the horses seem to be more successful in lowering the records this year than ever before. The bank presidents are with them.

"I THINK I'll take a run out into the suburbs,' said a New Yorker. "Where to?" asked his partner. "Oh, I guess I'll go out to Boston."

"BOYS, can you tell me anything remarkable in the life of Moses?" asked a Sabbath-school teacher. "Yes, sir," shouted one of the boys: "he broke all the commandments at once."

AN Indiana man who was recently hanged nodded to a minister who desired to giv consolation just before the drop fell and said: "I'll see you later." The minister is sorry he said anything now,

A MEMBER of the Kentucky legislature, who attended a service at the Episcopal church at Frankfort, was asked how he liked it, and he replied: "Purty well; I riz and fell with them every time.'

LITERATURE, it seems, affects the consumption of certain beverages. An enormous trade in aerated waters has arisen since Byron, in "Don Juan," commended the virtues of soda-water. This may also account for the enormous trade in whisky since the Bible first published the story of Noah's defiance of prohibition doctrins.—Puck.

WE don't blame him, too. In an old-fashioned church in Philadelphia the choir roosts in a gallery above the pulpit, and the pastor is seriously contemplating resignation if the men and women singers do not cease their careless habit of dropping peanut-she is down on his bald head while he is preaching. The best place to keep the average church choir is down in the cellar. It is not so apt to sour, and then it can't be heard so distinctly.

"THE moon is waning," Elfrida said, sitting a little closer to Ethelred to keep off the malaria. "Yes," said old Sir Marmalade, her sire, who crossed the piazza at that moment; "and the swain is mooning. Haw, haw, haw!" and he was gone. Ethelred shuddered and drew Elfrida to his side until she had to breathe in her mind. "Thank heaven," he said earnestly, "that the moon is not waxing! I tremble to think what a joke it might hav suggested to him."

A BARNYARD IDYL.

A city girl, with bang and curl,
And frills and flounces fine,
Went with her uncle forth to see
The milkmaid milk the kine.

And as she stirred among the herd,
She shook her rustling silk,
And cried, "O uncle, where's the cow
That givs the buttermilk?"

"GEORGE, dear," cried Eveline, "do you suppose heaven is as nice a place as people say it is?" "Well, really, Eveline, as I hav never been there, I cannot say; but from what I hear, the society there is very select." "Everything is bright and golden there, isn't it, George?" "Yes, darling. The streets are paved solid with gold blocks. Golden bricks make the houses, and only specie payments are allowed." "Well, then, George," archly said the maiden, as she nestled closely to her lover, "if everything is so golden, why don't the gilty get in?" But the answer came not. He had gone to be a cowboy.

A YOUNG woman from the country was suing her ex-sweetheart for breach of promis, and the lawyers were, as usual, making all sorts of inquisitiv interrogatories. "You say," remarked one, "that the defendant frequently sat very close to you?" "Yes, sir," was the reply, with a hectic flush. "How close?" "Close enough, so's one cheer was all the settin' room we needed." "And you say he put his arm around you?" "No, I didn't." "What did you say, then?" "I said he put both arms around me." "Then what?" "He hugged me." "Very hard?" "Yes, he did. So durn hard that I came purty near hollerin' right out." "Why didn't you 'holler?'" "'Cause." "That's no reason. Be explicit, please. Because what?" "'Cause I was afeered he'd stop." The court fell off the bench and had to be carried out and put under the hydrant for the purpose of resuscitation.

AN evangelist from the East made a tour to Texas recently for the purpose of saving some of the desperate denizens of the Lone Star state. He opened hi first meeting in what is known in the state as a "tough town." About thirty hard-looking male citizens comprised the audience. After the good man had discoursed a little and sung several revival hymns, he requested that a collection be taken up to carry him further into the state. A tall and fierce-looking Texan, armed to the nape of his neck, passed his sombrero around, with the significant remark, "Guv liberally, boys; you've seen the show, and we ain't the men to beat any showman." The result was that every man contributed something, and when the hat was passed to the evangelist he examined the contents and then remarked: "I find in this hat four dollars, fifteen cents, and two overcoat buttons." "That ain't a squar' deal," yelled the fierce man who had taken up the collection, as he mounted the chair. "The man who put them buttons in the hat will redeem them at fifty cents apiece, or there'll be hell here in the toss of a cent" "Make no disturbance, my friend," pleaded the evangelist, holding the supposed buttons in full view. "I will—" A shout and considerable laughter cut off the evangelist's remark, and the tall man, without dismounting from the chair, said: "Mister Preacher-man, you're clean off on overcoat buttons. Them ain't no buttons; them are chips, good for fifty cents' worth of licker in any gin-mill this side of the Rio Grande. They'll also git you cooked grub, stranger, ef yer appetite needs it." The explanation was satisfactory, and the meeting closed.

Notes and Clippings.

BARTHOLDI'S statue of Liberty has eyes which measure six feet from corner to corner. And yet she is unable to see a fund large enough to complete her pedestal.

THE Paris municipality has just selected the names of forty new streets. Among the names are "Darwin," "George Sand," "Saint-Beuve," "Henry Heine," and "Gustave Dore."

A "PRAYER HOSPITAL" has been opened in Erie for the reception of persons who are given up to death by physicians. The Norristown Herald thinks that "Prayer Hospital" is a new name for a cemetery.

GEORGE WHITE, of Bakersfield, Cal., hasn't a very good opinion of the average camp-meeting. The other day, during a quarrel, his brother told him that he was as immoral as a camp-meeting and he turned and shot him.

"I THINK it's outrageous," said Mrs. Sparrowgrass; "here it says in the paper that St. John has been nominated for president. It's bad enough making fun of live people, but when they begin lugging in the apostles it certainly is too much."

THE Paris Journal des Debats has good reason to believe that in the week in which the Divorce act comes into force two or three million petitions will be presented to make separations divorce. The French are a mercurial people, loving a little and not for long.

THE United Trades Unions of the Eastern District of Brooklyn hav requested the park commissioners to change the time for the park concerts from Saturday to Sunday, on the ground that as they now are, the workingmen, who pay for them, cannot enjoy them.

CURATE (to new villager): "How is it, Mr. Blank, I never see you at our church?" Mr. Blank: "The fact is, I hold the responsible position of cashier and confidential clerk in a large mercantile house, and by becoming a member of any religious body I should insure my instant dismissal. Good-day!"

A XENIA (Ohio) Presbyterian church refuses to giv money to any missionary board which aids "congregations using instruments of music in the worship of God." Will these Xenia people refuse to enter the portals of heaven until they hav the assurances that there are no harps in the hands of the saints?

W. W. CORCORAN, the Washington banker and benefactor, has added to his good works by founding the School of Science and Arts in connection with Columbian University, and among the professors will be Newcomb in astronomy, Abbe in meteorology, Gill in zoology, Ward in botany, and Fristoe in chemistry.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Fruit Recorder says he has boiled leaves and stems of tomato plants until the juice is all extracted, and finds the liquor deadly to caterpillars, lice, and many other enemies of vegetation. It does not injure the growth of plants, and the odor remains a long time to disgust insect marauders.

M. LEVAT, a learned member of the French Academy of Sciences, has just discovered that melons contain a somewhat considerable proportion of alcohol. This gentleman decorticated three kilograms of melon, put it through a course of scientific treatment, and obtained therefrom five liters of alcohol, perfectly normal and usable.

MR. STUART CUMBERLAND, the mind-reader, gave some successful experiments on Saturday at Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild's new seat at Waddesdon, among his subjects being the Prince of Wales. Mr. Cumberland was blindfolded. The prince thought of an animal. Mr. Cumberland took his left hand, and in two or three minutes traced a rough outline of an elephant.

IN obedience to what he considered a command from God, M. J. Kinsley, a young shoemaker of Randolph, shockingly mutilated himself yesterday. Evidently he had been meditating on the lines, "If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off," for he deliberately placed his right hand under a sole-cutter in the shop where he was employed and allowed the die to fall and cut the hand completely off. He is only twenty-one years of age.

"IT'S a pity," remarked a preacher, "that the world is so prone to be untruthful." "Well, yes, rather," replied a layman. "I hav noticed, for some time past, that the evil has been growing, and not only in great things, but even about small things, lies will be told." "True, very true," answered the layman sadly. "I was reading only yesterday that 'Heaven lies about us in our infancy.'" Then the preacher put on his hat and went out to commune with the hitching-post.

A RELIGIOUS paper chuckles over the cool summer having kept more people in town to attend the churches, but laments that revivals are not gotten up in cities to meet the new state of things. "Summer revivals," it says, "are so rare that a cause must be found in the defectiv faith of the churches. Souls are converted at camp-meetings. There fervor and faith win the promised blessings." Are not conversions at camp-meetings due to the passions being more lively in hot weather than in cold?

THE Rev. Richard Fuller, of Maryland, died recently, leaving a will bequeathing his estate on certain conditions to the Eutaw Place Baptist church "for the worship of Jesus Christ according to the faith and doctrins of the said Eutaw Place Baptist church and the Orthodox Baptist churches." Judge Stewart of the circuit court at Baltimore has declared this clause of the will void, holding that in a country where no state church exists it is not within the province of a court of equity to decide what is orthodox and what is not.

THE Frankfort Gazette tells how, at a recent large convivial reunion of students in that city, one of them proposed the health of Prince Bismarck in a little speech giving reasons for so doing, but was interrupted by hisses. When he had concluded a government functionary, who participated in the little festival, rose and said: "Prince Bismarck is great, but the German nation is greater. The prince has done great things, but the German nation has done yet greater. I propose, then, the toast, 'Long life to the German people.'" It was drunk with loud and prolonged cheering.

THE clergymen of the Established church in England are using every possible device to increase their congregations, reduced to a minimum during the summer. Among other means they hav latterly been in the habit of employing is that of displaying conspicuous posters, giving the subjects of their sermons, said subjects being of a sensational nature. Among these subjects are, "Thieves," "Suicides," and "Darkness." But one enterprising clergyman at Chelsea has outstripped his brethren by posting the walls with large-lettered bills reading, "Hell! Hell! Hell!"

THE parade of the Brooklyn liquor-dealers and brewers on the 14th bore transparencies with the inscriptions: "Down with temperance laws," "Equal rights to all men in business," "One flag, one country, two lagers, and three cheers for Jacques Nichols." A small cart labeled as belonging to the last named gentleman carried a cheerful charcoal sketch of a tightly corked gin bottle mounted upon pipe-stem legs inscribed "Citizenship and justice," on a dead run for a goal marked by a corpulent barrel labeled, "Beer." In hot pursuit followed a nondescript figure equally attenuated, with a long, coffin-shaped face and pendulous ears. It was chalked down as "cold water," and its ears were burdened with the words "venom" and "bigotry."

CO-OPERATIV baby farming is a success at Guise, France. In a late issue of Le Devoir, the official organ of M. Godin, who is the governor of the familistere at that place, it is stated that the birth rate under his communal system is about the same as in French towns of the same population, while the infant mortality is fifty per cent less. The baby farm comprises a baby house and a baby garden. The house contains one hundred beds and one immense play-room, especially fitted up for its inmates. It opens flush with the garden, and is surrounded with spacious verandas. The administration is by a governess, with two assistants and the mothers that volunteer to serve. The children are generally brought there in the morning and taken to their homes at night, but a few make it a permanent home.

THE education of animals in general, and especially of such as hav become more or less domesticated, has for some years engaged the attention of Mr. William Hosea Ballou, a member of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, a resident of this city. His researches hav been much aided by friends who, in reply to advertisments inserted in various journals, hav forwarded to him photographs of intelligent cats, dogs, and horses, together with detailed accounts of the mode in which these animals were trained. Mr. Ballou thus acquired a vast mass of material, but, being anxious to make his knowledge as perfect as possible, he now advertises in the N. Y. Herald for further "incidents of intelligence and mental evolution in animals." He states his belief that there will be perfected within the next hundred years a system of communication between man and animals.

JOHN C. ENO, the New York banker who recently hypothecated a few hundred thousands and found it congenial to his personal comfort to put himself beyond the reach of the United States officials, has taken up his residence in Quebec, where he has rented a fine house splendidly furnished and been joined by his family. There are some hundreds of poor people who hav been ruined by John's knavery and they would giv him a quit claim on their deposits for the privilege of a brief interview. But Eno's enough to keep out of their clutches, and will probably become from this time forth a loyal subject of Her Most Gracious Majesty, whose little speck of Canadian land is a refuge for all the rascals who are alert enough to get there in time. As if to add to this rascal's knavery, comes the later intelligence that he is going to prosecute those Canadian officials who assisted the United States authorities in trying to secure his extradition.

LONDON, with its population of 4,000,000, takes precedence of all other great cities in its list of periodical publications, which number nearly 2,000. These hav an annual circulation of about 1,017,000,000 copies. Paris, with a population less than 2,000,000, issues 1,553 periodicals, and these hav an annual circulation of about 1,100,000,000 copies, so that in fact the citizens of Paris are more liberally supplied with daily and weekly provender than their British neighbors. In fact, it is estimated that the journalistic products of Paris amount annually to almost one-tenth of the entire issue of the globe. New York and Brooklyn, with a population nearly equal to that of Paris, produce 587 publications, with an annual circulation of about 516,000,000; Berlin produces 536; Vienna, 482; Madrid, 253; Brussels, 233; Rome, 213, showing a gradual diminution until St. Petersburg is reached, with a population of 667,963, and a newspaper issue of 183; and Moscow, with a population of 601,969, and only 57 periodicals.

THE Freeman's Journal says: "The only sin recognizable by Freemasonry is disobedience to its laws or the divulging of its secrets. Let American and English Freemasons recoil from the truth as Mr. Bradlaugh has stated it; let them say they can no longer be connected with a sect openly anti-Christian, and really they cease to be Freemasons. If the English Freemasons 'excommunicate' Mr. Bradlaugh they excommunicate themselvs. If they say that they cannot be affiliated with those who openly declare their hatred of God, they cut themselvs off from the communion of Freemasonry. Lord Carnarvon, who is a very powerful person in the English lodges, may protest against the encyclical, and point to the 'respectability' of so many Masons. But 'respectability' is no argument. Pontius Pilate was a very respectable man in the estimation of the Jews and Romans. If any 'respectable' Freemason, with a glimpse of the horrible beginning and end of the sect to which he ignorantly belongs, asks: 'What is truth?' he will find his answer in the encyclical Humanum genus.

AN Anti-Prohibition mob gathered in Iowa City, Iowa, on the 13th, and attacked a prosecuting lawyer named W. H. Bailey, stripped his clothing off, and tarred him. His life was narrowly saved by a deputy sheriff. The mob, many of them crazed with drink, tried to catch the principal witness, named Swafford, and would hav hanged him had they found him. A constable was severely cut with knives. The roughs for an hour had possession of the street, the sheriff's force and the city police being powerless.

AT the New York state labor convention, August 11th, an attempt to choose a Cleveland man for chairman was defeated. Cleveland was censured for action considered hostil to labor. None of the presidential candidates was declared in favor of. The sentiment for Butler was strong with individuals. A delegate from Troy expressed the belief that if the question came before the convention Butler would hav a two-thirds vote. Chairman Blair congratulated the labor organization of the state on securing the popular expression by 139,000 majority in favor of abolishing contract prison labor, and charged the Senate with defeating the bill providing a substitute for such labor. The Child Labor bill, still more important, was lost in the Senate. "Every effort should be made," he said, "to defeat the candidates this fall who are backed by these Senators, unless a written pledge is given that they will vote for the child labor, ten-hour, and other bills in our interest. The necessity of this legislation is well known to the working women of Utica, Cohoes, and other cities of the state. The Mechanics' Lien bill, State Printing bill, Twelve-hour bill, Life and Limb bill, and Stonecutters' bill are measures which can all be enacted into laws if the men who voted against these bills are defeated at the polls."

Retrogressiv Religion.

BY HERBERT SPENCER.

In days when dueling was common, and its code of ceremonial well elaborated, a deadly encounter was preceded by a polite salute. Having by his obeisance professed to be his antagonist's very humble servant, each forthwith did his best to run him through the body.

This usage is recalled to me by the contrast between the compliment with which Mr. Harrison begins his article, "The Ghost of Religion," and the efforts he afterward makes to destroy, in the brilliant style habitual with him, all but the negativ part of that which he applauds. After speaking with too-flattering eulogy of the mode in which I hav dealt with current theological doctrins, he does his best, amid the flashes of wit coming from its polished surface, to pass the sword of his logic through the ribs of my argument, and let out its vital principle—that element in it which is derived from the religious ideas and sentiments that hav grown up along with human evolution, but which is inconsistent with the creed Mr. Harrison preaches.

So misleading was the professed agreement with which he commenced his article, that, as I read on, I was some time in awakening to the fact that I had before me not a friend, but, controversially speaking, a determined enemy, who was seeking to reduce, as he would say to a ghostly form, that surviving element of religion which, as I had contended, Agnosticism contains. Even when this dawned on me, the suavity of Mr. Harrison's first manner continued so influential that I entertained no thought of defending myself. It was only after perceiving that what he modestly calls "a rider" was described by one journal as "a criticism keen, trenchant, destructiv," while by some other journals kindred estimates of it were formed, that I decided to make a reply as soon as pending engagements allowed.

Recognizing, then, the substance of Mr. Harrison's article as being an unsparing assault on the essential part of that doctrin which I hav set forth, I shall here not scruple to defend it in the most effectiv way I can; not allowing the laudation with which Mr. Harrison prefaces his ridicule to negativ such rejoinders, incisiv as I can make them, as will best serve my purpose.

A critic who, in a recent number of the Edinburgh Review, tells the world in very plain language what he thinks about a book of mine, and who has been taken to task by the editor of Knowledge for his injustice, refers to Mr. Harrison (whom he describes in felicitous phrase as looking at me from "a very opposit pole") as being, on one point, in agreement with him (Knowledge, March 14, 1884). But for this reference it would not hav occurred to me to associate in thought Mr. Harrison's criticisms with those of the Edinburgh Reviewer; but now that comparison is suggested, I am struck by the fact that Mr. Harrison's representations of my views diverge from the realities no less widely than those of a critic whose antagonism is unqualified, and whose animus is displayed in his first paragraph.

So anxious is Mr. Harrison to show that the doctrin he would discredit has no kinship to the doctrins called religious, that he will not allow me, without protest, to use the language needed for conveying my meaning. The expression "an Infinit and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed," he objects to as being "perhaps a rather equivocal reversion to the theologic type," and he says this because "in the Athanasian Creed the Third Person 'proceeds' from the First and the Second." It is hard that I should be debarred from thus using the word by this preceding use. Perhaps Mr. Harrison will be suprised to learn that, as originally written, the expression ran—"an Infinit and Eternal Energy by which all things are created and sustained;" and that in the proof I struck out the last clause because, though the words did not express more than I meant, the ideas associated with them might mislead, and there might result such an insinuation as that which Mr. Harrison makes. The substituted expression, which embodies my thought in the most colorless way, I cannot relinquish because he does not like it—or rather, indeed, because he does not like the thought itself. It is not convenient to him that the Unknowable, which he repeatedly speaks of as a pure negation, should be represented as that through which all things exist. And, indeed, it would be inconvenient for him to recognize this; since the recognition would prevent him from asserting that "none of the positiv attributes which hav ever been predicated of God can be used of this Energy."

Not only does he, as in the last sentence, negativly misdescribe the character of this Energy, but he positivly misdescribes it. He says—"It remains always Energy, Force; nothing anthropomorphic; such as electricity, or anything else that we might conceive as the ultimate basis of all the physical forces." Now, on page 9 of the essay Mr. Harrison criticises, there occurs the sentence—"The final outcome of that speculation commenced by the primitiv man, is that the Power manifested throughout the Universe distinguished as material, is the same power which in ourselvs wells up under the form of consciousness;" and on page 11 it is said that "this necessity we are under, to think of the external energy in terms of the internal energy, givs rather a spiritualistic than a materialistic aspect to the Universe." Does he really think that the meaning of these sentences is conveyed by comparing the ultimate energy to "electricity?" And does he think this in face of the statement on page 11 that "phenomenal manifestations of this ultimate energy can in no wise show us what it is?" Surely that which is described as the substratum at once of material and mental existence, bears toward us and toward the Universe, a relation utterly unlike that which electricity bears to the other physical forces.

Persistent thinking along defined grooves, causes inability to get out of them; and Mr. Harrison, in more than one way, illustrates this. So completely is his thought molded to that form of phenomenalism entertained by M. Comte, that, in spite of repeated denials of it, he ascribes it to me; and does this in face of the various presentations of an opposed phenomenalism, which I hav given in the article he criticises and elsewhere. Speaking after his lively manner of the Unknown Cause as "an ever-present conundrum to be everlastingly given up," he asks—"How does the man of science approach the All-Nothingness?" Now M. Comte describes Positivism as becoming perfect when it reaches the power to "se representer tous les divers phenomenes observables comme des cas particuliers d'un seul fait general . . . considerant comme absolument inaccessible, et vide de sens pour nous, la recherche de ce qu'on appelle les causes, soit premieres, soit finales" ("Systeme de Philosophie Positive," vol. i, pp. 5, 14.); and in pursuance of this view the Comtean system limits itself to phenomena, and deliberately ignores the existence of anything implied by the phenomena. But though M. Comte thus exhibits to us a doctrin which, performing "the happy dispatch," eviscerates things and leaves a shell of appearances with no reality inside; yet I hav in more than one place, and in the most emphatic way, declined thus to commit intellectual suicide. So far from regarding that which transcends phenomena as the "All-Nothingness," I regard it as the All-Being. Everywhere I hav spoken of the Unknowable as the Ultimate Reality—the sole existence; all things present to consciousness being but shows of it. Mr. Harrison entirely inverts our relativ positions. As I understand the case, the "All-Nothingness" is that phenomenal existence in which M. Comte and his disciples profess to dwell—profess, I say, because in their ordinary thoughts they recognize an existence transcending phenomena just as much as other people do.

That the opposition between the view actually held by me and the view ascribed to me by Mr. Harrison, is absolute, will be most clearly seen on observing the contrast he draws between my view and the view of the late Dean Mansel. He says:

"Of all modern theologians, the dean came the nearest to the evolution negation. But there is a gulf which separates even his all-negativ deity from Mr. Spencer's impersonal, unconscious, unthinking, and unthinkable energy."

It is quite true that there exists this gulf. But then the propositions forming the two sides of the gulf are the opposits of those which Mr. Harrison represents. For whereas, in common with his teacher Sir William Hamilton, Dean Mansel alleged that our consciousness of the Absolute is merely "a negation of conceivability;" I hav, over a space of ten pages, ("First Principles," § 26) contended that our consciousness of the Absolute is not negativ but positiv, and is the one indestructible element of consciousness "which persists at all times, under all circumstances, and cannot cease until consciousness ceases"—hav argued that while the Power which transcends phenomena cannot be brought within the forms of our finite thought, yet that, as being a necessary datum of every thought, belief in its existence has, among our beliefs, the highest validity of any; is not, as Sir W. Hamilton alleges, a belief with which we are supernaturally "inspired," but is a normal deliverance of consciousness. Thus, as represented by Mr. Harrison, Dean Mansel's views and my own are exactly transposed. Misrepresentation could not, I think, go further.

The conception I hav everywhere expressed and implied, of the relation between human life and the Ultimate Cause, if not diametrically opposed with like distinctness to the conception Mr. Harrison ascribes to me, is yet thus opposed in an unmistakable way. After suggesting that (x^n) would be an appropriate symbol "for the religion of the Infinit Unknowable," and amusing himself and his readers by imaginary prayers made to (x^n); after making a subsequent elaboration of his jeu d'esprit by suggesting that (nx) would serve for the formula of certain modern Theisms, he says of these:

"The Neo-Theisms hav all the same mortal weakness that the Unknowable has. They offer no kinship, sympathy, or relation whatever between worshiper and worshiped. They, too, are logical formulas begotten in controversy, dwelling apart from man and the world."

Now, considering that in the article he has before him there is in various ways implied the view that "the power which manifests itself in consciousness is but a differently conditioned form of the power which manifests itself beyond consciousness"—considering that here and everywhere throughout my books the implication is that our lives, alike physical and mental, in common with all the activities, organic and inorganic, amid which we liv, are but the workings of this Power, it is not a little astonishing to find it described as simply a "logical formula begotten in controversy." Does Mr. Harrison really think that he represents the facts when he describes as "dwelling apart from man and the world," that Power of which man and the world are regarded products, and which is manifested through man and the world from instant to instant?

Did I not need the space for other topics, I might at much greater length contrast Mr. Harrison's erroneous versions with the true ones. I might enlarge on the fact that, though the name Agnosticism fitly expresses the confessed inability to know or conceive the nature of the Power manifested through phenomena, it fails to indicate the confessed ability to recognize the existence of that Power as of all things the most certain. I might make clear the contrast between that Comtean Agnosticism which says that "Theology and ontology alike end in the Everlasting No with which science confronts all their assertions" (Harrison, loc. cit., p. 497.), and the Agnosticism set forth in "First Principles," which, along with its denials, emphatically utters an Everlasting Yes. And I might show in detail that Mr. Harrison is wrong in implying that Agnosticism, as I hold it, is anything more than silent with respect to the question of personality; since, though the attributes of personality, as we know it, cannot be conceived by us as attributes of the Unknown Cause of things, yet "duty requires us neither to affirm nor deny personality," but "to submit ourselvs with all humility to the established limits of our intelligence" in the conviction that the choice is not "between personality and something lower than personality," but "between personality and something higher" ("First Principles," § 31), and that "the Ultimate Power is no more representable in terms of human consciousness than human consciousness is representable in terms of a plant's functions" ("Essays," vol. iii, p. 251).

But without further evidence, what I hav said sufficiently proves that Mr. Harrison's "criticism keen, trenchant, destructiv," as it was called, is destructiv, not of an actual doctrin, but simply of an imaginary one. I should hardly hav expected that Mr. Harrison, in common with the "Edinburgh Reviewer," would hav taken the course, so frequent with critics, of demolishing a simulacrum and walking off in triumph as though the reality had been demolished. Adopting his own figure, I may say that he has with ease passed his weapon through and through "The Ghost of Religion;" but then it is only the ghost; the reality stands unscathed.

Before passing to the consideration of that alternativ doctrin which Mr. Harrison would hav us accept, it will be well briefly to deal with certain of his subordinate propositions.

After re-stating in a succinct way, the hypothesis that from the conception of the ghost originated the conceptions of supernatural beings in general, including the highest, and after saying that "one can hardly suppose that Mr. Spencer would limit himself to that," Mr. Harrison describes what he alleges to be a prior, and, indeed, the primordial, form of religion. He says:

"There were countless centuries of time, and there were, and there are, countless millions of men for whom no doctrin of superhuman spirits ever took coherent form. In all these ages and races, probably by far the most numerous that our planet has witnessed, there was religion in all kinds of definit form. Comte calls it fetishism—terms are not important; roughly, we may call it nature-worship. The religion in all these types was the belief and worship not of spirits of any kind, not of any immaterial, imagined being inside things, but of the actual visible things themselvs—trees, stones, rivers, mountains, earth, fire, stars, sun, and sky" (P. 498).

The attitude of discipleship is not favorable to inquiry; and, as fanatical Christians show us, inquiry is sometimes thought sinful and likely to bring punishment. I do not suppose that Mr. Harrison's reverence for M. Comte has gone this length; but still it has gone far enough not only to cause his continued adherence to a doctrin espoused by M. Comte which has been disproved, but also to make him tacitly assume that this doctrin is accepted by one whose rejection of it was long ago set forth. In the "Descriptiv Sociology" there are classified and tabulated statements concerning some eighty peoples; and besides these I hav had before me masses of facts, since collected, concerning many other peoples. An induction based on over a hundred examples, warrants me in saying that there has never existed anywhere such a religion as that which Mr. Harrison ascribes to "countless millions of men" during "countless centuries of time." A chapter on "Idol-worship and Fetish-worship" in the "Principles of Sociology," givs proof that in the absence of a developed ghost-theory, fetishism is absent. I hav shown that, whereas among the lowest races, such as the Juangs, Andamanese, Fuegians, Australians, Tasmanians, and Bushmen, there is no fetishism; fetishism reaches its greatest hight in considerably advanced societies, like those of ancient Peru and modern India; in which last place, as Sir Alfred Lyall tells us, "not only does the husbandman pray to his plow, the fisher to his net, the weaver to his loom, but the scribe adores his pen, and the banker his account-books" ("Religion of an Indian Province"). And I hav remarked that, "had fetishism been conspicuous among the lowest races, and inconspicuous among the higher, the statement that it was primordial might hav been held proved; but that as the facts happen to be exactly the opposit, the statement is conclusivly disproved" ("Principles of Sociology," § 162).

Similarly with Nature-worship: regarding this as being partially distinguished from Fetishism by the relativly imposing character of its objects. In a subsequent chapter I hav shown that this also is an aberrant development of ghost-worship. Among all the many tribes and nations, remote in place and unlike in type, whose superstitions I hav examined, I hav found no case in which any great natural appearance or power, feared and propitiated, was not identified with a human or quasi-human personality. I am not aware that Professor Max Muller, or any adherent of his, has been able to produce a single case in which there exists worship of the great natural objects themselvs, pure and simple—the heavens, the sun, the moon, the dawn, etc.: objects which, according to the mythologists, become personalized by "a disease of language." Personalization exists at the outset; and the worship is in all cases the worship of an indwelling ghost-derived being.

That these conclusions are necessitated by an exhaustiv examination of the evidence, is shown by the fact that they hav been forced on Dr. E. B. Tylor notwithstanding his original enunciation of other conclusions. In a lecture "On Traces of the Early Mental Condition of Man," delivered at the Royal Institution on the 15th of March, 1867, he said:

"It is well known that the lower races of mankind account for the facts and events of the outer world by ascribing a sort of human life and personality to animals, and even to plants, rocks, streams, winds, the sun and stars, and so on through the phenomena of nature. . . . It would probably add to the clearness of our conception of the state of mind which thus sees in all nature the action of animated life and the presence of innumerable spiritual beings, if we gave it the name of Animism instead of Fetishism."

Here, having first noted that the conception of Fetichism derived by Dr. Tylor from multitudinous facts, is not like that of Mr. Harrison, who conceives Fetishism to be a worship of the objects themselvs, and not a worship of their indwelling spirits, we further note that Dr. Tylor regards this ascription of souls to all objects, inanimate as well as animate, which he proposes to call Animism rather than Fetishism, as being primordial. In the earlier part of his "Primitiv Culture," published in 1871, we find a re-statement of this view; but further on we observe a modification of it, as instance the following sentence in vol. ii, p. 100:

"It seems as though the conception of a human soul, when once attained to by man, served as a type or model on which he framed not only his ideas of other souls of lower grade, but also his ideas of spiritual beings in general, from the tiniest elf that sports in the long grass, up to the heavenly Creator and Ruler of the world, the Great Spirit."

And then, in articles published in Mind for April and for July, 1877, Dr. Tylor represented himself as holding a doctrin identical with that set forth by me in the "Principles of Sociology;" namely, that the belief in a human ghost is original, and that the beliefs in spirits inhabiting inanimate objects, giving rise to Fetishism and Nature-worship, are derived beliefs.

An emphatic negativ is thus given to Mr. Harrison's assertion that "Nothing is more certain than that man everywhere started with a simple worship of natural objects." And if he holds that "the bearing of this on the future of religion is decisiv"—if, as he says, "the religion of man in the vast cycles of primitiv ages was reverence for nature as influencing Man," and if, as he infers, "the religion of man in the vast cycles that are to come will be the reverence for Humanity as supported by Nature"—if, as it thus seems, primitiv religion as conceived by him is a basis for what he conceives to be the religion of the future; then his conception of the religion of the future is, in so far, baseless.

And now I come to the chief purpose of this article—an examination of that alternativ faith which Mr. Harrison has on sundry occasions set forth with so much eloquence. As originally designed, the essay, "Religion: a Retrospect and Prospect," was to include a section in which, before considering what the future of religion was likely to be, I proposed to consider what its future was not likely to be; and the topic to be dealt with in this section was the so-called Religion of Humanity. After collecting materials and writing ten pages, I began to perceive that, besides being not needful for my purposes, this section would form too large an excrescence. A further feeling came into play. Though I had for many years looked forward to the time when an examination of the Positivist creed would fall within the lines of my work, yet when I began to put on paper that which I had frequently thought, it seemed to me that I was making an uncalled-for attack on men whom I had every reason to admire for their high characters and their unwearying efforts for human welfare. The result was that I put aside what I had written, and gave up my long-cherished intention. Now, however, that Mr. Harrison has thrown down the gauntlet, I take it up, at once willingly and unwillingly—willingly in so far as acceptance of the challenge is concerned, unwillingly because I feel some reluctance in dealing hard blows at a personal friend.

Surprise has been the feeling habitually produced in me on observing the incongruity between the astounding claims made by the propounder of this new creed, and the great intelligence of disciples whose faith appears proof against the shock which these astounding claims produce on ordinary minds. Those who, from a broad view of human progress, hav gained the general impression that "the individual withers, and the world is more and more," must be disinclined to believe that in the future any one individual will impose on the world a government like that sought to be imposed by M. Comte, who, unable to influence any considerable number of men while he lived, consoled himself with the thought of absolutely ruling all men after his death. Met, as he complained, by "a conspiracy of silence," he was nevertheless confident that, very shortly becoming converts, mankind at large would hereafter liv and move and hav their being within his elaborated formulas. Papal assumption is modest compared with the assumption of "the founder of the Religion of Humanity." A single pope may canonize a saint or two, but M. Comte undertook the canonization of all those men recorded in history whom he thought specially worthy of worship. And such a canonization!—days assigned for the remembrance with honor of mythical personages like Hercules and Orpheus and writers such as Terence and Juvenal; other days on which honors like in degree are given to Kant and to Robertson, to Bernard de Palissy and to Schiller, to Copernicus and to Dollond, to Otway and to Racine, to Locke and to Freret, to Froissart and to Dalton, to Cyrus and to Penn—such a canonization! in which these selected men who are the Positivist saints for ordinary days, are headed by greater saints for Sundays, with the result that Socrates and Godfrey are thus placed on a par; that while a day is dedicated to Kepler, a week is dedicated to Gall; Tasso has a week assigned to him, and Goethe a day; Mozart presides over a week, and a day is presided over by Beethoven; a week is made sacred to Louis the Eleventh, and a day to Washington—such a canonization! under which the greatest men, giving their names to months, are so selected that Frederic the Second and St. Paul alike bear this distinction; Gutenberg and Shakspere head adjacent months; and while Bichat givs his name to a month, Newton givs his name to a week! This, which recalls the saints' calendar of the Babylonians, among whom, as Professor Sayce shows, "each day of the year had been assigned to its particular deity or patron saint" ("Records of the Past," vol. vii, p. 157), exemplifies in but one way M. Comte's consuming passion for regulating posterity, and the colossal vanity which led him to believe that mankind would hereafter perform their daily actions as he dictated. He not only settles the hierarchy of saints who are above others to be worshiped, but he prescribes the forms of worship in minute detail. Nine sacraments are specified; prayer is to be made thrice a day, for the "daily expression of their emotions, both in public and private;" it is suggested that future men should use Italian ("System of Positiv Polity," vol. iv, p. 85); and it is a recommended "rule of worship" of the person you adore, that "a precise idea of the place, next of the seat or the attitude, and, lastly, of the dress, appropriate to each particular case" ("Catechism," p. 100), should be summoned before the mind. Add to which that in the elaborate rubric the sacred sign (replacing the sign of the cross), and derived "from our cerebral theory" (he had a phrenology of his own) consists in placing "our hand in succession on the three chief organs—those of love, order, and progress." Of banners used in "solemn processions," it is directed that "on their white side will be the holy image; on their green, the sacred formula of Positivism," and "the symbol of our Divinity will always be a woman of the age of thirty, with her son in her arms" ("Catechism of Positivism," pp. 142, 143). Nor was M. Comte's devouring desire to rule the future satisfied with thus elaborating the observances of his cult. He undertook to control the secular culture of men, as well as that culture which, I suppose, he distinguished as sacred. There is "a Positivist library for the nineteenth century," consisting of 150 volumes, the list being compiled for the purpose "of guiding the more thoughtful minds" (Ibid, p. 38). So that M. Comte's tastes and judgments in poetry, science, history, etc., are to be the standards for future generations. And the numerous regulations of these kinds are in addition to the other multitudinous regulations contained in those parts of the highly elaborated "System of Positiv Polity," in which M. Comte prescribes the social organization, under the arrangements of which "the affectiv, speculativ, patrician, and plebeian" classes are to carry on the business of their lives.

It is, I say, not a little remarkable that a hight of assumption exceeding that ever before displayed by a human being—a self-deification along with the deification of Humanity—should not hav negatived belief in the general doctrins set forth by him. One might hav thought that by exhibiting a lack of mental balance unparalleled among sane people, he would hav wholly discredited his speculations. However, recognizing the fact that this is not so, and assuming that M. Comte's disciples discover in the Religion of Humanity propounded by him, a truth which survives recognition of his—eccentricities, let us call them—we will now go on to consider this proposed creed.

To those who hav studied that natural genesis of religion summarized in the article Mr. Harrison criticises (and set forth at length in "The Principles of Sociology," Part I), it will appear anomalous that a proposed new and higher religion should be, in large measure, a rehabilitation of the religion with which mankind commenced, and from which they hav been insensibly diverging, until the more advanced among them hav quite lost sight of it. After an era during which worship of the dead was practiced the world over, alike by savages and by the progenitors of the civilized—after an era of slow emergence from this primitiv religion, during which the propitiation of ghosts completely human was replaced by the propitiation of comparativly few superhuman ghosts or spirits, and finally by the propitiation of a spirit infinitly transcending humanity, and from which human attributes hav been gradually dropped, leaving only the most abstract, which are themselvs fading; we are told by the Positivists that there is coming an era in which the Universal Power men hav come to believe in will be ignored; and human individualities, regarded now singly and now in their aggfegate, will again be the objects of religious feeling. If the worship of the dead is not to be completely resuscitated, still the proposal is to resuscitate it in a form but partially transfigured. Though there is no direction to offer at graves food and drink for ghosts, yet public worship of the so-called "Great Being Humanity," "must be performed in the midst of the tombs of the more eminent dead, which tombs are surrounded by a sacred grove, the scene of the homage paid by their family and their fellow-citizens;" ("Positiv Polity," vol. iv, p. 139); while "at times within each consecrated tomb, the priesthood will" superintend the honoring of that good man or woman ("Catechism," p. 137): proposed usages analagous to those of many ancestor-worshiping peoples. Moreover, again taking a lesson from various races of pagans, past and present, there is to be "a domestic altar," at which, in kneeling attitude, adoration is to be paid to "our own personal patrons, our guardian angels, or household gods" ("Positiv Polity," vol. iv, pp. 100, 101); these being persons living or dead. And as exemplified by M. Comte's worship of Clotilde de Vaux, the praying to a beloved person or wife may be continued for years; recalling the customs of multitudinous peoples who invoke departed members of their families, as instance the Balonda, among whom if the "spot where a favorit wife has died . . . is revisited, it is to pray to her" (Livingstone, "South Africa," p. 314).

Now, omitting for the present all thought about the worthiness of these objects of worship, and considering only the general nature of the system, there arises the question, How happens it that while in other respects M. Comte delineates human evolution as progressiv, he, in this respect, delineates it as retrogressiv? Beyond all question civilization has been a gradual divergence from primitiv savagery. According to his own account, the advancé in social organization, in knowledge, in science, in art, presents a certain general continuity. Even in speculativ thought, Mr. Comte's formula of the three stages, the theological, the metaphysical, and the positiv, tacitly asserts movements in the same direction toward a final theory. How happens it, then, that with an advancing change in other things, there is to occur a retreating change in one thing—along with progression in all else, retrogression in religion?

This retrogressiv character of the Comtean religion is shown in sundry other ways—being, indeed, sometimes distinctly admitted or avowed. Thus we are told that "the domain of the priesthood must be re-constituted in its integrity; medicin must again become a part of it" ("Catechism," p. 50), as from savage life upward it was until modern times. Again, education has been slowly emancipating itself from ecclesiasticism; but in M. Comte's scheme, after the sacrament of initiation, the child passes "from its unsystematic training under the eye of its mother to the systematic education given by the priesthood" "Catechism," p. 129); just as, after a parallel ceremony, the child does among the Congo people (Bastian, A. "Africanische Reisen," p. 85), and as it did among the ancient Mexicans (Torquemada, Juan de, "Monarquia Indiana," book ix, chaps. xi to xiii). And, knowingly or unknowingly, M. Comte followed the lead of the Egyptians who had a formal judging of the dead by the living. Honorable burial was allowed by them only in the absence of accusations against the deceased proved before judges; and by M. Comte it is provided that after a prescribed interval the priesthood shall decide whether the remains shall be transferred from their probationary resting-place to "the sacred wood" reserved for the "sanctified." Most remarkable of all, however, is the reversion to an early type of religious belief in the prescribed worship of objects, animate and inanimate. In "Table A, System of Sociolatry," there are times named for the "Festival of the Animals," "Festival of Fire," "Festival of the Sun," "Festival of Iron," etc.

But now, passing over M. Comte's eccentricities and inconsistencies, let us consider on its merits the creed he enunciated. In addition to private worship of guardian angels, or household gods, there is to be a public worship of the "Great Being Humanity." How are we to conceive this Great Being? Various conceptions of it are possible; and more or less unlike conceptions are at one time or other presented to us. Let us look at them in succession.

By M. Comte himself, at page 74 of the "Catechism of Positiv Religion," we are told that we must "define Humanity as the whole of human beings, past, present, and future. The word whole points out clearly that you must not take in all men, but those only who are really capable of assimilation, in virtue of a real co-operation on their part in furthering the common good." On which the first comment suggesting itself is that the word "whole points out clearly" not limitation, but absence of limitation. Passing over this, however, and agreeing to exclude, as is intended, criminals, paupers, beggars, and all who "remain in the parasitic state," it seems that we are to include in the aggregate object of our worship, all who hav aided, now aid, and will hereafter aid, social growth and development. Though elsewhere ("Catechism," p. 427) it is limited to those who "co-operate willingly," yet since "the animals which voluntarily aid man," are recognized as "integral portions of the Great Being," and since the co-operation of slaves is as "voluntary" as that of horses, we seem compelled to include, not the superior men and classes only, but even those who, under a coercion such as is used to domestic animals, hav helped to subdue the Earth and further the material progress of Humanity. And since the progress of Humanity has been largely aided by the spread of the higher races and accompanying extermination of the lower races, we must comprehend in our conception of this worshipful Great Being those who, from the earliest savage times, hav, as leading warriors and common soldiers, helped by their victories to replace inferior societies by superior ones; not only bloodthirsty conquerors like Sesostris (who is duly sanctified in the calendar) but even such cannibals as the Aztecs, who laid the basis of the Mexican civilization.

So far from seeing in the "Great Being Humanity," as thus defined, anything worshipful, it seems to me that contemplation of it is calculated to excite feelings which it is best to keep out of consciousness.

But now, not to take the doctrin at a disadvantage, let us conceive the object of the Positivist's adoration under a better aspect. Let us consider what claims to godhood may be made for the Humanity immediately known to us. Unquestionably M. Comte's own doctrin, that there has been going on an evolution of mankind, implies that such portion of the "Great Being Humanity" as is formed by our own generation, is better than the average of those portions which hav heretofore lived and died. What, then, shall we say of this better portion?

Of course we must keep out of thought all the bad conduct going on around—the prevailing dishonesty shown in adulteration by retailers and production of debased goods by manufacturers, the inefficient and dawdling work of artisans, the many fraudulent transactions of which a few are daily disclosed at trials; though why we are to exclude the blameworthy from our conception of Humanity, I do not understand. But not dwelling on this, let us contemplate first the intellectual traits, and then the moral traits, of the people who remain after leaving out the worse.

Those whose mental appetites are daily satisfied by table talk almost wholly personal, by gossiping books and novels, and by newspapers the contents of which are usually enjoyed the more in proportion as there is in them much of the scandalous or the horrible—those who, on Sunday, never working out their own beliefs, receive the weekly dole of thought called for by their state of spiritual pauperism—those who, to the ideas they received during education, add only such as are supplied by daily journals and weekly sermons, with now and then a few from books, having none of their own worth speaking of; we may be content to class as respectable in the conventional sense, though scarcely in any higher sense—still less to include them as chief components in a body exciting reverence. Even if we limit attention to those of highest culture, including all who are concerned in regulativ functions, political, ecclesiastical, educational, or other, the displays of intelligence do not call forth such an emotion as that which M. Comte's theory requires us to entertain. What shall we say of the wisdom of those, including nearly all who occupy influential positions, who persist in thinking that preparation for successful and complete living (which is the purpose of rational education) is best effected by learning to speak and write after the manner of two extinct peoples, and by gaining knowledge of their chief men, their superstitions, their deeds of war, etc.—who, in their leading school, devote two hours per week to getting some ideas about the constitution of the world they are born into, and thirty-six hours per week to construing Latin and Greek and making verses, nonsensical or other, and who, in the competitiv examinations they devise, giv to knowledge of words double the number of marks which they giv to knowledge of things? That, it seems to me, is not a very worshipful degree of intelligence which fails to recognize the obvious truth that there is an Order of Nature, pervading alike the actions going on within us and without us, to which, from moment to moment, our lives must conform under penalty of one or other evil, and that therefore our first business must be to study this Order of Nature. Nor is estimation of this intelligence raised on contemplating the outcome of this established culture, as seen in Parliament, where any proposal to judge a question by reference to general laws, or "abstract principles," as they are called, is pooh-poohed, with the tacit implication that in social affairs there is no natural law, and where, as we lately saw, 300 select spokesmen of the nation cheered frantically when it was decided that they should continue to vow before God that they would maintain certain arrangements prescribed for them by their great, great, great, etc., grandfathers.

On turning to the moral manifestations, we find still less that is calculated to excite the required religious feeling. When multitudes of citizens belonging to the classes distinguished as "the better," make a hero of a politician whose sole aim throughout life was success, regardless of principle, and hav even established an annual commemoration of him, we are obliged to infer that the prevailing sentiments are not of a very high order. Nothing approaching to adoration is called forth by those who, on the death of a youth who went to help in killing Zulus, with whom he had no quarrel, and all that he might increase his chance of playing despot over the French, thought him worthy of high funeral honors—would, many of them, indeed, hav given him the highest. No feeling of reverence arises in one's mind on thinking of people who looked on with approval or tolerance when a sailor of fortune, who has hired himself out to an Eastern tyrant to slay at the word of command, was honored here by a banquet. A public opinion which recognizes no criminality in wholesale homicide so long as it is committed by a constituted political authority, no matter how vile, or by its foreign hired agent who is indifferent to the right or wrong of the question at issue, is a public opinion which excites, in some at any rate, an emotion nearer to contempt than to adoration.

This emotion is not changed on looking abroad and contemplating the implied natures of those who guide, and the implied natures of those who accept the guidance. When, among a people professing the religion of peace preached to them generation after generation by tens of thousands of priests, an assembly receives with enthusiasm, as lately at the Gambetta dinner, the toast, "The French army, the highest embodiment of the French nation"—when, along with nominal acceptance of forgivness as a Christian duty, there goes intense determination to retaliate, we are obliged to reprobate either the feeling which they actually think proper, or the hypocrisy with which they profess that the opposit feeling is proper. On finding in another advanced society that the seats of highest culture are seats of disciplin in barbarism, where the test of manhood is the giving and taking of wounds in fights arising from trivial causes or none at all, and where, last year, a single day witnessed twenty-one such encounters in one university; we are reminded more of North American Indians, among whom tortures constitute the initiation of young men, than of civilized people taught for a thousand years to do good even to enemies. Or when we see, as lately in a nation akin to the last, that an officer who declined to break at once the law of his country and the law of his religion by fighting a duel, was expelled the army, we are obliged to admit that profession of a creed which forbids revenge, by those whose deeds emphatically assert revenge to be a duty (almost as emphatically as do the lowest races of men), presents Humanity under an aspect not at all of the kind which we look for in "the adorable Great Being." Not reverence, not admiration, scarcely even respect, is caused by the sight of a hundred million pagans masquerading as Christians.

I am told that by certain of M. Comte's disciples (though not by those Mr. Harrison represents) prayer is addressed to "holy" Humanity. Had I to choose an epithet, I think "holy" is about the last which would occur to me.

"But it is only the select human beings—those more especially who are sanctified in the Comtist calendar—who are to form the object of worship, and, for the worship of such, there is the reason that they are the benefactors to whom we owe everything."

On the first of these statements, made by some adherents of M. Comte, one remark must be that it is at variance with M. Comte's own definition of the object of worship, as quoted above; and another remark must be that, admitting such select persons to be worshipful (and I do not admit it), there is no more reason for worshiping Humanity as a whole on the strength of the best samples, than there is for worshiping an ordinary individual, or even a criminal, on the strength of the few good actions which qualified the multitudinous indifferent actions and bad actions he committed. The second of these statements, that Humanity, either as the whole defined by M. Comte or as represented by these select persons, must be adored as being the producer of everything which civilization has brought us, and, in a measure, even the creator of our higher powers of thought and action, we will now consider. Let us hear M. Comte himself on this point:

"Thus each step of sound training in positiv thought awakens perpetual feelings of veneration and gratitude; which rise often into enthusiastic admiration of the Great Being, who is the author of all these conquests, be they in thought, or be they in action" ("System of Positiv Polity," vol. ii, p. 45).

What may hav been the conceptions of "veneration and gratitude" entertained by M. Comte, we cannot, of course, say; but if one not a disciple will examin his consciousness, he will, I think, quickly perceive that veneration or gratitude felt toward any being, implies belief in the conscious action of that being—implies ascription of a prompting motiv of a high kind, and deeds resulting from it; gratitude cannot be entertained toward something which is unconscious. So that the "Great Being Humanity" must be conceived as having in its incorporated form, ideas, feelings, and volitions. Naturally there follows the inquiry—"Where is its seat of consciousness?" Is it diffused throughout mankind at large? That cannot be; for consciousness is an organized combination of mental states, implying instantaneous communications such as certainly do not exist throughout Humanity. Where, then, must be its center of consciousness? In France, of course, which, in the Comtean system, is to be the leading State; and naturally in Paris, to which all the major axes of the temples of Humanity are to point. Anyone with adequate humor might raise amusing questions respecting the constitution of that consciousness of the Great Being supposed to be thus localized. But, preserving our gravity, we hav simply to recognize the obvious truth that Humanity has no corporate consciousness whatever. Consciousness, known to each as existing in himself, is ascribed by him to other beings like himself, and, in a measure, to inferior beings; and there is not the slightest reason for supposing that there ever was, is now, or ever will be, any consciousness among men save that which exists in them individually. If, then, "the Great Being, who is the Author of all these conquests," is unconscious, the emotions of veneration and gratitude are absolutely irrelevant.

It will doubtless seem a paradox to say that human evolution with all its marvels, is to be credited neither to Humanity as an aggregate, nor to its component individuals; but the paradox will not be difficult to justify: especially if we set out with some analogies. An apt one is supplied by that "thing of beauty," the Euplectella or "Venus's flower-basket," now not uncommon as a drawing-room ornament. This fragil piece of animal architecture is not a product of any conscious creature, or of any combination of conscious creatures. It is the framework unknowingly elaborated by innumerable ciliated monads—each a simple nucleated cell, with a whip-like appendage which serves, by its waving movements, to aid the drawing in and sending out of sea-water, from which nutritiv matter is obtained; and it is simply by the proclivities which these monads hav toward certain modes of growth and secretion, that they form, without the consciousness of any one, or of all, this complicated city they inhabit. Again, take the case of a coral island. By it we are shown that a multitude of insignificant individuals may, by their separate actions carried on without concert, generate a structure imposing by its size and stability. One of these palm-covered atolls standing up out of vast depths on the Pacific, has been slowly built up by coral-polyps, while, through successiv small stages, the ocean-bottom has subsided. The mass produced by these brainless and almost nerveless animals—each by its tentacles slowly drawing in such food as the water occasionally brings, and at intervals budding out, plant-like, a new individual—is a mass exceeding in vastness any built by men, and defies the waves in a way which their best breakwaters fail to do: the whole structure being entirely undesigned, and, indeed, absolutely unknown to its producers, individually or in their aggregate.

Prepared by these analogies, everyone will see what is meant by the paradox that civilization, whether contemplated in its great organized societies or in their material and mental products, can be credited neither to any ideal "Great Being Humanity," nor to the real beings summed up under that abstract name. Though we cannot in this case say that neither the aggregate nor its units hav had any consciousness of the results wrought out, yet we may say that only after considerable advances of civilization, has this consciousness existed on the part of a few. Communities hav grown and organized themselvs through the attainment of private ends, mostly pursued with entire selfishness, and in utter ignorance of any social effects produced. If we begin with those early stages in which, among hostile tribes, one more numerous or better led than the rest, conquers them, and, consolidating them into a larger society, at the same time stops inter-tribal wars; we are shown that this step in advance is made, not only without thought of any advantage to Humanity, but often under the promptings of the basest motivs in the mind of the most atrocious savage. And so onward. It needs but to glance at such wall-paintings as those of the conquering Rameses at Karnac, or to read the inscriptions in which Assyrian kings proudly narrated their great deeds, to see that personal ambitions were pursued with absolute disregard of human welfare. But for that admiration of military glory with which classical culture imbues each rising generation, it would be felt that whatever benefits these kings unknowingly wrought, their self-praising records hav brought them not much more honor than has been brought to the Fijian king Tanoa by the row of nine hundred stones recording the number of victims he devoured. And though the outcome of those struggles for supremacy in which, during European history, so many millions hav been sacrificed, has been the formation of great nations fitted for the highest types of structure; yet when, hereafter, opinion is no longer swayed by public school ethics, it will be seen that the men who effected these unions did so from desires which should class them with criminals rather than with the benefactors of mankind. With governmental organizations it was the same as with social consolidations: they arose not to secure the blessings of order, but to maintain the ruler's power. As the original motiv for preventing quarrels among soldiers was that the army might not be rendered inefficient before the enemy, so, throughout the militant society at large, the motiv for suppressing conflicts was partly that of preventing hindrance to the king's wars, and partly that of asserting his authority. Administration of justice, as we know it, grew up incidentally; and began with bribing the ruling man to interfere on behalf of the complainant. Not wishes for the public weal, but wishes for private profit and power, originated the regulativ organizations of societies. So has it been, too, with their industrial organizations. Acts of barter between primitiv men were not prompted by thoughts of benefits to Humanity, to be eventually achieved by division of labor. When, as among various peoples, on occasions of assembling to make sacrifices at sacred places, some of the devotees took with them commodities likely to be wanted by others who would be there, and from whom needful supplies could be got in exchange, they never dreamed that they were making the first steps toward establishment of fairs, and eventually of markets: purely selfish desires prompted them. Nor on the part of the peddlers who, supplying themselvs wholesale at these gatherings, traveled about selling retail, was there any beneficent intention of initiating that vast and elaborate distributing system which now exists. Neither they nor any men of their time had imagined such a system. And the like holds of improved arts, of inventions, and, in large measure, of discoveries. It was not philanthropy which prompted the clearing of wild lands for the purpose of growing food; it was not philanthropy which little by little improved the breeds of animals, and adapted them to human use; it was not philanthropy which in the course of time changed the primitiv plow into the finished modern plow. Wishes for private satisfactions were the exclusiv stimuli. The successiv patents taken out by Watt, and his lawsuits in defense of them, show that though he doubtless foresaw some of the benefits which the steam-engin would confer on mankind, yet foresight of these was not the prime mover of his acts. The long concealment of the methods of fluxions by Newton, as well as the Newton-Leibnitz controversy which subsequently arose, show us that while there was perception of the benefits to science, and indirectly to Humanity, from the discoveries made by these mathematicians, yet that desires to confer these benefits were secondary to other desires—largely the love of scientific exploration itself, and, in a considerable degree, "the last infirmity of noble minds." Nor has it been otherwise with literature. Entirely dissenting, though I do, from the dictum of Johnson, that "No man but a blockhead ever wrote except for money," and knowing perfectly well that many books hav been written by others than "blockheads," not only without expectation of profit, but with the certainty of loss; yet I hold it clear that the majority of authors do not differ from other men to the extent that the desire to confer public benefit predominates over the desire to reap private benefit; in the shape of satisfied ambition if not in the shape of pecuniary return. And it is the same with the delights given to mankind by artistic products. The mind of the artist, whether composer, painter, or sculptor, has always been in a much greater degree occupied by the pleasure of creation and the thoughts of reward, material or mental, than by the wish to add to men's gratifications.

But we are most clearly shown how little either any aims of an ideal "Great Being," or any philanthrophic aims of individuals, hav had to do with civilization, by an instance which M. Comte himself refers to as proving our indebtedness. He says: "Language alone might suffice to recall to the mind of everyone how completely every creation of man is the result of a vast combination of efforts, equally extended over time and space" ("Positiv Polity," vol. ii, p. 48). Now nothing is more manifest than that language has been produced neither by the conscious efforts of the imagined "Great Being, who is the Author of all these conquests," nor by the conscious efforts of individual men. Passing over that intentional coining of words which occurs during the later stages of linguistic progress, it is undeniable that during those earlier stages which gave to languages their essential structures and vocabularies, the evolutionary process went on without the intention of those who were instrumental to it. The man who first, when discussing a probability, said giv (i. e. grant, or admit) so-and-so, and such and such follows, had no idea that by his metaphorical giv (which became gif and then if) he was helping to initiate a grammatical form. The original application of the word orange to some object like an orange in color, was made without consciousness that the act would presently lead to enrichment of the language by an additional adjectiv. And so throughout. The minute additions and modifications which hav, in thousands of years, given to human speech its present perfection, arose as random changes without thought of improvement; and the good ones insensibly spread as serving better the purposes of those who adopted them.

Thus, accepting M. Comte's typical instance of the obligations under which Humanity during the past has placed individuals at present, we must say that language, having been evolved during men's intercourse without the least design on their parts of conferring benefits, and without the faintest consciousness of what they were doing, affords no reason whatever for regarding them with that "veneration and gratitude" which he thinks due.

"But surely 'veneration and gratitude' are due somewhere. Surely civilized society, with its complex arrangements and involved processes, its multitudinous material products and almost magical instruments, its language, science, literature, art, must be credited to some agency or other. If the 'Great Being, Humanity,' considered as a whole, has not created it for us—if the individuals who hav co-operated in producing it hav done so while pursuing their private ends mostly without consciousness that they were either furthering or hindering human progress, how happens it that such benefits hav been achieved, and to what shall we attribute achievement of them?"

To Mr. Harrison, if his allegiance to his master is unqualified, no answer which he will think satisfactory can be given; for M. Comte negativs the recognition of any cause for the existence of human beings and the "Great Being" composed of them. It was one of his strange inconsistencies that, though he held it legitimate to inquire into the evolution of the Solar System (as is shown by his acceptance of the nebular hypothesis), and though he treats of human society as a product of evolution, yet all that region lying between the formation of planets and the origin of primitiv man, was interdicted by him. To those, however, who accept the doctrin of organic evolution, either with or without the doctrin of evolution at large, the obvious answer to the above question will be that if "veneration and gratitude" are due at all, they are due to that Ultimate Cause from which Humanity, individually and as a whole, in common with all other things, has proceeded. There is nothing in embodied Humanity but what results from the properties of its units—properties mainly prehistoric, and in a small measure generated by social life. If we ask whence come these properties—these structures and functions, bodily and mental—we must go for our answer to the slow operation of those processes of modification and complication through which, with the aid of surrounding conditions, ever themselvs growing more involved, there hav been produced the multitudinous organic types, up to the highest. If we persist in putting question beyond question, we are carried back to those more general causes which determined the structure and composition of the Earth during its concentration; and eventually we are carried back to the nebulous mass in which there existed, undistinguished into those concrete forms we now know, the forces out of which all things contained in the Solar System hav come, and in which there must hav been, as Professor Tyndall expresses it, "the promis and potency of all terrestrial life." Whether we contemplate such external changes as those of stars moving ten miles per second, and those which now in hours, now in years, now in centuries, arrange molecules into a crystal; or whether we contemplate internal changes, arising in us as ideas and feelings, and arising also in the chick which but a few weeks since was a viscid yolk, we are compelled to recognize everywhere an Energy capable of all forms and which has been ever assuming new forms, from the remotest time to which science carries us back down to the passing moment. If we take the highest product of evolution, civilized human society, and ask to what agency all its marvels must be credited, the inevitable answer is—To that Unknown Cause of which the entire Cosmos is a manifestation.

A spectator who, seeing a bubble floating on a great river, had his attention so absorbed by the bubble that he ignored the river—nay, even ridiculed anyone who thought that the river out of which the bubble arose and into which it would presently elapse, deserved recognition, would fitly typify a disciple of M. Comte, who, centering all his higher sentiments on Humanity, holds it absurd to let either thought or feeling be occupied with that great stream of Creativ Power, unlimited in Space or in Time, of which Humanity is a transitory product. Even if, instead of being the dull leaden-hued thing it is, the bubble Humanity had reached that stage of iridescence of which, happily, a high sample of man or woman sometimes shows us a beginning, it would still owe whatever there was in it of beauty to that Infinit and Eternal Energy out of which Humanity has quite recently emerged, and into which it must, in course of time, subside. As with thousands of lower types of creatures which hav severally illustrated the truth that the life and death of the individual prefigure in brief space the life and death of the race, so with this highest type of creature, Man; a beginning and end to Humanity are no less certain than the beginning and end to each human being. And to suppose that this relativly-evanescent form of existence ought to occupy our minds so exclusively as to leave no space for a consciousness of that Ultimate Existence of which it is but one form out of multitudes—an Ultimate Existence which was manifested in infinitly-varied ways before Humanity arose, and will be manifested in infinitly-varied other ways when Humanity has ceased to be, seems very strange—to me, indeed, amazing.

And here this contrast between the Positivist view and my own view, equally marked now as it was at first, leads me to ask in what respects the criticisms passed on the article—"Religion: a Retrospect and Prospect" hav affected its argument. Many years ago, as also by implication in that article, I contended that while Science shows that we can know phenomena only, its arguments involve no denial of an Existence beyond phenomena. In common with leading scientific men whose opinions are known to me, I hold that it does not bring us to an ultimate negation, as the presentations of my view made by Mr. Harrison and Sir James Stephen imply, and they hav done nothing to show that its outcome is negativ. Contrariwise, the thesis many years ago maintained by me against thinkers classed as orthodox ("First Principles," § 26), and reasserted after this long interval, is that though the nature of the Reality transcending appearances cannot be known, yet that its existence is necessarily implied by all we do know—that though no conception of this Reality can be framed by us, yet that an indestructible consciousness of it is the very basis of our intelligence (Sir James Stephen, who appears perplexed by the distinction between a conception and a consciousness, will find an explanation of it in "First Principles," § 26), and I do not find, either in Mr. Harrison's criticisms or in those of Sir James Stephen, any endeavor to prove the untruth of this thesis. Moreover, as originally elaborated and as recently restated, my argument was in the discovery by Science that it could not do more than ascertain the order among phenomena, there was involved a tacit confession of impotence in presence of the Mystery of Things—a confession which brought Science into sympathy with Religion; and that in their joint recognition of an Unknowable Cause for all the effects constituting the knowable world, Religion and Science would reach a truth common to the two. I do not see that anything said by my critics has shaken this position. I held at the outset, and continue to hold, that this Inscrutable Existence which Science, in the last resort, is compelled to recognize as unreached by its deepest analyses of matter, motion, thought, and feeling, stands toward our general conception of things, in substantially the same relation as does the Creativ Power asserted by Theology; and that when Theology, which has already dropped many of the anthropomorphic traits ascribed, eventually drops the last of them, the foundation-beliefs of the two must become identical. So far as I see, no endeavor has been made to show that this is not the case. Further I hav contended, originally and in the article named, that this Reality transcending appearance (which is not simply unknown, as Mr. Harrison thinks it should be called, but is proved by analysis of the form of our intelligence to be unknowable) ("First Principles," part I, chap. iv), standing toward the Universe and toward ourselvs in the same relation as an anthropomorphic Creator was supposed to stand, bears a like relation with it not only to human thought but to human feeling—the gradual replacement of a Power allied to humanity in certain traits, by a Power which we cannot say is thus allied, leaves unchanged certain of the sentiments comprehended under the name religious. Though I hav argued that in ascribing to the Unknowable Cause of things such human attributes as emotion, will, and intelligence, we are using words which, when thus applied, hav no corresponding ideas, yet I hav also argued that we are just as much debarred from denying as we are from affirming such attributes ("First Principles," § 31); since, as ultimate analysis brings us everywhere to alternativ impossibilities of thought, we are shown that beyond the phenomenal order of things, our ideas of possible and impossible are irrelevant. Nothing has been said which requires me to change this view: neither Mr. Harrison's statement that "to make a religion out of the Unknowable is far more extravagant than to make it out of the Equator," nor Sir James Stephen's description of the Unknowable as "like a gigantic soap-bubble not burst but blown thinner and thinner till it has become absolutely imperceptible," seems to me applicable. One who says that because the Infinit and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed, can not in any way be brought within the limits of human consciousness it therefore approaches to a nonentity, seems to me like one who says of a vast number that because it passes all possibility of enumeration it is like nothing, which is also innumerable. Once more when implying that the Infinit and Eternal Energy manifested alike within us and without us, and to which we must ascribe not only the manifestations themselvs but the law of their order, will hereafter continue to be, under its transfigured form, an object of religious sentiment; I hav implied that whatever components of this sentiment disappear, there must ever survive those which are appropriate to the consciousness of a mystery that cannot be fathomed and a power that is omnipresent. Mr. Harrison and Sir James Stephen hav said nothing to invalidate this position. Lastly, let me point out that I am not concerned to show what effect religious sentiment, as hereafter thus modified, will hav as a moral agent; though Mr. Harrison, by ridiculing the supposition that it will make good men and women, seems to imply that I hav argued, or am bound to argue, that it will do this. If he will refer to the "Data of Ethics" and other books of mine, he will find that modification of human nature, past and future, I ascribe in the main to the continuous operation of surrounding social conditions and entailed habits of life: though past forms of the religious consciousness hav exercised, and future forms will I believe exercise, co-operativ influences ("Data of Ethics," § 62).

How, then, does the case stand? Under "Retrospect," I aimed to show how the religious consciousness arose; and under "Prospect," what of this consciousness must remain when criticism has done its utmost. My opponents would hav succeeded had they shown (1) that it did not arise as alleged; or (2) that some other consciousness would remain; or (3) that no consciousness would remain. They hav done none of these things. Looking at the general results, it seems to me that while the things I hav said hav not been disproved, the things which hav been disproved are things I hav not said.

Christian Civilization a Failure.

"De odder ebenin' I heard an orator say dat dis was de aige of wisdom," remarked Brother Gardner as the meeting of the Lime Kiln Club opened in perfect harmony. A Model Organization.

The progress of Freethought in England during the last quarter of a century has been mainly due to the admirable organization of the National Secular Society. Before entering upon a description of the system of working adopted by this society, it may be well to giv a statement of its principles and objects as defined in the rules.

"The National Secular Society has been formed to maintain the principles and rights of Freethought, and to direct their application to the secular improvement of this life.

"By the principle of Freethought is meant the exercise of the understanding upon relevant facts, and independent of penal or priestly intimidation.

"By the rights of Freethought are meant the liberty of free criticism for the security of truth, and the liberty of free publicity for the extension of truth.

"Secularism relates to the present existence of man, and to actions the issue of which can be tested by experience.

"It declares that the promotion of human improvement and happiness is the highest duty, and that morality can be tested by utility.

"That in order to promote effectually the improvement and happiness of mankind, every individual of the human family ought to be well placed and well instructed, and that all who are of a suitable age ought to be usefully employed for their own and the general good.

"That human improvement and happiness cannot be effectually promoted without civil and religious liberty, and that therefore it is the duty of every individual to activly attack all barriers to equal freedom of thought and utterance for all upon political, theological, and social subjects.

"A Secularist is one who deduces his moral duties from considerations which pertain to this life, and who, practically recognizing the above duties, devotes himself to the promotion of the general good.

"The object of the National Secular Society is to disseminate the above principles by every legitimate means in its power."

This society has about twenty branches in London, and about one hundred in provincial towns, besides some in the colonies. Its executiv is composed of a president, vice-presidents, secretary, treasurer, auditors, and members of the council. The members of the executiv are elected annually at the general conference, with the exception of the last named, who are chosen by the branches, one for each branch. Those members of the council who reside more than twenty miles from the place of meeting of the executiv are termed corresponding members. All propositions touching the business of the conference are forwarded to them a month before each conference, and they are allowed to vote upon them by letter. The central offices of the society are at the Hall of Science, Old Street, City Road, where lectures are delivered to large audiences on every Sunday throughout the year. Science classes are held during the week in the winter season, and meetings for purposes of interest to Freethinkers occasionally take place.

Each branch has its own place of meeting, where the members and friends of the movement assemble at least once in every week. The proceedings are generally opened by a discourse on some theological, political, or scientific subject. This is sometimes given by a member of the branch, and at others by a special lecturer. Discussion is always invited, and debates are often carried on with considerable skill.

On special occasions, when a popular lecturer is engaged by the branch, it is customary to hire some larger building, usually a theater, or good-sized hall, for the purpose. Should a lecturer be secured for a Sunday, he usually givs three lectures on that day. All expenses of advertising and rent of hall are borne by the branch, and the balance remaining after expenses hav been deducted is paid to the lecturer.

The subscription to the National Secular Society is one shilling per quarter. The branches forward one-third of each member's subscription to the parent society. In connection with the society there is a benevolent fund for assisting old and distressed Freethinkers, and advancing loans without interest to those who may be in temporary difficulties. Each branch makes an annual collection in aid of this fund. There is also a "Propagandist Fund" for sending lecturers to towns and villages where no branch is organized, and for carrying on open-air lectures and discussions in certain localities. This work has resulted in much practical good.

It appears to be a growing practice, and one attended with satisfactory results, to relieve the dryness of the ordinary proceedings by some entertainment at the meetings. Musical and dramatic sketches and occasional balls are given by some branches for this purpose. This is found especially valuable in attracting ladies to the meetings. The co-operation of woman is held to be of the utmost importance, as it rests with the female sex chiefly to protect the next generation from the corrupting influence of theology.

As almost every important town in England has its branch, any matter of interest relating to Freethought which may appear in the local press, or any sermon or lecture which may be delivered bearing upon the subject, is almost sure to be noted and reported to the society. By this this means misstatements are corrected and movements prejudicial to liberty are checked in the bud.

It is scarcely necessary to add in conclusion that the National Secular Society is largely indebted for its usefulness to the activity and energy of its constantly re-elected president, Mr. Charles Bradlaugh.

The Cat, the Meal, and the Silly Mice.

The Prohibition party, inheriting the medieval notion that political government is omnipotent to do everything in the way of reform, both in religion and morals, hav erected the platform of their principles and policy, and hav placed upon it their candidates for president and vice-president of the United States.

Allow me to point out to the readers of The Truth Seeker the revolutionary and anti-American character of such principles by placing them in contrast with those fundamental ones on which this republic rests. The Declaration of Independence of 1776 is a part of our constitutional law. It contains the foundation principles for the carrying out of which the Constitution and government of the United States are mere agents. They are axiomatical in their character, and a test by which it may be known whether a man is a patriot or a traitor to his country. That the reader may see the utter and eternal antagonism between these two sets of principles, I place them in parallel columns:

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.	PROHIBITION PLATFORM.
"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructiv of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to affect their safety and happiness."	"The Prohibition party in national convention assembled, acknowlege Almighty God as the rightful sovereign of all men, from whom the just powers of government are derived, to whose laws human enactments should conform, and that peace, prosperity, and happiness only can come to the people when their laws of the national and state governments are in accord with the divine will."

In the left column the Declaration asserts that government derives its just powers, not from the Jewish, Christian, Mohammedan, or any other God, but solely from the consent of the people who are governed; and that the function of government is, not to please any God, or promote his glory, but to secure to all men the enjoyment of their natural right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The Prohibitionists positivly deny these principles, and in the very first sentence of their platform hasten to affirm the old European doctrin whose history is written in blood and tears, that governments derive their lawful powers from God, and not from the people!

Well, in the process of legislating the reader inquires, How is a government to ascertain whether God approves, or disapproves, of a certain bill brought before the legislature for its sanction? Why, bless your dear simple heart, God has revealed his will, finally and conclusivly, on all subjects, in his word called the Bible, and the clergy are the sworn and authorized interpreters and expounders of that word. And in this country, the state legislatures, exercising their powers in their grooves, and Congress, exercising its powers in its grooves, are to wait upon the clergy, who are God's embassadors and mouthpieces, and thus find out the will of God. This is the way the pope of Rome, with his cardinals, bishops, and priests, dictated legislation to Europe for a thousand years.

This is the way the Presbyterians of Scotland, during the reign of the Solemn League and Covenant, ruled the people of that country with a rod of iron. And this is the way the Prohibition party would rule us if it were in power. The Prohibition platform is the meal; the cat under the meal, her claws sheathed in velvet, is the God-in-the-Constitution principle; and the poor silly mice are those Freethinkers, East and West, whose ambition seems to be to become a breakfast for the cat when she throws off her disguise! I had supposed that our Western Radicals by this time would hav cut their wisdom teeth, but it is plain, from their having enlisted under the banner of "God in the Constitution," that they hav not even cut their eye teeth.

If we indulge for a moment in the fanciful supposition that the Prohibition party were in power, the only hope of the people, who would then discover themselvs to be the mice, would be that the clergy of all the sects, like a troop of vultures over a fallen sheep, would quarrel and fight among themselvs for mastery, and make such a hell of it as to frighten the mice into their holes, from which they could see the performance of the Kilkenny cats repeated, to the joy of the world.

Oh, when will men learn that government by legislation has nothing to do with men's opinions on any subject; nor with their private morals; that while crimes are punishable by law, vices are amenable only to ethical and physiological considerations? B.

Pray or Fight—Which?

Blank petitions hav been sent out for signature, asking for state secularization. I hav no objection to those signing that wish, but for myself, I hav long since stopped praying to a God, and hav made up my mind to pray to man no more.

Years ago I prayed for woman suffrage and things of like nature without a favorable answer. A few years since I prayed to a pious fraud for the pardon—no, not the pardon, for he had committed no crime, but the release—of Brother Bennett from prison, with what success is well known; and I hav made up my mind in the future to fight for my rights, making the best show I can in the cause. I am of the opinion that if Liberals and all professing to be reformers would pool their issues and pull together at the ballot-box, something might be done towards forcing upon the minds of those whom we elect to act for us in ruling and governing this American republic the fact that we hav rights and dare those rights maintain. But as long as we continue to vote in the old party ruts and for the old party hacks, we may pray until the stars fall without success. How many of the signers of the petition for the release of Brother Bennett voted four years ago? How many of them will vote this fall to continue in office the same persons whose acts helped to make that petition a necessity and the incarceration of Brother Bennett in a criminal's cell a possibility? How many of those who hav signed or will sign a petition for state secularization will this fall step up to the ballot-box and cast a vote for the one who, in his letter of acceptance, says, "This is a good land the Lord our God hath given us"—when we all hav heard that it cost seven years of hardship, privation, suffering, and very many lives to get old England to giv up her claim to this land, and many of us know full well that it cost us four years of strife, thousands of lives, and millions of money to preserve it integral? Surely the Lord our God is good to us to make it cost us this much. Together the Christian and the Liberal will go the polls and deposit the same ballot; the former aggressiv and confident of success, the latter praying and hoping for a crumb of comfort to fall to his share. Arm-in-arm the God-in-the-Constitution man and the petitioner for state secularization will step up to the box and deposit their vote for the party whose representativs came so near making it impossible for a Liberal to liv and maintain his self-respect under the stars and stripes of this so-called asylum for the oppressed of all nations, religions, and opinions. Side by side, the Prohibitionist, the Anti-Prohibitionist, the rum-seller, and the drunkard will deposit the same ballots, and for those whose acts officially hav made Prohibition a necessity, and at the same time an impossibility. Now, is there no one to lead us or to instruct us how to work out our salvation? Where are our Ingersolls, our Wakemans—why are they silent? Hav we no Moses to lead us out of this wilderness of religious bigotry, and church rule, this slough of political corruption, monopoly, and crime? Where are the voters of the two hundred and seventy Liberal Leagues? Are they so bound to party as to cast principles aside and still keep voting to forge the chains of slavery stronger and stronger, to bind them closer about us until strife and bloodshed alone can break them?

Now, I am a Spiritualist of more than thirty years in the faith. I expect to liv the balance of my days in this belief, and then pass on to a realization of its truth. But I am willing to lock arms with the strongest Materialist, and pledge myself to support no man for office who will not pledge himself to state secularization. Then let us unite upon one issue—dropping for the time all other issues if necessary—press that forward with united effort, and when that point is gained, pick up another and work for that with might and main, and we will soon make them feel our power. Then let us stop praying to others; stop calling each other hard names and fighting among ourselvs, put on our armor and fight our common enemy. Yours for state secularization,

William S. Logan.

The National Liberal League.

We hav vital and ennobling truths for the amelioration and salvation of mankind. Our only consistent course is a constant aggressiv activity in bringing the light of truth before the people. This can only be effected by thorough organization, and the consequent judicious distribution of Liberal and scientific literature.

Our main hope, our chief helper, our chief savior and redeemer, is the printing press. We hav talent in the Liberal ranks far greater in proportion than in any Christian denomination. We hav as much of the spirit of self-sacrifice, devotion to our cause, and love of our fellow-creatures.

What is needed is a systematized plan of work, which shall encourage and incite all to earnest effort.

How many good and true men and women might be rescued from the cruel bonds of bigotry, fear, and superstition, might become activ workers for truth and humanity, and in their turn bring liberty, joy, hope, and happiness to others, if the organization of the National Liberal League can be perfected, so that it shall fulfil its mission!

Much can be done without brilliant lecturers or grand meetings. These are at suitable times great helps, but not by any means first essentials. They may very safely be reserved for especial needs. Many most worthy Liberals reside in small villages or places where, even if the expense of lecturers could be met, the people are too prejudiced to attend, and little good could result.

Before the advent of the lecturer there needs a work of preparation, a thorough canvassing for the sale of Liberal books, securing subscribers for our best periodicals, and the careful, judicious distribution of tracts and papers.

In almost every school district there are those who develop into efficient laborers. What work could be more noble, more praiseworthy? How better promote the happiness of our fellow-creatures? Many persons who can never hope to excel as public speakers, who cannot even hold their own in an argument, could as distributors of Liberal literature become as useful, and do as important and effectiv work in upbuilding the League as some brilliant orators and debaters. Such persons, guided by the pure aud ennobling principles of Liberalism, living lives of benevolence, love, and integrity, wield a powerful influence. They could go from house to house in their neighborhood, talk to the people of the aims and objects of the League, its meetings, amusements, etc., and, once a little interest aroused, hand out tracts, and loan books or papers.

Very many could help themselvs financially as well as the cause by canvassing for such books as, "A Truth Seeker Around the World," Ingersoll's lectures, Huxley on "The Origin of Species." To those not sufficiently advanced to appreciate such works, or those who prefer to read novels and stories, McDonnell's "Exeter Hall," Putnam's "Golden Throne," would sell readily. And people thus once started in thinking for themselvs are readily induced to carefully read Paine's "Age of Reason," Ingersoll's "Orthodoxy," Remsburg's "False Claims," subscribe for Liberal papers, and become activ members of the League. In the language of the lamented D. M. Bennett, "Oh, for a revival of reason, truth, and common sense!"

PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS.

To this end, we respectfully suggest for careful consideration and amendment the following propositions:

That the officers of the National Liberal League use every endeavor to obtain the names and addresses of Liberals in every school district in the United States.

That they prepare, and the secretary mail to each address obtained, a circular stating the aims and objects of the League, and proposed plan of work, earnestly requesting co-operation.

That the officers of the National League at once convene the officers of all Leagues in each state (when there are less than five working Leagues in a state, two or more states might be united as joint state Leagues), elect officers, and organize separate state and joint state Leagues. Counsel with state League officers in the division of their states into districts. State League officers shall convene the members of all Leagues in their respectiv districts, elect officers, and organize district Leagues.

All Leagues shall hold regular weekly meetings (except during summer vacation), and make regular monthly reports to the secretary of the district League (blanks to be furnished for this purpose by the state League). Said reports shall state:

1. Total number of members in good standing.
2. Number of members present at each regular meeting.
3. Number, occasion, and particulars of any extra meetings.
4. Number of new members received during the month.
5. Total amount of membership fees and dues received during the month.
6. Number of new subscribers to periodicals obtained.
7. Number of books and pamphlets loaned.
8. Number of tracts and periodicals loaned.
9. Number of books and pamphlets sold.
10. Number of pages of tracts and number of papers given away.

Every member is supplied with blanks for statements of from 6 to 10, to be filled out each week, and handed to the secretary.

The secretary of the district League shall make quarterly reports of sum totals of all reports received from Leagues in his district to the secretary of the state League immediately after each quarterly meeting of the district League. The secretary of the state League shall make semi-annual report of sum totals of all district reports to secretary of the National Liberal League, blanks to be furnished by the latter. The secretary of the National League shall prepare semi-annual report of the sum totals of all reports received from the state and joint state Leagues, and publish the same in the leading Liberal papers. District League meetings shall be held quarterly at such time and place as shall be determined by vote at district League meeting. All members in good standing of Leagues within the district are members of that district League. District League officers shall meet with each League in their district at least once in each quarter. District League meetings shall be attended by one or more state League officers, or when that is not possible, by proxies appointed by them. The state League officers, by and with the advice and consent of the district League officers, shall appoint suitable lecturers for every such meeting. The annual meetings of each of the state Leagues shall, when possible, be so arranged that the president and secretary of the National Liberal League can be present. Preceding every such state League meeting, by and with the advice and consent of the state League's officers, the subjects to be presented by lecturers at such annual meeting shall be decided on, and the best available talent to present such subjects be engaged for such meeting.

By this system an immense amount of the very best Liberal literature will be placed in the hands of people, who will through personal solicitation be interested to thoughtfully read it. The progress being made, difficulty occurring, the exact condition of the work in every place in the United States, will be known to the National Liberal League officers. Just the help needed can be supplied at just the time most needed. The smallest League, the most lowly member, will be cared for, helped, cheered, and encouraged. All the best lecturers and able workers will be kept constantly in the field and be found employment just where their special talent and ability can be made most serviceable. The National Liberal League will take no backward steps—does not abandon its design; on the contrary, it enlarges its foundation, and builds it broader, deeper, more massiv, and endurable.

FINANCE.

We need tracts and leaflets on the aims and objects of the National Liberal League, especially on the Sabbath question and the exemption from taxation of church property and ministers—tracts that will appeal to the reason and giv facts in such a manner as not to shock or so inflame prejudice of Bible worshipers that they will not finish reading or giv thought to the subject. We need tracts especially adapted to new fields, that we can scatter in the strongholds of the enemy; tracts carefully written with especial view to incite people to discuss these questions and think for themselvs. We ought to place three million of such tracts in the hands of the people during the next year. This would pave the way to doubling the circulation of all our best Liberal periodicals. The gross injustice and evil results of our government granting especial power and privileges to churches, priests, and parsons must be laid before the people. To this end, a million copies of Paine's "Age of Reason," Ingersoll's "Orthodoxy," and Remsburg's "False Claims," should be in the hands of people who hav by the National League tracts had their interest in these subjects awakened. To accomplish this, every person over eighteen years of age on joining the League shall pay one dollar membership fee, and fifty cents monthly dues—dues to be paid monthly in advance.

The treasurer of each League shall retain one-half of all money so paid in, for the use and benefit of the League, and shall each month remit the balance or remaining half to the treasurer of the state League.

The treasurer of the state League shall retain one clear third of all moneys so received for the use of the state League, and forthwith remit the balance or remaining two-thirds to the treasurer of the National League.

The secretary of each League shall make report each and every month to the secretary of the National League, giving name and address of every person who has paid membership fee or monthly dues, with date of payments, and amounts paid, also the sum total received for fees and dues during the month, and the amount paid over to treasurer of state League.

Secretary of National League shall, on receipt of such report, forward to the secretary of such League publications, tracts, and pamphlets of the National League to the full value (at publishers' prices) of the total amount paid by such League to its state treasurer.

The National League can obtain needed tracts and publications, purchasing such large quantities at one-half discount on publishers' regular prices.

Thus all the needed blank reports, the expenses of all the state Leagues, and the salaries to the officers of the National League, can be paid without one cent of expense to the members of the League, for they would receive needed publications to the full value of every cent they pay to their state Leagues. For illustration, suppose—in this day of small things—the total membership of the League was only five thousand members. This would giv $2,500 monthly dues, $1,250 to be paid to state Leagues, who would retain one-third, or $416.66, and pay over balance, $833.34, to National League.

The National League would hav to send out $1,250 worth of publications—actual cost to National League, $625—leaving balance $208.34. This is for only one month.

The state Leagues would receive $4,999.92 for the year to meet their expenses, the National League $2,500 to pay their officers—and this is not counting the membership fees, which would pay stationery, postage, blanks, etc.

But far above all the best part of it is the immense amount of the very best Liberal literature that would thus be carefully and judiciously circulated, the constant intercourse and social relations maintained among all Liberals, and the steady progress made in securing universal mental liberty.

Mr. Wettstein Rebuked.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Wettstein's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 6th is, no doubt, intended as a burlesque representation of Spiritualistic views. It seems to me, however, to be a conglomeration of truth and error, inconsistencies and misrepresentations. When he says: "Spirits alone hav no elements, or parts—are composed of nothing," it is a palpable misrepresentation of the Spiritualistic view—unless he believes so himself, and givs it as his own view that there are spirits—"composed of nothing." But as he does not believe in spirits at all, it is evidently a gross misrepresentation, and a very convenient false premis from which to draw false conclusions when trying to ridicule Spiritualism.

In speaking of spirits, when he says, "it is beyond all human conception, and a thing and locality and condition purely miraculous and supernatural," it is a misrepresentation, for Spiritualists do not believe in the "miraculous and supernatural," and unless Mr. Wettstein does and intends to indorse miracles and supernaturalism, he either ignorantly or otherwise makes another false basis for false conclusions.

The question, however, of future, or continued life, is not to be settled by ridicule based on misrepresentation, false premises, and false conclusions, no matter how often repeated. Nor is the evidence that spirits liv, and make themselvs known to their friends, to be set aside by deductiv reasoning from imaginary theories. The evidence of their life, force, and intelligence is overwhelming. They hav been identified by thousands as their loved ones, neighbors, and friends who had gone before, and are known just as one person knows another, and unmistakably identified in various ways to the entire satisfaction of those with whom they had been acquainted, just in the ordinary way of proving identity.

Yes, we hav the testimony of thousands and tens of thousands, that the spirits liv; and no matter whether Mr. Wettstein knows where, or how, or not. And if he doesn't know about their clothes, and how they manage "a second, and a third, and a fourth wife," it is not strange, for there are a great many things that he doesn't know; though it is, no doubt, kind in him to feel some concern about the matter. Then his concern about the spirits coming "within range of a planet while sweeping through its orbit" is evidence of a kind heart. He thinks they might be "instantaneously annihilated," and no wonder he feels concerned. Then he is troubled about horses and dogs, "snakes and oysters." Then again he is afraid of being "forever denied sleep, the downy bed, three meals a day, the embrace of an affectionate wife, the kiss and prattle of our little ones, luxuries like wines, fruits, desserts, candies, or cigars," and then exclaims, "Let me sleep, forever sleep."

Let not your heart be troubled, Brother Wettstein, for there is no danger. You say, however, that "some place the spirits here, there, and everywhere; some on one planet, some on others;" and although that may look singular, yet they may be mistaken, and such not the case at all. Why, even you and I might be mistaken, strange as it may seem to you—but we might, especially when we write about the spirit world, the employments of spirits, "the hair of the head" over there, which you say "is prolific" and "remarkable," and "will grow and grow a few years, and then, behold the miracle—it will grow no more, forever no more." But may you not be mistaken, brother? "And the nails on their toes and fingers are subject to the same law of growth for a very few years, and then will remain in statu quo forever." Again I say, may you not be mistaken? Even if you learned these things from spirit communications, they—the spirits—may be mistaken, and no such calamities overtake the celestial inhabitants. And I hav sometimes thought that they were not always as truthful as they might be, especially when communicating to those who were disposed to find fault. There is no danger, Brother Wettstein; the laws of nature are always the same, and nature will take care of the future, and there is no necessity for you to go into an eternal sleep to avoid calamities incident to the hair and toe-nails in future life.

Red-Hot Politics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I must pronounce it strange that you, in giving your views on the various political factions now agitating this country, after passing over some six or seven different parties, each of which, like the devotees of every Christian church, thinks its own platform and purpose the only one worthy the vote of the community, acknowledge your sympathy with that heterogeneous mass headed by Butler & Co., not one of whom ever uttered a word of rebuke upon the damnable murders of the midnight assassins of the South, or a word of censure upon hundreds of others of the evils afflicting our country. No; Ben Butler is so wrapped up in his Democracy-Greenback-Anti-Monopoly fusions that he never utters a word against the most gigantic land-monopoly and tyranny on this earth in the solid Democratic South. Look at that noble resolution of J. G. Blaine's, December, 1875, worthy of the thanks of every Liberal Freethinker in our land. Will you please print the inclosed article on St. John—one I contributed to a Michigan paper? Please, if you can, giv the name of one Northern Democrat who ever gave a dime to assist those 20,000 of refugees from the South. I repeat that if we elect Cleveland or Butler we will hav a solid Democratic South, with a solid Democratic North, and you and I and every friend of freedom and liberty will soon become the vassals of the dictators of the solid South. For sixty-three years hav I watched the solid South. She is to-day as disloyal as she was in 1860, only let her hav the power. H. WILLIS.

THE SOUTHERN EXODUS.

In the winter of 1879, the Democrats of Mississippi and the Southern states commenced one of the most murderous and cruel raids on the colored people ever known in the annals of history. Thousands were driven from their homes, and their scanty effects were stolen by the Democratic Ku Klux and midnight wanderers. A few of the poor blacks made their way to Kansas and found that in that Republican state they would be protected in their rights and assisted in securing work and homes. Soon those few pioneers conveyed to their persecuted friends the glad tidings that Kansas would receive all that might come, and in a few weeks a stampede was made in vast numbers to the bank of the Mississippi River, to take the steamers passing up the river. So great was the exit that in a few months the planters became alarmed about the labor required for their crops. Still the poor creatures continued to go. Then those Bourbon Ku Klux resorted to the pursuit of the fleeing fugitivs, robbing them of everything, even to taking from the little children their bread and casting it to their dogs or into the river. Yes, they went so far as to threaten every steamboat captain with death if he took on those poor negroes. Republican captains were not to be intimidated, and took on thousands, while Democratic captains would pay no heed to the appeals of the poor starving men, women, and children.

Thousands were robbed of everything by these damnable Ku Klux murdering classes, and had to hide in swamps and bushes and caves to wait for boats. Such was the Democratic rule in the solid South. Such is it to-day. At that time St. John was governor of Kansas, elected by the Republicans. He was then a noble man. He took hold with all his might and soul to help those thousands of poor, starving creatures, fleeing from a tyranny more damnable than history givs any account of. Gov. St. John appealed to every charitable man and woman in the Northern states to assist Kansas to send clothing and means to support those starving people, driven from their homes by the most savage horde of murderers that ever trod this earth. Gov. St. John's appeal was nobly responded to. By whom? Not by one Democrat in a thousand; but by Republicans. I was often, when asking for old clothes from Democrats for the blacks in Kansas, answered, "No, let the d——d 'niggers' take care of themselvs." In no instance do I remember of getting a rag from a Democrat—not even from Democrats who were loud in their appeals for money, clothing, flour, and seeds for their white brethren in Kansas in their misfortunes.

Now, in the face of all those facts, ex-Gov. St. John, like G. W. Julian, Thomas W. Higginson, and hundreds of other Independent Republicans, hav turned traitors to the principles of human rights once so nobly advocated by them, and are doing everything in their power to giv supremacy to the party which they hav so long denounced. I am grieved to see Gov. St. John take the course he does in denouncing the Republican party in unmeasured terms for not doing what the Democrats never hav done nor never will do. Look at the government officers who hav been murdered by Democratic illicit distillers in the South, while discharging their duty as such officers. Why St. John should denounce the only party that gave him honor and prominence is to me strange indeed. His noble and humane cause when governor of Kansas sank deep into the hearts of every true Republican, while he was denounced and slandered in unmeasured terms by the Democratic party, and a reward was offered in Mississippi for his head, dead or alive, and a declaration was made that if his head could be obtained, it would be stuck on a pole to let the "niggers see the d——d rascal" that was enticing them to run to Kansas. Such is the class of men he is now praying to lord it over him, as he has prostrated his manhood and crawled in the slime of Southern Democracy. I am a Prohibitionist, and know that St. John's cause is suicidal to the cause of temperance. H. WILLIS.

What Caused the Earthquake.

Professor George H. Merriman, of Rutgers College, New Brunswick, has made the crust of the earth a study, and has written on the subject. He said to a Sun reporter:

"While facts enough regarding the extent of the earthquake of Sunday hav not come to hand to enable me to speak on the direction of the earth wave or its peculiar features as compared with other earthquakes, yet something may be said as to the latest convictions of students of science on the nature of the earth below the point any man can penetrate. That may lead us to guess intelligently at the cause of earthquakes.

"You know the long received theory of the nature of the interior of the earth was that it is a molten mass, and that we move around on a crust enveloping the earth, and caused by the cooling off of this mass on the outside. It is undoubtedly true that about thirty miles below the earth's surface the temperature is so high that everything is in a melted condition. We know this, because we hav learned that every fifty feet we penetrate into the earth there is an increase of temperature of about 1°, and at a distance of thirty miles the heat is so great that any substance we know of would melt. Perhaps the melted mass is in the form of a liquid. That would be certain but for the immense pressure on it. The pressure is estimated at 10,000 tons on a square foot. Of course scientific men cannot experiment with matter at a high temperature with a pressure of 10,000 tons to a square foot, so we can only guess what may be its condition. In talking about this melted mass thirty miles under us the term 'water-substance' is used by geologists.

"How great is the distance through this water-substance we do not know, but it is certain that its density increases more and more, gradually, until the interior of the earth is solid, probably, from the inconceivable pressure, 1,000, 2,000, or 3,000 miles from the surface. Sir William Thompson has demonstrated that the earth must hav a core much denser than the land and water we liv on. He points out the fact that if a shell only thirty miles thick surrounded a molten liquid mass extending from one side of the earth through the center to the other side, then the moon, through the law of gravitation, would displace the liquid or gas in the interior of the earth to such an extent that the earth's crust would bulge out in the direction of the moon, making a tide in the solid crust of the earth, as certainly as the skin of an orange bulges out when you squeeze the fruit between the palms of your hands. And this would be evident to us because the ocean tides would be almost, if not quite, imperceptible to us. To withstand the attraction of the moon, the earth, Sir William says, must be as rigid as steel.

"So we hav the theory that the crust of the earth floats on and imposes an immense weight on a water-substance, which is inconceivably hot. Now, as to the way an earthquake may be caused. Suppose moisture trickled gradually, year after year, through this crust into the heated mass. In our atmosphere steam would be produced. Thirty miles below us the pressure is so great that it is not likely that steam could be generated. One thing, though; the pressure of 10,000 tons to the square foot, a pressure exerted in every direction, would be increased. Some effect must be produced down there, and it is easy to see that if one place in the earth's crust is weaker than another near the region where the water trickled in, then 'the weakest place must stan' the strain.' It is not unreasonable to suppose that this pressure below might be so great that the earth's covering was shifted a little to adapt itself to the pressure from below. This shifting of the crust is, in fact, the earthquake.

"I believe this theory has the greater reason on its side, because earthquakes are almost always in the region of volcanoes, and volcanoes are almost always in or near the ocean.

"Another theory of earthquakes is that as the earth is very gradually cooling off the crust is thickening on the under side, and cracks or fissures on the under side of the crust many miles deep may occur in consequence of the enormous pressure, so that the water-substance rushes into a new position with a force that would knock a continent out of shape if it took place on the earth's surface. That motion would be sufficient to produce a vibration thirty miles distant.

"Whatever the cause of the earthquake on Sunday," added Professor Merriman, "I think the earth in the region where it took place has either settled into a new position or is forced back into an old position from which it was pushed by former earthquakes."

Stray Scraps.

Mr. Blaine almost confessed to conversion to co-education of the sexes at the commencement exercises, Colby University, Waterville, Maine, July 2d. He thought the 450 bright girls of Vassar should hav a due admixture of bright young men from Colby for mutual stimulation. Let me inform Mr. Blaine that a majority of the undergraduates are marked thoroughly by the bitterest hostility to co-education. Be that as it may, hurrah for any progress inside of the Republican party, especially manifested by its presidential candidate.

The Rev. Wm. Taylor (colored), chosen bishop of Africa at the late M. E. General Conference, Philadelphia, gave a very remarkable discourse on prayer in the People's Church, Boston, July 6th. The rich, ripe enthusiasm gave us a "Jasper" every time. Conspicuous among the new bishop's scholarly utterances were: "For the fulfilment of such petitions (according to God's will) we do not hav to wait the hundredth part of a minute." How encouraging! The telephone is nowhere compared to it. After all our praying, God's will is triumphant. He will not grant our request unless he has a mind to, and then it comes in the hundredth part of a minute.

At the chapel dedicatory services at Asbury Grove, Hamilton Camp Grounds, July 2d, the new bishop, Mallahan, said in his address "For a genuin, earnest meeting there was nobody who could equal the old-fashioned red-hot Methodists." True, very true. No one can dispute that for Christian fanaticism the Methodists bear off the palm. So brag away, sir, we will not put up Pocassett Freeman nor Guiteau to match you, for they were heroes in their fanaticism, not cowards. The Bible, he said, was to be taken for what it was. Its sentences and its truths were unchanged, and it stood to-day exactly as it was two thousand years ago. What a falsity! "The revision of the New Testament had done little to improve it." Improve it! Can finite man improve on God? Either giv up its infallibility or man's tinkering with God's word. If the Bible has not changed in two thousand years its ministers and interpretations hav since my meager remembrance, sixty years ago. Brother and sister Freethinkers, only think of a sane man saying in this day of intelligence and science: "If we are not to believe the story of Noah and of Jonah, then it is not worth while to hold another camp-meeting. God once took a whole man up into heaven when he translated Elisha, to illustrate immortality and to show men what could be done for them were it not for their wickedness." Could credulity and ignorance go further? Need more be said?

It seems to me that Dr. Foote, Jr., in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 2d has failed to make a parallel between vivisection and "wanton butchery of deer in Canada," "wanton shooting of pigeons," the buffalo chase in Montana, and cruelties practiced upon insane and idiotic women in insane asylums and county poorhouses throughout the state of Indiana. Why object to Elliott Preston and other humanitarians working against vivisection, because deer are wantonly butchered, pigeons wantonly shot, buffaloes chased and killed for sport, and demented women inhumanly treated? Why not let each one, or each class, work in his, or their, own chosen field to root out all cruelty, and not each one fight the others and their movements for the amelioration of mankind and the brute creation. ELLA E. GIBSON.

How Shall We Vote?

How ought Liberals to vote? "Liberta" says, "The choice of the Liberals is between, not Blaine and Cleveland, or the Republican party and the Democratic party, but between the Republican party, with its more Liberal principles, and Cleveland, the sturdy defender of the people against the aggressions of the Catholic church."

Now, does anyone believe that Blaine less than Cleveland will be "the sturdy defender of the people against the aggressions of the Catholic church?" I think not. Then the choice of Liberals is between, not Cleveland and Blaine, but between the Democratic party and the Republican party, "with its more Liberal principles."

Each of our great political parties has a load of superstition to carry. The Republican party is freighted with the Protestant church; the Democratic party with the Roman Catholic church. From which of these hav we the most fear?

I hav thus far adhered to the Republican party because that party is the enemy of Catholicism, the most powerful and most dangerous superstition of the age, and because it is the best friend of popular education, which alone can save us from that superstition. J. E. REMSBURG.

The Church in Politics.

The recent victory at the polls of the Clericals of Belgium is bearing the same bitter fruit that all clerical victories in government hav borne to the people.

The populace of Brussels is up in arms. On Sunday, the 10th inst., two immense counter demonstrations were held by the Liberals and Catholics. Had the processions not taken different routes it is thought that severe bloodshed could not hav been prevented. As it was, the few personal encounters that took place were the result of priestly arrogance. The leaders of the Liberals strenuously enjoined their followers to abstain from using force, and the injunction was generally obeyed.

The immediate cause of the present turmoil is the ministry's School bill, the school question having been the focus of disturbances in Belgium for several years past. Last June, among many causes which led to the overthrow of the Liberal ministry, the chief was the enforcement of the law compelling each commune in Belgium to maintain an undenominational school, whether the commune were an exclusivly Catholic commune, Protestant, or anti-clerical. With the fall of the Liberal ministry, a new bill was introduced by the present Catholic ministry, which establishes a sort of local option, but is so unfair as to merit the severest condemnation, and it receives the united opposition of all outside the Catholic church.

This fight between the Secularists and the Catholics is a foreshadowing of what is in store for this country when the church shall hav grown stronger. During the administration of the Liberals of Belgium the government said practically to the village authorities, that they must maintain public schools for educational and not religious purposes. The Catholics were not forced to send their children to these schools, but could, if they chose, support parochial institutions of their own. The objections to this on the part of the church party were the same as we hear from that body in this country—the double expense of taxation, once to the state, and once to the priests. They clamored for a division of the school fund, just as the Catholics in the United States will demand at first a pro rata share of the school funds, and next a monopoly of education, under the pretext that to the church, as the keeper of morals, rightfully belongs the care of the children. Mgr. Capel has already voiced the first of these demands in this country; and but the other day he was the guest of a Teachers' Association of a Western state.

The cry of the church in all countries is that secular schools are godless. Astute priests ring the changes upon this charge until their followers are wrought up to a pitch of frenzy against heretics, and placed in an attitude of revolt toward the government. This it is that makes Catholicism such a dangerous element in a republic guaranteeing and maintaining religious freedom for the people. Three years ago this summer the pastor of a Catholic church on the Pacific coast gave notice to his parishioners that he would deny "absolution" to all the children of his parish who attended one of these godless schools. A New England priest also issued a similar proclamation. Between these extremes of country in the past ten years scores of parallel cases hav occurred. The same pope rules the Catholic forces here and in Belgium, and as Mgr. Capel said in a lecture last winter, at the word of command, sharp as the click of a trigger, he can array his millions against our government, should the claim for a division of school money not be allowed.

There is, there can be, no doubt that Roman Catholicism is the deadly foe of free secular education not only in Belgium but everywhere. It is also the unforgiving enemy of republican institutions, and of the United States government. This is a political question that will come up for solution within a few years. It plays no unimportant part in the politics of New York this fall. The church is shrewd enough to glove its hand, but the Democratic nominee for president will lose many votes because of his vetoes of the two bills favoring Romish aggressions. One influential Catholic paper, if not more that we hav not seen, is advocating the election of Mr. Blaine, whose mother was a Catholic, and other Catholic journals heretofore found in the Democratic ranks are sitting on the fence, with the excuse that politics are not within their province. Strange they should not hav remarked the incongruity of mixing religion with worldly affairs till their party nominated a man who had prevented them from making a twenty thousand dollar steal!

And this issue is bound to intrude more and more into American affairs as the church grows in power and wealth. It will ere long demand serious consideration, and undoubtedly will hav to be met at the ballot-box. As was said by a western journal when the priest raised his voice against the public school, "It is a political question which involves very important results. If a church so powerful in its numbers and its influence as the Roman Catholic church has determined to set itself in hostil opposition to our system of free and non-sectarian schools, it is a declaration of war against the public institutions of the country. It is an aggressiv display of ecclesiasticism which strikes a blow at everything held dear by Americans. It raises the issue of ultramontanism, clericism, or vaticanism, as a distinct issue to be determined at the ballot-box. The first thing to be done in a civil war of this character is to ascertain who are the friends of the government, and who are the friends of the church—to call the roll, that all may respond whether they are soldiers of the Constitution or soldiers of the pope. It is well to remember that this is a government of majorities; that such questions are capable of peaceful solution; that if a majority of those clothed with the electiv privilege favor an ecclesiastical government, and the subjection of our country to priests; if they favor a union of church and state, in which the state shall be subordinate to the church, and the church take its direction from infallible Rome, they hav the right to so change our Constitution and our laws as to bring about this result. It is desirable to understand this issue, that we may meet it with the intelligent firmness that becomes American citizens who love their country, its government, and its institutions better than they love the church of Rome, its pope, or its dogmas. This is not a new question, nor is Oakland the only place in which it has arisen, nor is Father King the only priest who has asserted it. It is as old as the papal hierarchy. It is as universal as its empire. The Roman Catholic church can not liv in the sunlight of Freethought and free speech that comes from free schools. It is only a power of intellectual darkness. It can only flourish in ignorance. It is a thing of superstition and bigotry. It has in it no element of enlightened progress. The country that it dominates is arrested in its intellectual development. It stagnates. The people become slaves to the priests, and the state loses dignity, power, and rank among nations."

The League.

We are sorry to see on the part of some of our Western friends, and noticeably Mr. E. C. Walker in Lucifer, indications of peevishness and ill-feeling arising from the action of the officers of the League in calling the Congress at Cassadaga Lake. A few of Mr. Walker's utterances in the last issue of his paper may be quoted to show the state of mind at present afflicting him:

Ella E. Gibson, who is said to be cognizant of the identity of our sweet-tempered friend "Liberta," nominates H. L. Green for president of the National Liberal League. What has the poor old League done to you, Ella, to deserve this?

It is so easy to build up a state organization "broad as the expanded heavens" in a thickly inhabited state, while at the same time enrolling members and drawing revenue from every part of the Union, charging twenty-five cents for a certificate of membership and giving a twenty-five cent magazine as premium, sapping the strength of the existing national organization, whose officers, to say the least, seem insensible to the danger as they smile upon the lusty young rival. It is so easy to build up the "greatest Liberal organization" with the columns of all the great Liberal journals open for the instant insertion of notices, calls, etc., while other organizers hav to wait weeks for their notices to appear.

George Chainey says: "The bugaboo of Comstockism is so tattered and torn that it can no longer scare away even a blind bird." This is beautifully non-committal, but as George Chainey followed Ingersoll out of the League in 1880 because of this "bugaboo," and as he has since groped his way back, I think that I hav a clue to his meaning.

I herewith start a penny subscription to buy a map of the United States for the use of New York Liberals that they may know there is a well-settled country west of the Ohio river.

Says W. F. Jamieson of H. L. Green: "While others hav been disputing with each other as to how they should organize, what 'planks' should be put in, and what left out, he has gone ahead and organized. [No matter about fundamental principles—they are only trifles.] . . . He has organized thousands of Liberals on a simple, national platform as broad as the expanded heavens and compact as the Catholic church."

But aside from these very practical facts, a crowd is not the first consideration in the mind of the real reformer. In the epigrammatic words of E. A. Stevens, "If League Congresses are held only to catch a crowd, a minstrel troupe could do that far more effectually."

Mr. Wakeman says that "the ablest speakers and organizers" will attend the Cassadaga Congress, and among these he has good reason to hope will be Col. Ingersoll. When did Col. Ingersoll become an "organizer?" If my memory is not at fault, the occasion when he made himself most activ in a Congress of the League was the very time Mr. Wakeman had to exert to the utmost his great powers of pleading and of argument to keep this famous "organizer" from disorganizing the whole institution.

Mr. Wakeman also informs us that Mr. Underwood "recommends new officers be chosen who hav not been parties to former differences in the League." I imagin that they will be well known Liberals! So well informed and having such positiv convictions on vital topics! Mr. Underwood is evidently enamored of our present method of choosing jurymen, and wishes to adopt the system in the League. The less a man knows the better chance he stands of being a juryman.

As a Liberal, I am compelled to admit the truth, no matter how much it may pain me, and I am pained to admit that the Liberal, T. B. Wakeman, shows very poorly beside the Christian, G. W. Curtis, as a political moralist.

This exhibition of spleen is childish, the flings at Messrs. Green and Wakeman being especially silly. Mr. Green did not originate the notion of holding the Congress at Cassadaga Lake, and should not be criticised on that account. He has no scheme to further; feeling the delicacy of his position, he does not want and will not accept office in the League. He is, of course, interested in the League, and, like the rest of us, wants to see something done besides talk, but he does not propose to bolt and form Northwestern and other associations if his ideas are not accepted by everybody. The New York State Association, of which he is the very efficient secretary, is not a rival of the League. But if it were, what of it? The more organizations we hav the more Liberals are made, and the more enthusiasm aroused. The State Association is an annual gathering of Freethinkers who embrace the opportunity to get acquainted and hav a good time, while also enjoying the speaking, and learning how the cause is progressing in all parts of the country. The Association is an auxilary League, but there its connection ends.

The retirement of Messrs. Wakeman and Leland from the presidency and secretaryship of the League is of their own proposing. Mr. Leland's health is so poor that he cannot attend to the duties of his office. Mr. Wakeman wants to resign the presidency because he thinks his personality has kept many out of the League who would otherwise hav joined and done efficient work. His motiv is honorable, and does him great credit. Besides, he cannot devote his whole time to the work, and it seems necessary that whoever take the offices now filled by him and Mr. Leland shall giv their undivided effort to the purposes of the organization. We hav supported George Chainey and Samuel P. Putnam for their successors because both gentlemen hav assured us that if the League should see fit to elect them, they would take off their coats, go to work, and see what could be done. Having others dependent upon them, they naturally must be authorized to retain from moneys collected by lecturing and other sources a sufficient amount to keep the pot boiling.

We see nothing in all this to arouse antagonisms, yet ill-feeling has cropped out in some quarters. In business circles the West is intensely jealous of the East, and we fear some of our friends hav not risen above this petty jealousy. Why it should be so has not been made clear. For ourselvs, we do not care whether secularization of the government is accomplished by men from the East or West, North or South. And all we ask of our next officers is that they shall be men of character, of reputation, and ability, and shall all go into the field. It won't do for our president or secretary to sit down in a back office and wait for something to turn up. That has been tried, and the turning up is not, at this writing, perceptible. An ornamental head—unless very ornamental, like Ingersoll—will prove of not much use. Between usefulness and beauty, usefulness has the call in this practical age.

We hope that the League will pay attention to this demand for working officers. C. B. Reynolds has, in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, some suggestions which will also be found of service. Let them be studied and utilized. And we hope, too, that in the discussion of the future course of the League, the disputants will preserve an equanimity of temper and sweetness of disposition that shall be an example for church bodies to emulate. Acerbity is not a convincing trait to exhibit, and will not be likely to lead to that harmony and unity of action without which the League may as well hold no Congress, for all the work its meeting is likely to accomplish.

The Big and Heavy Discussion.

Mr. Spencer's article in this issue is long, but will amply repay careful perusal. As a formulator of scientific conclusions, and exhibitor of hard facts, Mr. Spencer has no living equal. But his philosophy is negativ, and in no way makes for that righteousness which is indispensable in the coming religion. Comte, on the other hand, whom Mr. Spencer dissects with cruel minuteness, put out a philosophy which makes too much for righteousness. Like the Christian theology, the Comtean doctrin ignores hard facts. A system of religion which deifies woman and leaves her out of practical affairs—puts her, as it were, in a velvet-trimmed glass case on the mantel, but forgets to giv her air and food, is surely open to criticism. A pure, sweet woman is the best specimen of humanity obtainable, but a worship of even her is fraught with trouble. But modified as Mr. Harrison modifies it, Positivism is probably to furnish the religious incentivs of the future. Worship is a bad word to use, but in the sense that worship is emulation, imitation, a striving to liv the good, it may be allowed in connection with the central idea of Positivism, which is humanity, as all we can know, and to the improvement of which all the efforts of "religion" should be directed.

While Spencer may be taken as the exponent of Individualism, the teacher of the let-alone-and-trust-to-evolution doctrin, Comte may stand as the representativ of Authority. One philosophy places the individual above society, makes him the unit; while the other regards society, in its corporate capacity, as the rightful controler of individual actions. Upon the first is based the claims of the Anarchists; upon the other rests Socialism. These two sectarianisms are the practical outcomes of the two philosophies. Both, it seems to us, hav their strong points, and both hav their weaknesses. The true integral philosophy must reconcile all differences. Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews claims that he has discovered this all-sided system, and next week he will occupy about as much room as Mr. Spencer has in showing how both Mr. Harrison and M. Comte and Mr. Spencer are all right, and wherein they are all wrong. His paper deals more particularly with the speculativ, or metaphysical, aspect of the debate, but he asserts that Universology is just as applicable to the practical affairs of this world—and the next—as it is to the settlement of abstract questions, such as the existence, behind and beyond phenomena, of Spencer's "Infinit and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed," or of the Positivistic "All Nothingness," or dead blank wall of unknowableness. Mr. Andrews clearly sets aside Mr. Spencer's Unknowable, but he as plainly differs from Mr. Harrison in his estimate of the force behind, or cause of phenomena. This he must necessarily do in his role of the Great Reconciler and possessor of the Universal Science. Whether he has made everything plain, or not, can be seen by our readers next week. We ask for his paper a careful study, because Universology is either a great discovery, or a great—mistake.

Hamlet or Hercules.

Will American Liberalism be the Hamlet or Hercules of the nineteenth century? Will it waste its force in pure intellectual questioning, doubt, and hesitation; and unpack itself in words, words, words? Or will it, seeing the evils of the time, discovering the only right remedy, take hold with manly action and destroy some of the monsters that bar human progress? No one will deny the necessity of thought, and the admirable acumen of the intellectual Dane is needed in the discussion of the vast problems of human destiny that present themselvs for discussion; but thought should not be "sicklied o'er"

> "And enterprises of great pith and moment
> With this regard their currents turn away
> And lose the name of action."

We must not be so ideal that we cannot meet the practical wants of to-day. We must not be so subtle in our analysis that we cannot put together into some living body the truths that we hav so painfully gathered. Hamlet was, indeed, a radical. He went to the roots of things. He would not believe even the ghost of his father. He would hav grounds more relevant than this. He would sift and analyze, question and doubt, until he had got the very foundation and essence of the whole matter. He was a noble Freethinker, indeed, but after all a poor reformer. He was never ready for action. Some intricate thought or other was ever luring him from the plain duty of the hour. When forced to some great issue he was truly heroic, and no man could act with more splendid energy, but he was only by fits and starts a Hercules; and finally the greatness of his life ended in a tragedy.

Is there not much of this Hamlet-like introspection, analysis, doubt, limitation, and almost despair in Liberalism to-day? Does it not lack faith in present opportunities? Is it not haunted by an ideal that somehow seems to separate it from the world of action? Does it not dwell too much in the future? Does it not trust too much to the mere drift of circumstance, and the vague outcome of evolution? Do not many of those who hav won the hights of thought isolate themselvs from social reform because they too deeply see that they must ever work in imperfect conditions? There is an immense amount of thought thus wasted in abstraction. Because one cannot use his whole thought, he will use none of it, and like Hamlet, be unpregnant of his cause.

Now, I would not by any means say that there should be less thought, less analysis, less speculation, less philosophy, less idealism. There should be the utmost insight, the keenest perception, the highest ideal, the noblest understanding of one's self, and the universe, but this power of the intellect must be brought from the abstract into the concrete. Thought must not lead simply to doubt. Doubt is the beginning of philosophy, but the end of philosophy is action. The great Hamlet must be transformed into the great Hercules. The superb thinker must be a superb worker. Thought must flow to life, for to liv with every faculty aflame is the supreme manliness. Hamlet was but half a man. Hence the awful tragedy of his career. The sovereign graces of intellect and heart which he possessed did not save him. They only made more tremendous the failure of his practical life. Hamlet never ceased to doubt. He was continually dividing, dissecting, seeking some new point of view. His philosophy was ever dynamic, always on the move. It was never static; that is, it never seemed to arrive at any basic point of action. It afforded no chance for a grand conviction or faith around which the struggling soul might gather its faculties and plunge into successful achievement.

This was the sublime characteristic of Hercules. He knew what he wanted to do, and he did it with all his might. He saw evils that must be overthrown. He did not bother himself about their origin—his determination was to put an end to them by the most vigorous straight-from-the-shoulder blows that he could giv. Hercules had plenty of thought, no doubt. He was divinely gifted, and was intellectually the peer of Hamlet; but every whit of thought the hero had went into burning action. He was synthetic, concrete. Thought was not to him an "airy nothing." It had "a local habitation and a name." It was a living power. Hercules devoted himself to this world. He recognized that he was in it and of it; that he must work out his destiny in conjunction with the circumstances by which he was surrounded—that he must conquer his circumstances—and that if he could not make them best he should make them at least better. Hamlet was subjectiv, Hercules was objectiv. Hamlet looked within; Hercules without. Hamlet waited for a favorable opportunity and trusted to the inspiration of the moment. Hercules made his opportunity, and compelled the ministry of high impulse. Hamlet reached no thorough conviction; he was constantly a dreamer, and seemed to play with fate. Hercules was tremendously in earnest, because he was swayed by a deep-rooted faith in the reality of the world and of himself. He did not believe in ghosts or shadows. He had no metaphysics and no theology. He had flesh and blood, a strong arm, a generous soul; and so he went to work.

Let Liberalism hav all the keenness, subtlety, spirituality, yea, dreaminess, of Hamlet. Let it think deep and high, and scour all the realms to which the imagination of man can be admitted. Let it dwell within, and pierce the secret of the universe in the study of its own beating heart, but let it beware of Hamlet's outward weakness, the pale shadows of his inward musings.

Let Liberalism be as grand in action as it is subtle in thought. Let there be no contrast between it and Hercules such as the melancholy Dane acknowledged of himself. Let it be the best worker of the day; the wisest, the most practical, the most vigorous, the most destructiv of matter-of-fact evil, the most constructiv of human earthly goodness here and now.

The greatest tragedy of life is the apparent conflict between the best thought and the noblest action. How many seem obliged to sacrifice their highest intellectual perception for the sake of work! The sad trouble to-day is that the thinker is not a worker, and the worker is not a thinker. The tree of knowledge seems not to be the tree of life. Analysis destroys synthesis, and synthesis, to be at all available, it appears, must be built upon what is, and not upon what ought to be. The ideal and the real find no common ground. To be thoughtful is to withdraw from the activities of life. To be activ—to be in harmony with social forces—is too often to surrender one's best conviction of what is true.

It is the mission of Liberalism to solve in part, if not wholly, this mighty problem—to join Hamlet with Hercules, to blend the thinker with the worker, to make the world conform to that inward vision of glory which haunts the universal soul of humanity. Liberalism is to maintain the purity of our ideal, and still transmute it into the practical; to insist upon thought, and yet to make thought evermore a fountain of life. Highest thought and highest life—that is the dream of philosophy and the hope of science. Is it an impossibility? I think not. The keenest, deepest thought can still be harmonious with the most fruitful activities; but not on the old basis of Christianity, or even of our present civilization. There must be a readjustment of the essential elements of human progress; the future must be something more than a repetition of the past. It must be an upbuilding anew of humanity, with finer perception and more exalted attainments. Let Liberalism never desert the standard of its high thought, but let it also hav faith in man, and believe that what is best in thought can through the toils of a Hercules be made victorious in all the stream of human effort.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The League Congress.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Allow me to make a point for the consideration of the coming League Congress. I think this Congress should make an effort to organize all the working Liberals of the country in one grand association. I think a direct membership is what the National League needs. The number of working Liberals is very limited—that is, those who are ready and willing to furnish the sinews of war. For this reason alone, if no other, the auxiliary Leagues can only be organized and maintained in the larger cities and towns. I will take this place to illustrate. At least one-third, if not fully one-half, of the population are skeptics. I know of but four or five at this writing, in a population of five thousand, who can be depended upon as permanent supporters of a Liberal organization. If these small numbers, with a like proportion through the United States, could be organized in a national association, it would giv a membership, at the lowest figures, of 44,000. An annual fee of one dollar each would giv the snug little sum of $44,000.

Would it not be well for the coming League Congress to draw up an earnest appeal (inserting the Nine Demands) and send one or more copies to every known Liberal in the United States and Canada?

Organize! should be our watchword. However, in this organization we need those only who are willing to contribute a few dollars for the future welfare of the race. The work of the Liberal organizations for some time to come must be, in a large measure, of an educational character.

Mr. Editor, I am well pleased with your ticket for president and secretary—Messrs. Putnam and Chainey, or Chainey and Putnam. Mr. Wakeman, in Man of July 26th, says that they could both take the field and devote their whole time to the work; but if the Liberals are not going down into their pockets to supply the means to keep them in the field, better disband and fight it out through the Liberal press.

Letters from Friends.

JICARILLA MINING CAMP, July 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed petition for state secularization. I am ashamed to send so small a number of signatures, but when I tell you that all the men in camp signed but one you will excuse me. JAMES DRAKE.

CARROLL, IOWA, Aug. 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Undoubtedly there is not a single Freethinker who has not a strong desire to see, personally, our leading Freethought lecturers and writers. It is impossible for all of them to hav that pleasing gratification; I would therefore suggest, with a view of affording a partial satisfaction, that THE TRUTH SEEKER prints a picture each week of one of them. Do not omit yourselvs and Elmina. A. S. GOCKLEY, M. D.

TO CHAS. LAPERCHE.

NEWPORT, ME., Aug. 10, 1884.

Thanks for your instructiv criticism in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 9th on "Father Lambert" (I would call him by the name his parents gave him if I knew what it was, as I am opposed to all titles or handles to names). It is worth the price of the paper a year. I wrote Mr. Lambert for a copy of his book, but he did not send it—I supposed for the reason I did not call him "Father." His name is not half so respectable as that of a hod-carrier. SEWARD MITCHELL.

SPRINGFIELD, WIS., July 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: We would like to say something in honor and memory of the late great hero, D. M. Bennett. But what can we say that has not been said? I am very happily surprised at the success of the great paper that he founded, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Inclosed you will find $2.00—$1.50 for three new subscribers, 25 cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL, 25 cents for "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," and "False Claims." Some of my neighbors don't allow their intellect to believe the orthodox twaddle, but will allow their imagination to believe as much as Henry Ward Beecher. C. K. PHELPS.

CALISTOGA, CAL., Aug. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: We hav just read the burial service of Mrs. Macdonald, and think it much more appropriate and beautiful than the services we used to hear. We are glad to know there are people who can open their hearts of love and sympathy so grandly and so sweetly, and speak words of comfort and of sense. Such things make us feel akin to all mankind, and draw us toward the noble and the good. With feelings of kindness for the living, and hopes and farewells for the dead, we join with friends in their silent sympathy for the wounded spirit of our friend the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

BURTON, TEXAS, Aug. 8, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you petition with what names I had time to procure. There are very many who would be pleased to see it succeed, that hav no sympathy whatever for dogmas, any more than I, but for fear of being ostracised by their Christian customers and neighbors they are cautious as to expressing their real opinions. This is the case to a greater extent than one would imagin in this part of the country, and I judge other places are the same. Hence it is that the money, which is the real power, is on their side. But we hav abundance to encourage the good work forward, and these weak-kneed brethren will gradually come over, and our cause is sure to succeed in the end. We can leave our children no better legacy than a free government, with those demands firmly incorporated, and all superstitious and objectionable laws repealed. Fraternally yours, H. B. JONES.

ADRIAN, Aug. 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished a careful reading of the last great work by Col. J. R. Kelso, and my opinion of the book is that it is by far the ablest and most comprehensiv work of the kind that has as yet been given to the world. I am well aware that this is saying a great deal, but I hav read the writings of nearly all of the great Infidels of Europe and America, and in my opinion Col. Kelso's last work, "The Bible Analyzed," has many points that are superior to any and all of them. It is really, as its title indicates, an analysis of the unholy Bible. It is a book that should be in the hands of every minister of the gospel and every Bible-believer, of whatever denomination, and, of course, every Liberal that is able to get one. I can only say that I hope the colonel may reap a golden harvest for the mental toil and labor it has cost him to produce it.

P. B. REASONER.

HELENA, MON., July 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Dr. J. L. York, the intrepid champion of mental liberty, recently gave three lectures at this place on "Evolution," "Inspiration," and "Individuality." The doctor is a forcible and eloquent speaker, and handles his subjects with a masterly ability that carries convincing evidence to the candid listener. Col. R. G. Ingersoll, who is billed to speak here, will hav to look well to his laurels if he presents facts in a more concise and able manner than Dr. York.

We hav no rack or orthodox Bastile here, and hence are free to demonstrate the superiority of knowledge over blind faith and superstitious bigotry. Knowledge is poison to orthodoxy, which is fast passing away under the sledge-hammer blows of such men as York, Ingersoll, and the hosts of other earnest workers for mental liberty. A. C. VOTAW.

FENTONVILLE, MICH., August 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Seeing my time is nearly expired, and not being willing to miss a single paper, I will remit at once, believing it is right to do justice under all circumstances. You can count on me as a life-subscriber. I like your paper because it dare publish both sides of any question. Let us hear both sides, and then if we hav those scales called justice, judge and decide honestly. I once tried to be like the little bird in its nest—open my mouth and swallow everything that was told me, but my stomach rebelled, and so I commenced my investigation. I like to talk with good men, so I asked the best minister we hav got in our place—I say best because he is quite a good man, regardless of his theological views—what he knew of God. Finding that nothing but a direct answer would satisfy me, he said God was imaginary. I thanked him and told him I liked to hear the truth, even spoken by a minister. From an Infidel friend, S. H. ELLINWOOD.

CANTON, ILL., August 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The honest administration of the government should be preferable to all other issues. The Democrats say the Republican officials did steal. They admit the charge, and reply that the Democrat officials will steal too. If there is no difference in these charges, we should throw the two corrupt old parties overboard at once. No honest citizen wants to vote for a pack of thieves. But hold! it won't do to jump at conclusions. There is a vast difference between the above charges. In the one case you keep voting admitted thieves into office, while in the other you refuse to vote for a man with a clean record because the thief says he will steal. It might do for a Christian who believes in the vicarious atonement of making the innocent suffer for the guilty, but it won't do for a Liberal. JOHN W. ABBOTT.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Aug. 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I suppose a few words from the pen of the old and outspoken Materialist of the West will not be treated with scorn and indifference, so I here honestly and boldly assert that the leading article published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, by the pen of Otto Wettstein, of Illinois, is unanswerable. It strikes down all the air-castle phantoms of the imaginary and fanatical believers in another life after death. Life is but once, and begins and ends here, and all the preaching, writing, and sophistry to the contrary cannot change or overthrow this fact. It is just as much a part of nature to die as it is to be born. We knew nothing before birth, and we shall know nothing after death; and thus the truth will stand solid when all the thin and senseless phantoms of superstition are extinct. The time will come when all these vain delusions will be treated with ridicule and not seriousness. It is all born of ignorance, and still supported through ignorance. Get rid of the ignorance, and all the phantoms will banish.

Yours fraternally, THOS. WINTER, Materialist.

JORDAN, MINN., July 19, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5.00—$2.50 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $2.50 for a new subscriber. I sometimes wonder how I got along without THE TRUTH SEEKER so long. But you can now set me down for a life-subscriber, although it is not a great while since I became a permanent one at all. Yet I hav been well acquainted with its unrivaled merits as a Freethought journal for many years past. And I hav quite a library of Freethought literature purchased from the late lamented D. M. Bennett. I verily believe that I was born an Infidel. I am now over fifty years of age, and for the last twenty-five or thirty years I hav been an uncompromising, outspoken Freethinker, never hesitating to express my honest convictions whenever any orthodox Christian gave me the opportunity of so doing. I shall do all that lies in my power while I liv to shatter the accursed shackles of the accursed superstition.

I shall write you before long in regard to some other matters, and hope to send you some more subscribers. In the meantime I remain, Yours fraternally, THOMAS KNOTT.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3.00 for renewal. Not sorry you put the price back to $3.00, as it is well worth it. I don't see why religious people like papers that giv only one side of a subject. The only way I can learn is by reading or hearing the opposit sides, then drawing conclusions. The reason I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better than any paper I ever read is that it givs our opponents a chance to express their side; and the editor don't call them fools, knaves, and other beautiful names. But I do wish the Liberals would get a little more liberal. If they could get to that point where they could allow their brothers and sisters to differ with them in opinions, and not apply the lovely names to each other that the different Christian sects do, I think all would advance much faster. If a man has an honest conviction he likes to express it very strongly, and he has a right to do it. If his brother or sister has an honest conviction opposit to his own, and it should be expressed in as strong language, the first party should try to meet the second party with arguments, not abuse. J. F. MACOMBER.

EL MONTE, CAL., July 18, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I hav the picture of the monument framed and hanging by the side of Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll. This one is good, but I want the better one when it is issued. I being a druggist, and a Freethinker (like Bennett), it is natural I should like the old hero. For thirty years I hav been boycotted in business, ridiculed by the believers in superstition, and lectured by milk-and-water cowardly Liberals for openly avowing Infidel doctrins.

I hav a list of sixty unbelievers in this vicinity, still only three of all that number dare to bravely defy Mother Grundy, and oppose the pagan myths that hav for ages held mankind in ignorance and poverty. I am trying hard to get these wishy-washy Liberals to take the Liberal papers, and to organize Liberal Leagues, but nearly all claim they are too poor in pocket, or they fear the ghosts of the church.

I will soon write to my old friend, Dr. J. L. York, to lay out a field in this section, and see if he can't throw a ray of light into the foggy camps of the Baptists, Methodists, Campbellites, and all holiness bands, and also show the unbelievers wherein they are neither tweedledum nor tweedledee.

Yours for truth, J. E. CLARK.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 18, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a Christian tirade on Ingersoll's recent lecture in Minneapolis. The writer states that "the best intelligence of the nineteenth century has outgrown the superstitions of the past, and yet retains all the essential doctrins of Christianity!" Was ever statement made more absurd, foolish, and false? Again the writer says: "Ingersoll's few arguments are the stale and oft-repeated sophistries of the Atheists and Infidels of all time." You, Mr. Editor, will observe that this tirade produces no proof of the existence of a raging, roaring, unmerciful, revengeful, and infinitly cruel deity. Nor does this modern prodigy demonstrate that eternal misery is better than eternal sleep. This pious tirade is a disgrace to Minneapolis and to the common sense of mankind, without producing one single argument of proof. If eternal sleep is more desirable, more just, more merciful, more philosophical, and true than eternal punishment and misery, are not Atheism and Infidelity superior to cruel Christianity and eternal woe? Can any Christian blatherskite, blasphemer, and blackguard of the Minneapolis Evening Journal successfully, logically, philosophically, and truthfully prove Christianity better than Infidelity? We pause for a reply.

E. N. KINGSLEY.

BUTTE, MON., Aug. 4, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I believe your readers will be pleased to know how Freethought is progressing in the Rockies. Dr. J. L. York, the noble champion of mental liberty, has visited us, and eloquently arraigned revealed religion before the bar of reason and common sense. Large and intelligent audiences greeted his efforts, and joined hands with him in organizing a Liberal League. Seventy-five persons joined the first night (July 20th), and elected Ex-mayor Dr. O. B. Whitford president; J. C. Singer, vice-president; F. Cooke, secretary; executiv committee of nine, etc. On July 27th the doctor gave the last lecture of his course to at least five hundred persons—subject, "Romanism and Our Schools." It was an intellectual dynamite bomb in a London of ignorance. His many friends regret that engagements in Helena and Bozeman caused him to say farewell. While the effect of the worthy doctor's work was at a white heat, behold! the king of orators, R. G. Ingersoll, struck us. On August 1st, 2d, and 3d, the Opera House was jammed to hear "Orthodoxy," "What Shall We Do to be Saved?" and "The Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child." From the rear seat to those reserved on the stage, a more delighted, magnetized audience never gathered. All praised him.

The Liberal League has secured a hall and intends to work hard for Liberalism. Respectfully, FRED COOKE, Sec.

DOWLIN, TEX., July 21, E.M. 284.

MR. EDITOR: I am the same grandpa that requested you to tell your readers that I was born January 31, 1799, and that I wished everyone living in the United States who was born at that time would drop me a postal card telling who, what, and where. Well, I yet liv! My condition of dotage still increases. I fear I am becoming egotistic. I feel like bragging. I put myself in mind of that meek man Moses, who said, "Now, the man Moses was very meek, above all the men that were upon the face of the earth" (Num. xii, 3). I feel like telling you and your readers of some of my good deeds. I loved a book from my earliest recollection. I hav told but one criminal lie in my life. I hav not used profane language since I was about eight years old. I never would take what did not belong to me. I was exceeding industrious and careful, having a place for everything and everything in its place. I was very kind and obedient to a widow mother. It was said by a wise preacher that I was the most morally courageous person he ever saw. I was a fatherless boy at thirteen or fourteen years of age, and joined the Methodists at that time, with my mother. I prayed in my mother's house night and morning, even when an Infidel uncle was on a visit with us. I never was in a house of prostitution in my life—never a lecher. Never had a fight. Never was drunk, although I had a drunken father. Signed the pledge in 1833, and hav kept it sacred. Hav not swallowed a gill of spirits in fifty years. I dismissed my tobacco twenty-five or thirty years ago, after having used the filthy weed more than thirty years. I try all my acts and deeds by conscience. I aim to never crook a finger or wink an eye unless conscience approves. I hold that I am my own judge, and that I hav no other judge. What conscience condemns at the moment of action must not be done. Mental agony is the only hell. To regret a sin is a virtue, and will be rewarded. Thus we pay our debts.

J. A. RUTHERFORD.

BUTTE, MON., Aug. 6, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The far north-west territory of Montana, so little noticed in the columns of your Freethought paper, has been my home since 1864. I hav seen the territory without law or order, with road agents, thieves, and murderers on the trail of all honest men, who, uniting and fighting against odds, inch by inch, with the left wing of Price's army, ultimately established a government for the people—some of whom now read THE TRUTH SEEKER and liv.

Our resources are great. Especially profitable is farming in the large and productiv valleys of the rivers of Big Hole, Jefferson, Madison, Gallatin, Ruby, and Missouri, which contain more arable land than the states of New York, Ohio, and Indiana, and are conceded to produce more cereals and hardy vegetables to the acre than any other part of the globe. One hundred and ten bushels of wheat hav been harvested from one acre in the Bitter Root valley.

Inexhaustible bunch grass covers our mountains and foot hills, where thousands of cattle and sheep luxuriate in fatness summer and winter, producing better and jucier beef and mutton than can be grown in any part of the East.

Our mines of silver and copper are apparently inexhaustible. We ship more silver bullion and copper matte than any other point in the world.

We are prosperous and happy in spite of the church-enslaved condition of a majority of our people, which feebly begins to giv way to reform, truth, and freedom. Who says not, then, that a glorious future awaits Montana, with all her farming, grazing, and mineral advantages? Truth dawning, approaching nearer and nearer, soon will supplant churches, ignorance, and superstition with school-houses, education, and enlightenment.

When all this is accomplished, and the autumn of life begins to fade to golden hues, how sweet to refer back upon the flowery path of youth, and follow manhood to old age, diffusing knowledge and love from natural laws and nature's god, finding the paths on either side strewn with noble words and nobler deeds by him who loves his fellow-man as all true hearts love nature's beautiful plan!

The buds that bloom into flowers in spring time, permeating the air with their fragrance until blasted by the autumn winds, are the children of nature unfolding science to the appreciativ mind, and driving superstition from ignorant brains.

Nature's bountiful supply of truth through the agency of Freethought, Liberal men is beginning to be heard in defense of the right, in defense of the neglected poor, in defense of the reformed, and in defense of all that men hold dear and sacred in their social and domestic relations. A man of this class has recently visited all the important cities of our territory, in the person of Dr. J. L. York, giving in each place a series of instructiv and eloquent lectures, freeing the minds of many from orthodox tyranny, and establishing Liberal unions wherever possible.

On his heels comes the renowned Ingersoll, who, by the power of his eloquence, soothed the griefs of the sorrowing, dried the tears of the priest-ridden weeping, cheered the drooping spirits of the downcast, and implanted hope in the breast of the hopeless, thereby banishing from the minds of many the fear of an angry God, and the dread of a burning hell. Yours for truth and reform, O. B. WHITFORD, M.D.

SOLDIERS' HOME, WIS., July 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I regret to trouble you so often, but some sanctified rascal has got my last week's TRUTH SEEKER, Saturday, July 19th. I would hav informed you at the time, but I didn't know but it had stopped, as my subscription ran out May 12th. But having received the copy of July 26th, I am encouraged to mention the loss of July 19th. In my last letter, which you kindly published, I said in speaking of my prospects, the Mexican Pension bill has past the Senate, and will soon become a law. But alas! the ways of our Congress are like the ways of the Christian God, they are past finding out—at least until the poor devil who puts confidence in and serves them finds himself in a worse condition than before he rendered service. That was a house bill, and passed—Aye's, 226; No's, 27. It also passed the Senate with amendments, but failed to become a law, as Congress adjourned before the two houses concurred. It now stands as unfinished business on the calendar, the first to be acted upon next winter, and to be pushed from day to day without interruption until it is a law, or is rubbed out of existence.

Mr. Editor, I hav a thousands thanks to offer for the good fortune you hav thrown in my way by inserting my name in the great TRUTH SEEKER. By your kindness in so doing I hav had sent to me a Freethought Directory, from H. L. Green, Salamanca, N. Y., and a certificate of membership in the New York State Freethinkers' Association. In my Directory I read the names of friends and old acquaintances in all parts of the country. I hav also had sent to me from other parts much valuable reading matter—but nothing that reaches the heart like the old TRUTH SEEKER.

I hav been an Infidel since I hav been anything. None of your Agnostic or Know-nothing sort, but Infidel for all the term is worth. I find that a combination of circumstances shapes the lives and governs the actions of men. Nearly fifty years ago I read the Bible in school—not as it is sometimes read of late years, but as a school-book. I remember well myself and another poor boy having one Testament between us. We took turn-about in reading verses. No explanation, no comments, were made by Peter Davis, our teacher. I took great interest in the tales I read, and perused them at every opportunity. Being an orphan boy, no care was taken as to my religious training by Aaron Baldwin, Sen., whom I had for a master in those days, although he was most damnably orthodox, and as cruel as the God he worshiped. Fortunately I was not considered worthy his theologic care, and hence I escaped that most damnable of all delusions, the Christian doctrin.

I am working steadily in getting names to our petition for church secularization. Yours for truth, NELSON HUNT.

RICHFORD, VT., Aug. 1, 1884.

PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY.

How little of others we know!!
How little we know of ourself!
How little we know of the book,
The Bible that lies on the shelf!

How much we run after a priest—
Our Little, Chase, Puffer, and Smith!
How much about heaven we know,
Of hell, and the devil, and myth!

The Christians know all about God,
About ghosts and the angels unknown.
They zealously worship the priests—
Hav built them a pulpit and throne.

Goddess Fashion much we admire—
The pride, the pomp, and the show.
We trust in salvation by faith,
Because we so little do know.

For no Bibles do Catholics care;
At this all the Protestants sneer.
These both to their images bow,
And worship them year after year.

But a voice to our reason cries loud,
And bids us in knowledge increase,
"Oh, hadst thou in season but known
The things that belong to thy peace!"

From truth real harmony springs;
From falsehood come discord and pain—
The curse of the aged and youth;
To avoid it we labor in vain.

The Christians pretend to preach peace,
With murder strewn thick on their track—
With fire, and fagot, and wheel,
With thumb-screws, pincers, and rack.

How many hav died at the stake!
Their suff'rings no mortal can tell.
'Twas said, "Just believe as we do,
Or else we will send you to hell.

"We are sure we hav got the true faith;
Our difference you must not regard—
Though our sects are one thousand and one,
By faith we are sent by the Lord.

"By faith we've all got the power,
The keys of the hell and the heaven;
Unless you obey, our God saith
You all never can be forgiven."

To keep up this sham priests engage;
They preach, pray, sing, holla, and yell,
"Oh, stop you, dear sinner, immortal soul!
One step more and you'll be in hell.

"We are sure that our Jesus is Christ,
Our evidence proves that is true,
For he was begot by a ghost—
Our aunt and our granny said so.

"Three persons make up just one God;
The Ghost, Christ, and Yahweh were one—
The God, the Christ, and the Ghost,
The Holy Ghost, father, and son.

"By faith, simple faith, in the priests—
The easiest thing upon earth—
Our sins are forgiven, crimes blotted out
That we've done since we had our birth."

We bow to the infallible priests,
Though the greatest of cheats among men.
We'll hang to their coat-tails till death,
Then go up to heaven who can.

"If we are all traitors, steal, lie, and rob,
Quarrel and murder and fight,
God never will damn the people of God,
Because each believeth just right."

ADDENDA.

Every egg we buy is surely trod,
Everyone a wretched sinner-saint.
All are the people of a priest-forged God;
By hireling priests we're freed from taint.

To all my old friends, most sincerely,
JOSEPH NOYES.

DIAMOND, MO., Aug 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you another three months' subscription. After nearly half a year's reading of THE TRUTH SEEKER, its continuance seems to be an indispensable requisit. Like the serial stories in the literary papers, something further seems always necessary to clearly elucidate the subject under consideration.

I hav been distracted by more conflicting theories and opinions since I commenced reading your paper than in all my previous life. To escape the mental torture induced by so many antagonistic dogmas, I hav sometimes thought seriously of crawfishing back to papal infallibility. I am ready to indorse and espouse any theory our Liberal brethren may adopt, relativ to the creation, the origin of life, and the ultimate destiny of all things. Only make it a fixture. Don't keep one everlastingly on the rack of uncertainty. I hav been hustled about from pillar to post, like the tennis ball of fortune. I hav had more religions during the last six months than Proteus had shapes. I hav been like that fellow in English history who seemed to be "Not one, but all mankind's epitome;"

and he

"Who in the course of one revolving moon,
Was blacksmith, chemist, fiddler, and buffoon."

Rather than suffer such continual vacillation it would be better to adopt the "fanatic faith" so eloquently described by Thos. Moore in the following lines:

"The lover may
Distrust the vows that steal her heart away;
Alchemists may doubt
The shining gold their crucible givs out;
But faith, fanatic faith, once wedded fast
To some dear falsehood, hugs it to the last."

Even such a despicable foundation would be better than no foothold at all. However, it is perhaps "better to wear out than to rust out." I am still a stanch Liberal and recognize the fact the mission of THE TRUTH SEEKER is to giv expression to the views of all Liberals, no matter how diverse such views may be, and I often enjoy these discussions vastly, fatal as they may be to my stability.

I am very thankful to you for having thrown open your columns to the propagation of that grand Hindoo principle, "kindness to animals." We need a great deal of that special principle of heathenism engrafted upon our boasted Christianity—such heathenism as is shadowed forth in that beautiful poem, "Hero and his Dog," in which Yadishthira absolutely refuses to enter the celestial gates, even at the urgent entreaty of the god of the sky, unless the hound, his faithful companion through woe and weal, be permitted to accompany him. How does that compare, my Liberal friends, with the spirit of Christianity? I advise all Liberals to procure "The Light of Asia" and read it for themselvs. It will amply repay the trouble and expense.

During fourteen years of wandering life in the Southwest, I hav witnessed numberless scenes of the most revolting cruelty to animals, especially to horses and cattle. Why, only the other day a fellow in this Christian neighborhood yanked a fine, gentle mare over backwards and broke her leg. The orthodox devil himself would be ashamed of such atrocity. Children, boys, and young men are permitted by their sanctified parents to torture the domestic animals at pleasure. Dogs, cats, horses, and cattle, each in their turn, are the victims of their wanton cruelty. The idea of mentioning heathenism in the same day with such a damnable principle! And right here I beg leave to express my appreciation of the noble and persistent efforts of Mr. Elliott Preston toward the suppression of this savagory. In his eloquent appeals to Liberals, both in prose and verse, in behalf of the poor dumb creation, he has manifested a zeal and ability worthy the highest praise. He has also placed us under obligations by his contributions to Infidel literature. I hav read many of his Liberal poems which, while manifesting unmistakable tokens of genius, display a fealty to our cause in every line. His numerous productions display ample versatility, fertil imagination, and copious invention. They embrace in their ample scope the humorous, the pathetic, the weird, and the sublime. Mr. Preston seems to hav swept "through each mode of the lyre" with consummate skill, and is doubtless destined at no distant day to rank with the most distinguished literary men of the nation. I trust he will pardon me for using his name thus publicly; but I feel it to be, though but a poor tribute, due to his laudable efforts in our cause; and I am not one of those who believe in freezing a man out by cold indifference during life and then raising monuments and howling requiems over his worthless remains after he is gone. Ever the friend of the good cause, I am, yours truly, JOS. TOWSLEY.

NATIONAL MILITARY HOME,
MILWAUKEE CO., WIS., July 31, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Your favor of the 28th inst. is received, and we are all very glad to hear from you. In reply would say that THE TRUTH SEEKER has been discontinued in our library for the last six months. Prior to that time we had a copy here every week, and it was read as steadily as any paper in the library, for we hav a great many Liberals here, which our League will show; but our officers are all orthodox, and never forget to throw every obstacle in the way of Freethought. We sprung a trap on the governor at the time we started our Veteran Liberal League here, and secured the hall for Liberal lectures only. Our League was already formed, and the first thing they knew our posters were on the bulletin board, stating that the Veteran Liberal League would hav a free lecture in our hall every Wednesday at 3 P.M. Well, they did not know what to make of it, nor what to do with it, but as it was started, the officers knew that it would make a big howl in the papers here if they should break it up, and for that reason, and that reason alone, we are allowed to continue our meetings. We hav a chaplain who is an Episcopalian, or Church of England man, but whose business is principally in our groves escorting our governor's wife around. It is the common talk of the Home, as well as in Milwaukee, and to say they are "as thick as two peas" is a very cool way of expressing it. But the United States pays him five hundred dollars a year to come up here and hold meetings twice a week. Then we hav a Catholic priest who gets the same pay, but not the same perquisits. But as this place is under a reign of terror, no one dare to say a word, but these are the facts.

I am not able to subscribe for your valuable paper at present, but hope soon to be. We first petitioned our governor for the use of our chapel one evening in each week for Liberal lectures, but he told me he could not giv us the chapel, as that was strictly for religious purposes, but said he would giv us the theater as soon as he could get it cleared out, it then being full of beds. So we had to await his pleasure. Our petition was signed by eighty-seven members to start with, and we hav over a hundred now, and would hav had five hundred members by this time had it not been for the intimidation of our officers and priests, and even now they are trying every means in their power to break us up. No political speech is allowed on these grounds, and they hav a spy at all of our meetings to see if any of our speakers say anything about politics, so that they can hav grounds for breaking us up. But notwithstanding all this, we propose to hold the fort, and don't you forget it.

As far as the management of the Home is concerned, it could not possibly be worse. I hav written a number of letters about the true inwardness of the Home, and some of them hav been published, but since this Congressional committee has been appointed, I think our officers hav given the papers a little hush-money, for they will not publish any more of our letters unless they are complimentary to the officers. I hav a letter in my pocket now, but can't get it published, as I hav no money.

Now, in regard to political speaking on these grounds. I would like to ask you if it is not an outrage. Who should hav a right to know what is going on if the men who saved the country when our money was only worth twenty-five cents on the dollar are denied the privilege?

We are all old men here, and it makes me feel good to see so many old men who are Liberal and do not fear to die in that faith. Our president, Mr. Jason Kellogg, is an old gentleman eighty-one years of age, and rather feeble, so I do most of the writing for him. I am the vice-president of the League.

JASON KELLOGG, Pres.
GEO. W. HARE, Vice-Pres.

P. S.—Among our favorit speakers are Mrs. Dr. Severance; Col. Roberts, of Texas; Dr. Brown; Mr. Grossman, editor of the German Freidenker; Mr. Stark, of New York city; Mr. Godfrey; Mr. Olmsby, and many others too numerous to mention. The Liberals of Milwaukee hav kindly volunteered to furnish us with speakers, and so far we hav never been short, for which we feel very grateful. One of our comrades here takes your paper, and through him we get a chance to read it. He is our secretary, Benjamin Barkin by name. G. H.

First you pump the American line,
Humbley, bumbley, twenty-nine."

"Oue's all, two's all, zick a zall zee,
Hurl-a-moo, crack-a-moo, peneral-e-e;
Pim, pom, musque don,
Strig-a-lum, strag-a-lum, twenty-one."

"Eeny, meeny, kitie, ki-nan,
Who shall be the soldier's man;
To drive the horse, to beat the drum;
Tell me when the enemies come;

O-u-t spells out."

"Aner, mayna, dickery, dick,

Wickery, mickery, lick,
Ickery, thickery, dick."

On the Sunny Side.

Hi and whoop-hooray, boys!
Sing a song of cheer,
Here's a holiday, boys,
Lasting half a year!
Round the world, and half is Shadow we hav tried;
Now we're where the laugh is—
On the sunny side!

Pigeons coo and mutter,
Strutting high aloof,
Where the sunbeams flutter
Through the stable roof.
Hear the chickens cheep, boys,
And the hen, with pride,
Clucking them to sleep, boys,
On the sunny side!

Hear the clacking guinea,
Hear the cattle moo,
Hear the horses whinny,
Looking out at you!
On the hitching-block, boys,
Grandly satisfied,
See the old peacock, boys,
On the sunny side!

Robins in the peach-tree,
Bluebirds in the pear,
Blossoms over each tree
In the orchard there!
All the world's in joy, boys,
Glad and glorified,
As a romping boy, boys,
On a sunny side!

Where's a heart as mellow?
Where's a soul as free?
Where is any fellow
We would rather be?
Just ourselvs or none, boys,
World arouud and wide,
Laughing to the sun, boys,
On the sunny side!

Post-office Jack.

Jack is such a funny looking dog—you can ot help laughing whenever you see him. He is fat, round-bodied, short-legged, gray-whiskered, and gray-headed, and when he walks he waddles.

Everybody knows Jack—Post-office Jack, as he is called—and everybody has a kind word for him. He is not very handsome, and fanciers of bird-dogs, pug-dogs, spaniels, or the wonderful St. Bernard dogs, would turn up their noses at Jack, poor Jack, who cannot boast of a pedigree like some famous dogs we read of. He has some traces of the Scotch terrier, an unmistakable tuft of hair on his forehead showing a descent from noble ancestry, but terribly mixed up with plebeian blood, so that he is recognized simply as a mongrel.

I'll tell you how he came to be known as Post-office Jack.

It was eleven or twelve years ago that this dog, lean, lank, mangy, and hungry—a very tramp dog—walked into the post-office, and the door being open, he went straight into the money-order department, and looked wistfully into the clerk's face, as if soliciting an order to be cashed.

"What are you in here for, you mean-looking cur, you?" said the clerk, sternly.

"You just get out of here, you, sir! Clear out!" and the clerk helped him out with his boot.

The dog took the matter good-naturedly, and sat down in the lobby and licked himself. He evidently did not resent injuries, or lay up insults, for presently he received another kick and a cuff without remonstrance. He walked away to the door and stood there, looking soberly up and down the street, till another clerk took notice of him.

"Poor fellow!" said he, patting him on the head. "I guess you're hungry by the looks of ye."

The clerk went out and bought some crackers, and returning, fed them to the dog, who ate them like one almost famishing. That was his first meal in the post-office. He did not go away, but lingered near his new friend, and when night came manifested no disposition to retire to other quarters, bnt curled himself upon a rug and prepared for a night's rest.

From that time to this, Jack has considered himself an attache of the post-office. He was christened Jack by general consent, and in due time was regularly licensed, a collar procured, and his name, number, and ownership engraved upon the same—"Post-office Jack."

Of course he has his favorits among the clerks, feeling, perhaps, a greater bond of sympathy between those who specially befriended him. He seemed to regard himself as special watchman of the old post-office, but when it was moved into the new government building, Jack seemed to resign his position in favor of the regularly appointed policeman.

Jack knows when the mails are due from the East, West, North, and South, and is always on hand at the sorting of the letters and papers.

He frequently takes short rambles about town, calling at various houses where he has acquaintances, and stopping, sometimes, to dinner, or to tea.

Old men, and maidens, brokers, bankers, and little boys alike, stop to say, "Good morning, Jack," and little girls pat him kindly on his head as he passes. He looks up with a pleased expression in his honest eyes—Jack has beautiful eyes, if he is not otherwise handsome—wags his tail, and walks graciously on.

I remember one day when John and Charley, two of the clerks who hav befriended Jack most, went to call at a house where sorrow had set its seal. Jack was with them, and he walked from room to room as if in search of the little one whom he had so often seen, and whose merry prattle he had so often heard, but who, alas! had fallen asleep, and lay then in the awful stillness and sacred beauty of death.

Jack missed her, and wondered, no doubt, what was the mystery of it all.

So we all wonder, and know as little of the mysteries of life and death as Jack.

Once in awhile Jack undertakes to travel tho route with a carrier, but he soon gets tired, and returns to the office.

Occasionally he goes with Edgar, another clerk, home, and a few times he has been with him to carry letters, but the last time he stopped at the house, looking up at him as much as to say, "You go on, and I'll wait here till you come back. It is too hot for me today. I say, it's an awfully hot day, Edgar."

But Jack is growing old and feeble. His teeth are poor, and he is troubled with rheumatisim. There are times when he limps badly, and one can see that Jack's days are not many or long in this world, and many will say, "Poor Jack!" when he is no longer seen trotting along the streets, or reclining on the post-office steps.

Jack's predominating good quality—and he has few bad ones—is good nature. He was never known to be "cross" or peevish, not even when suffering severely from rheumatic twinges. So Jack, in his humble, dog-fashion, teaches ever the lesson of goodness, amiability, kindness—and a great lesson it is, for none of us can hav too much of that sweet good nature that helps to make this world a pleasant place to liv in, not only for ourselvs, but for everybody else about us.

"We Get What We Carry."

My Dear Young Friends: As I am a dear lover of children, I want to tell you a story. I tell it because I want to do you good, and I want you to remember my text as long as you liv. Some years ago I went to liv on a farm in Massachusetts. Before I got there I was told there was a school-house near by. At first thought I felt a little unpleasant, as I had known some families to hav trouble with the scholars. But I immediately resolved that I would "capture those children," or, in other words, make them my friends.

As I approached the house I was to occupy, I saw the school-house close by. I had heard that the owner of the farm had been at war with the children, and I felt I could not afford to hav those little ones my enemies. In a few hours I met them on the road going home. I spoke to them kindly, and shook hands with them all—it was a small school. Near my house was a pump, and, as children often want water, I bought a new tin cup and hung it on the pump. Soon the boys came to the door to ask for water. I told them to always help themselvs freely. As the object of this letter is to do good, let me say I was greatly pleased to notice, as I did, that when a boy opened the door and stepped into the house, he took off his hat. It pleased me the more because for thirty-five years I hav never crossed the threshold of any door without removing my hat, or sat five minutes in any house with my hat on. Opposit the school-house was my orchard, and I had a great quantity of sweet apples, which the children are so fond of. When the apples were ripe, I told the children to always help themselvs, without ever asking me. I also had a few pears and some grapes, which I picked off and carried into the school-house and gave to the children.

Now, let us see whether "we get what we carry." Nearly opposit the school-house was a useless stone wall, which I wanted removed. But I had neither horse nor oxen, and some of the stones were too heavy for me to handle alone. But I felt an earnest desire to remove the wall, and I went to work alone. In a short time the children were let out for recess, and without a word from me, every boy came running to me, and the way they took hold of those rocks did me good, I assure you. They had only a few minutes to spare, but at every recess, and at noon, they came and helped me until the rocks were nicely piled up, just as I wanted them. I could not hav believed had I not seen with my own eyes, how much those boys could lift. And never in all my life did I enjoy a job of work as I did the removal of that stone wall. As soon as I cut my hay the boys came to me to know if they could play ball in my field. I said: "Play ball! yes, dears; and I will go and play with you!" I knew they would injure the grass ground some, but I said to myself, What is a hundred or two of hay to the pleasure of those manly boys? So occasionally I went over and played with them. Now, the result of this was, when the school was about to close, and they were to hav an exhibition, both scholars and teacher came to me and invited me to come into the school and talk to the children. And when I was called upon to speak I took for a text, "We Get What We Carry." If we carry love and good will, sunshine and pleasant words, we get love and kindness in return. We are sure to "get what we carry." A short illustration on this point, and I close. A Christian lady near by me has a plot of ground close by a school-house. When the boys play ball they accidently throw their ball over into this lady's yard. Instead of picking up the ball and with pleasant words giving it to them, she keeps it, and with very cross words scolds them and threatens them with the law. The result is they hate her, and take pains to annoy her in many ways. So you see, my dear children, she gets what she carries.

Now, I captured or made friends of all those dear children, and all by kindness. My dear young friends, let me in closing tell you that it pays four-fold to carry love, good will, and sunshine all through our lives.

Your friend, Seward Mitchell.

Our Puzzle Box.

A PUZZLE.

The verb to be, four times we see,
Forward, backward, then repeat;
Next backward, forward,
A something horrid
The printer's eye to greet,
And corrugate with frowns of hate
The inky "devil's" forehead.
But in these last, as thus we've cast,
One letter we hav borrowed.
"To borrow trouble Makes it double"—
The proverb here holds fast;
Yet borrow ease, and, if you please,
You now may break your fast
On palindromic tart—
Or something of that sort—
Filled in with printer's peas.
Your poet with your cook agrees
They should be short;
She shortens without brevity;
He to confuse the "devil,"
And in his leaden levity,
To hold his high head level.
Then with "the head and front of his offending"
Hap'ly our poet here makes ending.
'Tis of all merits first and best
A thousand blent in one.
"The wicked cease, the weary rest—"
Simply—our puzzle's done!
And ends at the beginning—
Reader, forgiv the pun,
The paradoxic sinning!
For be assured in ages past
Infinit wisdom vast Beheld the puzzlers joke,
And thus prophetic spoke:
"Last shall be first—first, last,"—
A paradox divine,
But its fulfilment mine.
And now with egotistic pride,
Four times within this crystal tide
Baptised "I" may be spied;
Even like a fish "I" bathe, "I" glide,
Quadrupled thus "I" there reside,
The four-in-one of this great stream,
And thus excel the great supreme.

ANSWER TO REBUS IN CHILDREN'S CORNER, AUGUST 9, 1884.

The answer to this rebus I can see,
For the first letter surely must be D,
Which ranks a hundred times my third,
Which is V in the middle of the word.
For the last we will place the letter L;
And as fifty it fits very well.
Of the paradox I now see the sense,
As a pound is worth twelve score of pence.
The fourth letter I, very neat—
For use, the "eye" cannot be beat.
We place an E for second if you please,
And for comfort we will take a lot of E E E's.
The whole in the mind takes position
As a creature of rank superstition. E. F.

TO PUZZLERS.

Where are all our merry puzzle makers and solvers? We hav received only two answers to Mr. Juergens's kind offer of a few weeks since, and those were both wrong. We hope soon to hear from all our friends who hav made our puzzle box so interesting in times past. Original matter for this department shall always find a cordial welcome.—Ed.

GEORGE CHAINEY

Wishes to enter into correspondence with Liberals throughout the country in reference to lecture engagements for the coming season.

Mr. Chainey needs no recommendation from us. We print below a few of his indorsements, which certainly are the strongest testimonials ever given to any Liberal lecturer, except Ingersoll, in this country:

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll: "Mr. Chainey is one of the best thinkers in this country. He has a wonderful command of language, is full of imagery, comparison, antithesis, logic, and beauty. He feels what he says with his whole heart, and perceives it with his entire brain. He is perfectly honest, and for that very reason is intellectually keen. Downright honesty in such a man is genius. He gives a true transcript of his mind, and gives it with great power. He is well acquainted with the church, knows all the ways of the theologian, and understands the inside of the whited sepulcher of superstition. His lectures stir me like trumpets. They are filled with the loftiest spirit. Eloquent, logical, and poetic, they are as welcome and refreshing as the breeze of morning on the cheek of fever."

"Mr. Chainey is a large, well formed, though rather round-shouldered man, wears no beard, and in these days of crops would be called a long-haired man. He has a big head and broad face. He is an orator. His eloquence is his chief fascination. His periods are models of oratorical beauty, and though ordinarily unimpassioned he occasionally becomes intensely strong in his dramatic effects. He is singularly graceful of gesture. His methods inspire one with a conviction of his honesty. His elocution is masterly. His voice is magnetic, powerful, flexible, very pleasing. His sentiments are beautifully painted sacrilege. He would make a famous actor."—Scranton Daily Republican.

"Mr. Chainey's lecture was one of the most brilliant oratorical efforts ever delivered in Creston. We doubt if any lecturer, other than Col. Ingersoll, could use so much of beautiful metaphor."—Creston Commoner.

"Mr. Chainey's enunciation is perfect, his sentences forcible and impassioned. Like Ingersoll he has the happy faculty of clothing an idea in such a peculiarly taking form, that at first thought the contrary idea seems an absurdity and an imposture."—Syracuse Morning Herald.

BEES! BEES! BEES!

FROM $2,000 TO $5,000 A YEAR KEEPING HONEY BEES.

The particulars are simply to prevent the great loss that most bee masters have to contend with annually. Then give the bees a chance to increase and collect surplus honey to their fullest capacity; all of which can be easily accomplished by using the kind of hive described in "Kidder's Secrets of Bee-keeping."

Send for the Book and see how easily it can be done with a few swarms of bees.

THIS BOOK IS A RELIABLE GUIDE

to all persons that keep bees, especially to the novice or new beginner, as it teaches how all of the troubles and disappointments that the bee master is liable to, can be successfully overcome, such as Foul Brood, Dysentery, Bee Robbery, Ravages of Moth Millers, Loss of Queen, loss of bees in Swarming time, by their flight to the forests, also the great loss in winter and early spring management, which is usually more than all other ways combined. This book will also inform the bee master HOW BEES WILL INCREASE AND THROW OFF SWARMS to an enormous extent, all conditions being favorable. The old stocks will frequently swarm three or four times each, and oft times the first swarms thrown off will swarm once or twice each, with a good hive and right kind of management. In warmer climates the bees will increase and swarm to a much greater extent.

GREAT YIELD OF SURPLUS HONEY.

This Book will inform the bee master how to get the greatest amount of surplus honey, and at the same time hav it in small packages weighing three-quarters of a pound to two o three pounds, as may be desired, which will command the highest price in market. In a good season the bee keeper may calculate on two or three hundred pounds of surplus honey from each old stock, and from fifty to one hundred pounds from the earlier young swarms, especially if they do not over-swarm.

NO MORE BEE-STINGS IN MANAGING BEES.

The Book will post the bee-keepers how to manage them when putting them on, or taking off surplus honey boxes, and not get stung in the whole operation.

BEE-KEEPING FOR OUR SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

It being the most pleasant, as well as the most profitable business that young people can engage in, and at the same time remain at home with their parents. The author has known of several young men who commenced the culture of the bee in their teens, and are now making more money than their fathers who run the farm, and doing it easily and with small investments. We must also remember that the women folks often make the best of bee-keepers, and not so liable to neglect them as the men folks.

KIDDER'S BEE BOOK

should be in the hands of all persons who like honey, and take an interest in the little honey bee. It contains more matter than many books that sell for two dollars, and is embellished with numerous cuts and drawings. There is no trouble, loss, or damage that a bee master has to contend with but what the book will give the proper remedy by simply referring to the index, and that will point to the page where it is fully explained.

In order to bring this book more prominently before the mass of bee keepers, the Author proposes to give, as a premium to each purchaser of a book, from this date until Aug. next, the privilege of making his Celebrated Patent Bee Hive, as spoken of in book, for their own use (but not to sell) Free of Charge, otherwise there will be the usual Patent Fee of Five Dollars to each individual that wishes to make and use the hive

PRICE, BOARD BOUND, 35 cents.

N. B. The directions for hive making with cuts, drawings, etc., will be inclosed within each book sold, until Sept next, (not longer). Now is the time for all bee-keepers to avail themselves of this liberal offer, which is simply to buy a book at the Regular Price, before Sept. next

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR

Parallels in Other Religions.

Being a Comparison of the Old and New estament Myths and Miracles with those of heathen nations of Antiquity, Considering also their Origin and Meaning. With numerous illustrations.

The object of the work is to point out the myths with which the Old and New Testaments abound; to show that they were held in common with other nations; and then trace them to their evident origin and explain their meaning.

"It has long been acknowledged by the most eminent biblical students that the Hebrew scriptures contain a large mythical element; but, so far as we know, the present is the first complete and scholarly atttempt to trace these myths to their source, and ascertain their original signification."—Boston Courier.

"Never before has there been given a volume to the reading world that shows the research for the origin of these myths as does this one just published by J. W. Bouton, of New York."—Boston Times.

"It is unquestionably true that the results of a rationalistic study of the Christian scriptures are nowhere else so accessible as they are now made in the work before us.—N. Y. Sun.

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. MR. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

LADIES' MAGNETIC JACKET. Price, $18.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,
WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

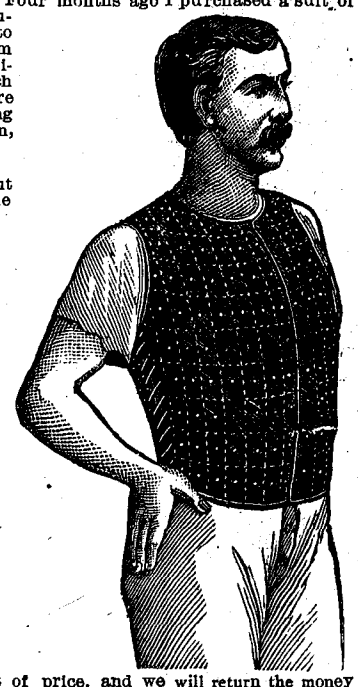
Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain
Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.



DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.

This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by any one desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,
Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Gardner, of St. Louis; Courtlandt Palmer, of New York; Charles Watts, of London, England; Allen Pringle, of Selby, Canada; Col. John R. Kelso, of Modesto, Cal.; George Chainey, of Boston; J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw City, Mich.; Mrs. Dr. Juliet H. Severance, of Milwaukee; Stephen Pearl Andrews, of New York; Dr. John Stoltz, of Chicago; William S. Bell, of Boston; Judge R. S. McCormick, of Franklin, Pa.; John E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kansas; Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y.; M. E. Billings, of Waverly, Iowa; Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa.; Charles B. Reynolds, of Rochester, N. Y.; Samuel P. Putnam, of New York; Dr. William F. McCormick, of Franklin, Pa.; and Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., orthodox, of Philadelphia, Pa. And the following hav also been invited, the most of whom are expected to be present: Hon. Elizur Wright, of Boston; F. E. Abbot, Cambridge, Mass.; Horace Seaver, Boston; Luther Colby, Boston; Judge Arnold Krekle and Mrs. Judge Krekle, of Kansas City, Mo.; James Parton, of Newburyport, Mass.; Judge Carter, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; and B. F. Underwood, editor of the Index, Boston, Mass. It is possible that Col. Ingersoll will be present and address the Convention.

THE SINGING.

Professor A. D. Lane, of Olean, N. Y., one of the most popular professional singers in the state, accompanied by as good a quartet of voices as can be found in Western New York, has been engaged to provide the musical entertainment for the occasion. Professor H. H. Hall, who sang for the Rochester Convention, has also been engaged.

THE PLACE OF MEETING.

The location where the Convention is to meet is one of the most pleasant and picturesque in the state. It is described as follows in a circular issued by the Association: "The Cassadaga Lake Camp-meeting Grounds are eight miles from Lake Erie, and seven hundred feet above it; situated midway between New York and Chicago, one and a half hours by rail from Buffalo, five from Cleveland, nine from Pittsburgh, fourteen hours from Cincinnati, sixteen from Philadelphia, eighteen hours from New York, twenty hours from Boston and Washington, and twenty-one from Chicago. It lies on the shore of a beautiful chain of lakes, three in number, and at an elevation of nearly fourteen hundred feet above the level of the sea." The Association last year erected on the grounds an amphitheater, with a seating capacity of twenty-five hundred people, with the seats in a semi-circle, which givs every one present an opportunity to hear all that is said from the speaker's platform.

ROUTES OF TRAVEL AND RAILROAD RATES.

Eastern and western passengers over the Nickel Plate, Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad, and eastern passengers over the New York, Lake Erie & Western (formerly Erie) railroad, change cars at Dunkirk, N. Y., and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to the "Cassadaga Camp-meeting Grounds."

Eastern and western passengers over the New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio railroad (formerly Atlantic & Great Western), and eastern passengers over the Buffalo & Jamestown railroad, change cars at the Atlantic & Great Western Crossing, and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to Lily Dale Station.

To be more definit, persons coming to the Convention from most of the cities and large towns in the United States will find it the cheaper to purchase excursion tickets to Chautauqua Lake. These can be obtained very cheap; and then leave the cars at the crossing of the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad near Jamestown, and then take the last mentioned road to Lily Dale Station, near the camping grounds. Persons coming from any station on the New York, Lake Erie & Western railroad, or any of its branches west of Binghampton, will pay full fare to Dunkirk, and then be returned at one-third fare home. The Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad will sell excursion tickets at two cents a mile from any station on that road.

THE HOTEL RATES.

The following prices hav been established at the hotels for board: $1.50 per day, for one day and less than three days; and over, $1 per day. Table board: breakfast, 40 cents; dinner, 50 cents; supper, 30 cents. Lodgings, 25 to 30 cents. The hotel accommodations are sufficient to entertain all who may attend.

H L. GREEN,
Salamanca, N. Y. Secretary New York State Freethinkers' Association.

P. S.—I am glad to announce that the Truth Seeker Company will hav an agent on the grounds with a large assortment of Freethought publications for sale. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER will, as heretofore, make full reports of the proceedings. Other reports of the Convention will be published in the New York Herald, the Buffalo Courier, and other secular papers.

On Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 8th and 9th, the

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE

WILL HOLD ITS

EIGHTH ANNUAL CONGRESS

At the same place.

In his call for the Congress the President of the League invites "all citizens of the United States, whether they hav acted with this League or not, who believe in a secular republic, separation of church and state; the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all, and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press as the basis of universal suffrage."

All Charter and Life Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Each Auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates—its president, secretary, and three other members—to the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats in the Congress, and to votes by the permission of the Congress.

Odds and Ends.

TURNIPS fed to sheep are said to make mutton tender. Will cabbages fed to lawyers make legal tender?

WHEN a young man attempts to put his arm around a girl, she can repulse him politely by telling him to "waist not, want not."

NEW servant: "Oh, if you haven't any children I can't come, because whenever anything is broken there will be no one to blame it on but me."

"CAMPAIGN lies," did you say? No, sir; just at this moment the campaign is not lying. She is standing on her back hind legs and madly pawing the air.

RECITATION in moral philosophy: Professor—"What has a mother in view when she spanks an incorrigible child?" Vassar girl—rises, blushes, and sits down.

"JONES is a miserly man, but is very pleasant," said Brown. "Yes," replied Smith, "but it is his miserliness that makes him pleasant." "How's that?" "Why, don't you see, he hates to lose anything, and therefore keeps his temper."

A "SWEET girl graduate" at the June commencement read a very clever original essay entitled "Deceit a Crime." Next day she paid fifteen dollars for a new set of bangs, and bought a corset with much plumpness where it would do the most good.

A COLUMBIA county man took dinner the other day at the Putnam House. The waiter recited the bill of fare: "Roast beef, veal, and lamb, baked heart, boiled tongue, corned beef and cabbage, and beefsteak pie." "They'll do," replied the visitor; "bring 'em along quick."

"WHY is that cup of tea like truth?" asked the head of the family, pointing to the cup of tea by the side of his plate. "Te-hee!" giggled his wife; "I don't know. Why is it?" "Because it's my tea, and will prevail." Then his wife looked sorrowful and asked him what he had been drinking.

"I UNDERSTAND, professor, that you are opposed to admitting women to a college course." "That is my position exactly." "Hav you any objections to giving your reasons?" "None in the least; they are all embraced in one." "What is that?" "I married a lady with a collegiate education."

BENEATH a shady tree they sat;
He held her hand, she held his hat;
I held my breath and lay right flat;
They kissed—I saw them do it.
He held that kissing was no crime;
She held her head up every time;
I held my peace and wrote this rhyme
While they thought no one knew it.

A JAMAICA, L. I., young man had his girl out carriage-riding the other evening, and the horse took fright and ran away. In turning a corner the vehicle was overturned, and the young lady was pinned to the earth, the body of the carriage lying heavily across her waist. She was rendered unconscious. When she was released from her perilous position she slowly opened her eyes, as consciousness slowly returned, and faintly gasped: "Don't—squeeze me—quite—so hard—next—time—John."

THE telephone girl was dozing, when there came a spirited call. She hastily put her ear to the receiver, after spitefully ringing a reply, and heard: "Hello!" "Hello!" she replied. "Giv me Rev. Obadiah Beecher." The Rev. Obadiah was switched on, and the conversation proceeded as follows: "Hello!" "Hello!" "Is this Rev. Oba—" "Yes; what do you want?" shortly. "Why, Mr. Beecher, I wanted to tell you that we failed utterly to raise the balance of your salary to-day. We are still $200 short." "That is provoking—very pro—" here the girl switched on a man who was dunning a slow customer, and the opinion of Rev. Beecher was expressed by him as follows: "You are too cussed shiftless for any use. If you don't get the rest of that money by to-morrow noon I'll send a constable after you—blanked if I don't. I'll be blankty blank blanked if I can liv, and keep up a whole church full of paupers to boot. I'll be jo-blanked if I'll stand it. I'll pound the blankety blank stuffing out of you if you don't bring me the rest of that money. I won't sell you whisky on the sly and pretend it's hominy on the half-shell, any longer." Now the godly man is on trial for profanity and drunkenness, and the telephone girl is the most innocent witness in all Bloomington.

THE Christian Age tells the following anecdote of the late Rev. Dr. Hatfield and his choir-master, Mr. Jones, who was getting up a grand musical performance by his choir of an anthem he had composed to the words of one of Watts's psalms. The first verse ends with the words—

"Oh, may my heart in tune be found,
Like David's harp of solemn sound."

Mr. Jones came to his pastor to get his approval of a change of these lines, so as to read—

"Oh, may my heart be tuned within,
Like David's sacred violin."

But the doctor said he could improve even that, and he wrote, to the amazement of Mr. Jones—

"Oh, may my heart go diddle, didle,
Like unto David's sacred fiddle."

Mr. Jones sang the psalm as written by Watts. We haven't heard whether the doctor was prosecuted for blasphemy.

"Do you know," asked old Jones of Bill Gibson,
As he shuffled the cards for a deal,
"Why the gals is allus a searchin'
In that medder lot, owned by Jim Beale?"

"Why, cert," answered Bill as he anteed,
"They grow clover down thar, you know,
An' the gal what gits a four-leaver,
Is sartin to ketch a beau."

"Yer see," went on the old sinner,
As he scooped in the pot with a smile,
"It's jest like this queen an' four aces—
They're bound fer to rake in the pile,"

Notes and Clippings.

THE owner of a camp-meeting ground in Connecticut has ruined the profitableness of his property by introducing an electric light.

A RICHMOND, Va., man has offered a prize for the best essay on "self-supporting employment for the ladies in the Southern states."

AT a recent church dedication at Stratford, Conn., a match game of cricket between the priests and the choir was a feature of the attractions.

LILLIE DEVEREAUX BLAKE, it is stated, has come out for Cleveland, repudiating the manifesto of Susan B. Anthony and Elizabeth Cady Stanton in favor of Blaine.

THE revision of the Old Testament does not include the Apocrypha. But it is not improbable that some members of the committee will continue to meet and undertake a revision of the Apocrypha on the same principles.

A SUBSCRIBER from Benton, Texas, sends the following conundrum: "Why are parsons like brokers? Because both deal in 'futures.'" We believe the responsibility for this joke lies originally with the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher.

THE Hebrew population of St. Louis are up in arms because one of their number has been refused the lease of a residence, on the ground of a clause in leases already granted, that no Jewish family shall be allowed to occupy any house in the row.

"MY dear brethren," said the minister, leaning forward and speaking very earnestly," in this excessiv warm and oppressiv weather I can excuse a little drowsiness during the sermon, but I do wish that you would try and keep awake while the collection is being taken up."

THE mayor of Belton, Texas, issued his proclamation last week calling on the clergy "round about" to pray for rain. Let us see, soliloquizes the Sunday Gazetteer, Belton is in Bell county. That is the benighted region where Dr. Russell was horsewhipped a few years ago for not being a Christian.

THE new Old Testament knocks the bottom out of at least one standard "proof-text"—viz: "In my flesh shall I see God." The revised version has it, "Yet out of my flesh," etc. Those who believe in the resurrection of the identical body which is buried will hav to look for a new buttress to their theory.

THOSE who laugh at the idea of woman's competing with man in the professions will be astonished, says the Burlington Free Press, to know that a Western physician writes pathetically to a newspaper complaining of the conduct of a female doctor who has taken away all his patients and left him on the brink of starvation.

THE Methodist missionaries hav been driven out of Celaya, Mexico, by a mob. Their house was broken open, and they were forced to take refuge in a small room in a house near by. Here they were besieged for an hour or more, and the mob had just broken in the door and were about to massacre the missionaries, when some mounted police arrived. Catholicism and Methodism, it seems, are not adapted to mix harmoniously one with the other.

IT has lately transpired that when Hartmann, the Nihilist, was with Sophia Perovskaja (hanged in 1881) working at the mine, beneath a line of railroad, with the view of killing the czar while passing, he became in need of funds to finish the work, and Sophia suggested that he pawn his watch, which he did for eight roubles. This absence of the watch caused him subsequently to make an error in the time of firing the match, and to this the czar owed his life.

EDWARD LONKDALE, a member of the Salvation Army, called at various houses in Wilkesbarre, Pa., and stated that by applying a plaster he could, with the aid of earnest prayer, remove spots, pimples, etc., from the skin. At the house of J. N. Kepler he was allowed to try his skill on Mrs. Kepler, and no one being in the room he attempted undue familiarities. Mr. Kepler, however, happened to be in the next room, and catching the fellow attempting to kiss his wife, beat and kicked him out of the house. He then had the Salvation soldier arrested, and in default of bail he was sent to jail. His pockets were filled with copies of the War Cry.

THE Rev. Dr. Henry M. Scudder, of Chicago, who was for many years a missionary in India, expresses the opinion that "for unmixed wickedness and utter moral depravity no city of Asia could equal Chicago or New York," and that this continent has a class of villains "lower and meaner than the lowest and meanest in India or China." And yet New York and Chicago send missionaries to those countries. Perhaps it is the best thing that can be done, both for the cities and the missionaries; but poor Asia!

IT is a rare day when a Christian wife cannot furnish her husband with some degree of consolation. Take the following dialog as an instance: "No," said Fogg, meditativly, "I don't fear what may come to me in another world; it is the act of dying that fills me with a sort of nameless dread. I don't like the idea of crossing the dark river. I always was afraid of water, you know." "You shouldn't let that worry you," replied Mrs. F.; "you'd hav a splendid chance to dry your clothes when you reached the other side."

QUEEN VICTORIA is much troubled by the wicked conduct of her son-in-law, the Grand Duke Louis of Hesse-Darmstadt. According to the latest reports, he is seeking still another matrimonial alliance, notwithstanding the troubles brought about by his morganatic marriage with Mme. Kalamine. His latest fancy, it is said, is toward a lady who is connected with the ducal court at Darmstadt, but who is much his inferior in rank. She is also very much younger than the grand duke and is said to be very beautiful.

IT is described as having been an impressiv scene in Brussels on Saturday two weeks ago when 200 Burgomasters and 300 other members of the Communal Councils throughout the country met in the Hotel de Ville, and with right hands extended, swore to make use of all legal means to defeat the new education bill and to vindicate the "right of the people to public instruction by the state." At the demonstrations which followed the next day the Clericals are said to hav numbered only 8,000 as against 20,000 Liberals.—Times.

THE Christian Leader says: "So, then, Herbert Spencer is assailed as a Theist, or for not being an Atheist. He defends himself cautiously, but with his usual array of facts, and really takes sides with the theologians. In other words, he is obliged to postulate a power in the universe adequate to account, not for the separate phenomena, but for the whole series. He declines to name the power, but this modesty need not disturb us. Mr. Spencer and Mr. Huxley are now both eligible for a 'liberal' pulpit."

MR. WOODWARD, the vicar of Folkestone, England, is three parts Catholic, and the other part Protestant. He is constantly ignoring the line which separates the two divisions of the Christian church, notwithstanding the persistent efforts of the people's churchwarden to keep him in order. He recently bought a chalice of Mgr. Capel. One medallion on it represents the Virgin Mary catching the blood issuing from the side of the savior as he hung upon the cross. The chalice is used in the parish church, to the great offense of many of the parishioners.

THEY tell all sorts of queer stories about Col. Ingersoll. Here is one from a Cleveland paper: A reporter called on Col. Ingersoll the other morning, and had a short conversation with him. "Is it true," asked the reporter, "that you wrote the Thirty-Nine Articles?" "It is not true. I only wrote thirty of them. Mr. Theodore Tilton wrote the rest." "And the Westminster catechism?" "I aided on that. I looked up the history of Adam and Eve; discovered where Cain got his wife, painted the ark red, and read the proof." "Did you aid in the preparation of the Revised Edition?" "I am aiding all I can, in my feeble way. I am revising both books, after my own fashion." "Is it true, colonel, that Mr. Beecher, Mr. Talmage, and yourself are partners in a sheep ranch?" "Not exactly partners, sir," said the colonel, as he moved away, "but we are talking of writing a series of theological books in company. Good-day."

THE Independent has withdrawn from the support of Gov. Cleveland on account of the Buffalo scandal. We understand, says the Evening Post, that this change of front is made by Mr. Bowen, the proprietor of the paper, against the views of Dr. Ward, the editor, and Dr. Twining, the associate editor. The article in which the change is announced takes the ground that one act of personal impurity, if proved, is sufficient to condemn anybody. In this regard the Independent takes considerably higher ground than the New Testament. We can only congratulate it on the state of perfection which transcends the words of him who said "go and sin no more."

IN Macmillan's Magazine a writer quotes the following as Carlyle's opinion of the man Jesus Christ: "I did not find Christ that pound-of-fresh-butter character which people hav made of him. On the contrary, he is a man with a great deal of anger in him, but the anger all on the right side. He always has a sharp word to return to the Pharisees. When one who has kept the Ten Commandments asks him whether that is not enough he tells him no—'Leave all thy riches and follow after me.'" . . . . Speaking of the indifference of the people of our times toward high-minded men, he said: "If Jesus Christ were to come to-day, people would not even crucify him; they would ask him to dinner, and hear what he had to say, and make fun of it."

A WRITER in the Brooklyn Eagle has happened across the sort of clergyman that is familiar to most neighborhoods. Here is a story about him and how he was treated according to his deserts: He is wont to visit his parishioners about lunch or supper time, and will always stay when he is invited—sometimes until he is invited—to partake. One good liver in his parish got tired of this. Next time the clergyman called it was supper time and the family were seated at the evening meal. He was brought into the dining-room and took a chair near the window. He talked, but did not seem at ease. "Will you do as I am doing?" asked the head of the family, who had before him a crisp leg of pork, with apple sauce. "Thank you," said the pastor, rising and preparing to move his chair to the table; "I don't care if I do." "Then go home and eat your supper with your wife and family," was the response.

THE Rev. Joseph Powell, of San Francisco, recommends a novel method of preventing the propagation of crime. In a paper recently read before the Congregational Club of that city he treated of the law of heredity, and claimed that as things were at present criminals were born and bred such, and that the only efficient way to apply the "ounce of prevention," which here as elsewhere was better than "the pound of cure," according to the common proverb, was to bring in the services of the surgeon and forever deprive confirmed, vicious, and criminal persons of both sexes of the power of propagation. He proposed that confirmed drunkards, thieves, licentious persons, and all who had been twice convicted of vicious and criminal acts should be subjected to the proposed treatment, and that children of vicious and criminal parents, who at the age of twelve years exhibited, as in most cases they would do, a decided proclivity to the evil ways of their progenitors, should be subjected to the same treatment as a prophylactic. He recommended this, not by way of vengeance or even punishment, but as a safeguard for society, which was now in danger of being overrun and swamped by the vicious and criminal class, which seemed to hav a power of propagation greater than was possessed by those who were virtuous and moral. A few of the clergymen who took part in the discussion which followed, favored the views of Mr. Rowell, but most of them dissented therefrom, and some of them quite strongly.

Frederic Harrison and Positivism; and Herbert Spencer and Agnosticism.

BY STEPHEN PEARL ANDREWS.

For two thousand years, at least, the term Philosophy has been confined to metaphysics, which, it was assumed, founded, in that sphere of abstract thought, that broad generalization of truth which constitutes the higher scientific domain; from which also, it was assumed, that the special sciences emanated, or grew as branches. Since Bacon, and especially within the last half century, this current of thought has been reversed; and the present theory is that the only sane philosophy is that which consists in a generalization of and from the special sciences; and philosophy, among scientific men, now means simply the most general aspect of science or the sciences. This change, and the continued use of the word philosophy in two such opposit senses, is embarrassing, and it is better to designate the new school of philosophy, technically, as "Sciento-philosophy;" although, in current speech, the term philosophy will continue to be prevalently employed.

Among the great names representativ of broad scientific generalization, or Sciento-philosophy, of our day (or nearly so) are, in a pre-eminent way, Auguste Comte, (now dead) in France; Herbert Spencer, in England; Ernst Haeckel, in Germany; to which illustrious trio we may now unhesitatingly add Lester F. Ward, in America. With Haeckel and Ward we shall hav little or no further concern on this occasion than thus naming them. Our present affair will be with Mr. Harrison, as an advanced advocate of the Comtean philosophy—Positivism—and Mr. Spencer, in propria persona, in defense of Agnosticism, and the allied doctrins intimately associated with his name. I place the name of Mr. Harrison first in this mention only because he was the first to make assault in the contention now about to be alluded to—the same which has been spread at large before the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

That these two great representativ systems of Sciento-philosophy, the most prominently now before the world, should come, at some time, into open collision, was inevitable; and I hav long been awaiting that result, because it offers a great occasion for a sample of the application of Universology, and its allied practical philosophy—Integralism, as the means of adjustment and scientific reconciliation between all contestants in all spheres—without, however, dispensing with their differences, or impairing, in any sense, the utility of those differences; which are affirmed universologically to be as essential, useful, and every way desirable as is their reconciliation, or harmonic co-ordination in a larger, and the largest possible scheme of ideas. Neither Positivism, nor the Synthetic Philosophy (Mr. Spencer's entire system) claims any special new discovery (of a key for unlocking the universe of fact and ideas), or the distinctiv character of a Universal Science, in the rigorous sense of that term. They are, rather, merely grand encyclopedic digests and systematic co-ordinations of what has been already achieved, and has come to be known. Universology, on the contrary, makes, specifically and emphatically, both of these claims, and, therefore, as its function, intervenes in all controversies, as magistrate, umpire, or judge—holding, in a word somewhat, the same relation to all the opposing systems of thought as the planet, as a whole, with its mathematically measured rotundity, holds to the particular continents, quarters, and countries of the earth. And since, as yet, I am, doubtless, the most prominent representativ of universological lore, I betake myself to the ground of this combat, to command a peace, and to arrest these two desperate duelists, and save them from mutual murder, and a further great scandal, and lese majeste against the commonwealth of scientific and philosophic intelligence. They hav already done each other great damage—severely wounding each other, and greatly need, at least, the friendly intervention of the higher authorities.

Mr. Harrison has frankly avowed, in addition to his laudable desire to correct the errors of Mr. Spencer and the, perhaps, natural, desire to avenge old scores for Mr. Spencer's previous assaults on Comte and Positivism, that he has "a rider" of his own; or the ulterior purpose of forwarding his own personal views. The reader will already hav perceived that I too hav a "rider;" and that I make my appearance on the field, not merely to save the lives of the contestants, and vindicate the dignity of the Republic of Letters, but that I am, perhaps, still more desirous of establishing my own right to act as a magistrate. In pursuing my complex purpose, I shall giv attention, firstly, to those rare points in which the two contestants happen to agree, and shall then turn to the consideration of the subjects of their difference.

The points of agreement between Mr. Harrison and Mr. Spencer are, mainly: 1. That Mr. Spencer has, in a previous treatis, given the coup de grace to the orthodox theological views touching this general subject of controversy. Mr. Harrison says he (Mr. Spencer) has made an "array of the moral and intellectual dilemmas involved in all anthropomorphic theology into a long catena of difficulties, out of which it is hard to conceive any free mind emerging with success." But in case the theologians shall not consent to consider themselvs dead, the power of Universology to solve otherwise insolvable difficulties may be put to its severest test, at some future time, at this point of difference between them and these two champions who are united against them. I am not now called on to grapple with that question, and I shall leave it untouched. 2. They are agreed that Agnosticism, or the doctrin of the Unknowable—though for other reasons and purposes Mr. Harrison dislikes the terms—is true doctrin as against the theologians, and for the purpose of putting an end to the controversy with them.

I hav here coupled Agnosticism with the Unknowable, as if they were synonymous. Etymologically, however, they are not the same, unknowability denying the possibility of knowing, in respect to that to which it is applied; while Agnosticism may mean merely the expression of the characteristic modesty of science, which is forbidden by its own nature to claim knowledge beyond the limits of its acquired possession. It is, therefore, only to the Unknowable with the implications of its etymology, and to Agnosticism in so far as it is used in the same sense, that I shall here giv the first attention.

And here I venture to assert that there is no such thing, in any absolute sense, as the Unknowable. To assume its existence is a contradiction and a logical absurdity; for if it were existent, we should not know of its existence; could neither affirm nor deny it; should, in fact, never entertain the idea of it, either to affirm or deny it; because, again, to know that anything is (or is not) is to know it, already, in the most fundamental particular of the knowledge which we can hav of any subject whatsoever. It has ceased to be the unknowable, therefore, from the instant that we know and can affirm that it is or exists. From that onward we may know less or more of the details of its existence; but nevermore is it unknowable, or even unknown for us.

I am not now commenting upon Mr. Spencer's idea, as covered by the term Unknowable, but upon the appropriateness, or inappropriateness of the term to express any true idea whatsoever. I am asserting that it is one of what Mr. Spencer has so happily characterized as pseud-ideas, or words merely, not charged with any real thought. It is not competent to express the notion of negation to which Mr. Harrison would confine it; for even nothings, as we habitually speak of them, are knowable as somethings "defecated to a pure transparency," i. e., they remain as transparencies; and transparencies are attenuated somethings. Hegel pointed out the fact that the knowable or thinkable nothing is only a less real something, or, in other words, that negation is also affirmation; but an unknowable anything is unthinkable, and is never, therefore, by any possibility even, thought about. It is, in other words, the verbal promis, to the ear or eye, of an idea, with no idea lying back of the promis, to redeem it. It is a bad bill in the currency of language. It cannot be it which is concurred in and relied on by these two great thinkers, either to refute the anthropomorphic theologians, or to replace their postulates. In this extreme sense of the phrase, if sense it can be called, they would both be constrained to abandon it, if they had ever so entertained it. And yet it is only in some such extreme rendering of the supposed idea, or in some vague or undefined sense, that they two can accept the Unknowable as common ground of agreement to stand on, even in their antagonism to the "spiritists." We will, therefore, consider the discussion of this second subject of their agreement as exhausted, and will pass to the consideration of the first among their several grounds of difference; that which relates to this same subject—the Unknowable.

Here, on the side of the disagreement, Mr. Harrison finds the contents of this limbo of the Unknowable to be pretty nearly pure nothingness, "a sort of a something about which we can know nothing;" while Mr. Spencer infills it with pretty much all there is of vitality, energy, and reality in existence; indentifying it with Force, his "prime-postulate," and the most affirmativ conception of Being. He says that "not only objectiv nature, but man himself is the ultra-manifestation of this most real essence." He speaks of "that Power of which man and the world are products, and which is manifested through man in the world from instant to instant." He adds, "I might make clear the contrast between that Comtean Agnosticism which says that 'Theology and Ontology alike end in the Everlasting No with which science confronts all their assertions,' and the Agnosticism set forth in 'First Principles,' which along with its denials emphatically utters an Everlasting Yes." Again he speaks of "that great stream of Creativ Power, unlimited in Space and Time, of which Humanity is a transitory product." And, still again, he says: "Whereas in common with his teacher Sir William Hamilton, Dean Mansel alleged that our consciousness of the Absolute 'is merely a negation of conceivability,' I hav, over a space of ten pages, contended that our consciousness of the Absolute is not negativ, but positiv, and is the one indestructible element of consciousness 'which persists at all times, under all circumstances, and cannot cease until consciousness ceases.'"

"Further," he says, "I hav contended originally and in the article named, that this Reality transcending appearance, which is not simply unknown, as Mr. Harrison thinks it should be called, but is proved by analysis of the form of our intelligence to be unknowable, standing toward the Universe and toward ourselvs in the same relation as an Anthropomorphic Creator was supposed to stand, has a like relation with it not only to human thought, but to human feeling." "I hav also argued that we are just as much debarred from denying such [human] attributes, since, as ultimate analysis brings us everywhere to alternativ impossibilities of thought, we are shown that beyond the phenomenal order of things, our ideas of possible and impossible are irrelevant."

The first question which urges itself upon our attention here is: How is it possible, and what is the reason, in the nature of things, that two schools of able thinkers—Hamilton, Mansel, and Harrison on the one side, and Mr. Spencer on the other—should be driven, in construing the Unknowable and Absolute, to diametrically opposit conclusions—on the one hand giving to the conception the utmost negativ, and on the other hand the utmost affirmativ character? At all events, the fact is so. The issue is distinctly made up, and is an all-important one; since the Absolute, being for Mr. Harrison, Positivist though he be, as well as for the metaphysicians, almost a pure negation, there is no place left for him to plant a religion except in Humanity, so that this first grand point of difference between him and Mr. Spencer is the source of all their subsequent differences. Yet they are alike utterly powerless to break, for themselvs, the deadlock which divides them. Unity can be evolved from this, their fundamental oppositness, only by the aid of another system of thought, which deals in deeper analysis than that which Mr. Spencer has called ultimate. The case with the naturismal sciento-philosophical elementation, whether Positivist or Agnostic, is like that of the Syllabic Alphabets with which the art of phonetic writing commences, and which, in the main, are displaced, subsequently, by that deeper analysis of sounds which furnishes the True Alphabet, giving a letter to each distinct elementary sound, vowel, or consonant. Universology comes in to furnish that ultimate analysis and the True Alphabet of Thought, with all philosophical discriminations and solutions, which is requisit to provide a basis for explanation and reconciliation in all those spheres of speculation which are left vague or unreconcilable in their dissidences, from the lack of thoroughness in previous analytical methods. Universology will, therefore, throw a flood of light upon this first and fundamental difference between Positivists and Agnostics, justifying them both, showing that each has an indispensable portion of the whole truth, and that the larger and all-embracing philosophy of Integralism will combine and correlate them in the higher and complex unity of complete knowledge.

It must, in the first place, be observed here that the Absoluto-Absolute and Absolute Unknowable being utterly nonexistent even in thought; utterly inconceivable, and for us, therefore, pure nothing; and as such, to be eliminated from all questions of philosophy, what remains for us is the distribution of universal things into a Sphere of the Less Knowable and a Sphere of the More Knowable; or the Quasi-Knowable and the Knowable; or, what is the same thing, into The Occult and The Overt Departments of the Universe, whatsoever these may prove to mean—like the Cryptogamous and Phanogamous distribution in Botany. More strictly, the case is like that of a circle or sphere, in respect to the radii, which, in the inner half of its rotundity, converge towards the center where they end; and which, in its outer half, tend outward towards the rim or surface where they terminate, diverging more and more as they go away from the neutral belt which intervenes half way from the center to the circumference. There results an inner solid sphere, with the radii near each other, and converging, condensed, matted upon each other (substance like) more and more as they approach the center, and an outer shell-sphere, whose radii diverge outwardly from the neutral belt to the surface, reporting themselvs there as points scattered and sundered from each other; marking Configuration or Form (articulatoid) rather than Substance or Reality. The inner or substanciv sphere is also hidden or occult, typifying the Occult Department of Universal Being, and the Morphic, or Phenomenal, or Apparent Sphere consisting more of mere "show," like a map on the surface typifying, at the opposit extreme, the Overt Department of Universal Being.

It is of the inner or Occult Sphere which figures analogically or symbolically in the philosophy of Mr. Spencer, as the Unknowable, of which I hav now specially to treat. That which is internal, substanciv, occult, is also (in the usual constitution of things) vital, and the hidden source of Force or Energy; as, in the human body, the entrails, called "vitals," and the nerve centers, and the mind itself, which are the sources of the corporeal strength, Energy, or Force. Mr. Spencer recognizes this analogy when, repudiating the negativ theory of the Unknowable, he says:

"In pursuance of this view the Comtean system limits itself to phenomena, and deliberately ignores the existence of anything implied by the phenomena. But though M. Comte thus exhibits to us a doctrin which performing 'the happy dispatch,' eviscerates things and leaves a shell of appearances with no reality inside; yet I hav in more than one place, and in the most emphatic way, declined thus to commit intellectual suicide."

I shall state here for the information of those readers who may happen not to be "posted," that "the happy dispatch," is the Japanese polite way of alluding to the habit of theirs, which we hav come to know under the name of hari kari, and which consists in ripping open the abdomen and letting out the bowels, and that "evisceration" means the same thing—the letting or taking out of the entrails. Mr. Spencer compares, therefore, here, the Unknowable with the viscera or entrails, the within or "Inwards" of the human or animal body; and, of course, the knowable or phenomenal world with the body-walls, covered by the skin which presents the body externally and phenomenally to others.

We hav now gained a position from which we can illustrate, from this same symbolism, the natural, and nearly inevitable, tendency of two reasoners, and sometimes of the same reasoner, incautiously, at different times, to pronounce this whole region, the viscerismus, negativ, or nothingish; and otherwise to pronounce it the most affirmativ or somethingish possible; as just shown by allusion to the vitals. Substituting the inner sphere, above described, for the visceral interior of the human or animal body—the sphere or globe form being less subject to the Artistic Modification to which nature is addicted in her higher works, and so the more primitiv type; as the fish skeleton, being lower in the scale of development, better illustrates the typical plan of the vertebral skeleton system at large, than the skeleton of man or the higher animals—it will be perceived, on reflection, that, if we follow inwardly, in thought, the converging radii, we reach finally the center, which tends powerfully to become representativ of this whole inner sphere; somewhat as the astronomer represents the entire body of the sun by the sun center. But this center, so reached, is, then, peculiarly ambiguous, and contradictory in character; and this fact is the gist of the illustration now sought for. It is either the very focus, pivot, or source of all the outstreaming force or forces of both bodies, the inner and the outer; or it is, on the contrary, the vanishing point into the ideal Infinit (the infinitly small), and, as it were, beyond it, into the resulting Nothingness—as we may chance or choose to regard it. Hence this inner, real, substanciv, vital, force-bearing sphere, considered with all its inherent potency, being, symbolically, the God-center, whether the personal God of orthodoxy or the quasi-impersonal God of Spencer, is, if taken affirmativly, that Unknowable which is the all-powerful embodiment of Affirmation, Life, and Force, or, if taken negativly, it is the Quasi-nothing, the Unknowable "defecated into a pure transparency" of Mr. Harrison, and his mental congeners. Mr. Harrison then represents Mr. Spencer as holding the views which he (Mr. Harrison) himself deduces from the drift inward to and beyond the Inmost of things. Mr. Spencer then, in turn, accuses him of utter misrepresentation. But, there has been, doubtless, no misrepresentation, in purpose. The sin of Mr. Harrison was, at the most, a too rigorous abiding by his own order of logic; forgetting, neglecting, overlooking, in his certainty that such results follow from such premises, what Mr. Spencer had said and repeated, in defining his position. Mr. Spencer, on the contrary, with less respect for mere abstract consistency and with more respect for the practical facts of nature, turns himself about abruptly at the real ultimation of his mental traverse inwardly; reverts from the real inmost center of things; looks back to the real world, and finds in that center and turning-point an outward-tending fountain of all forces, "the Infinit and Eternal source from which all things proceed;" or "by which all things are created and sustained." There is, only, here, a perfectly natural misunderstanding, incident to the inherent ambiguity of this crucial instance of Universal Being, spontaneously directing these two men into their diametrically opposit modes of aspecting that inner and occult sphere of Being which they hav erroneously concurred in denominating the Unknowable, or the Unknown; for it is, as we shall see, neither; but merely that department of universal things which is known after another sort; and only less clearly perceived, cognized, articulated, classified, and defined, than the overt or phenomenal sphere of existence; and they hav therefore only to bow across the line which separates their positions, consider their honor as satisfied, and be the best of friends ever after.

The normal type of conception under which we habitually idealize the Universe, is that of a globe or sphere, or rather of two spheres, adjusted to each other as above described—all our speculativ, mental, and moral ideas being derived, by metaphor, from material forms and objects. Every globe is, in fact, as to its prime division, these two spheres co-apted as one—as inner and outer. Everything, in the universe of things, is unconsciously construed by us as having a Within and a Without, a subjectiv and an objectiv presentment; so that our assimilation of the human body with its viscerismus or "inwards-department" and its head-and-trunk walls (its outwards) to these two spheres is far more than a rhetorical illustration. It is a radical, scientific analogy, and equivalent to a logical demonstration for those who understand the newly-discovered Science of Analogy. Still, this point of the two antithetical aspectual presentations of the inner, occult, and substanciv sphere of things is so central, crucial, and important, in all philosophy, that I will not trust it, for ordinary readers, to one illustrativ figure (that of an inner and an outer globe), but will introduce another illustration from the structure of language—a sphere of things which is intimately related to all the domains of thought. But before proceeding to it, let me diverge to remark that Mr. Spencer, dissenting from the negativism of his opponents, in respect to the absolute, commits the error, no less serious for sound philosophy, of going over as unguardedly to the other extreme. He says: "So far from regarding that which transcends phenomena as the 'All-Nothingness,' I regard it as the All-Being. Everywhere I hav spoken of the Unknowable as the Ultimate Reality—the sole existence; all things present to consciousness being but shows of it. Mr. Harrison entirely inverts our relativ positions. As I understand the case, the All-Nothingness is that phenomenal existence in which M. Comte and his disciples profess to dwell—profess, I say, because in their ordinary thoughts they recognize an existence" transcending phenomena just as much as other people do.

This is pure Spinozism, and makes the substanciv sphere of things become the sole real existence; whereas the phenomenal sphere, the "shows" are just as essential, in the absolute, as that which causes the "shows"—which, I suppose, is what St. John means when he says that the logos, the discriminativ principle, not only was with God, but was God. It is an error of transcendental philosophy, this into which Mr. Spencer has fallen, as gross as any which he finds in Hamilton and Mansel; but inverse. There is not any such thing anywhere as the All-Nothingness or the All-Somethingness. Everywhere, and in all spheres, are the affirmativ and negativ elements of Being the occult and the overt, balancing, or partly balancing each other—and the great concrete spheres merely signify the dominance and subdominance of these elements. Let Mr. Spencer, or anyone, fancy himself reduced to a mere sack of entrails, and then, the sack also taken away, and he has, in this destitute situation, a precise, corporeal image of the conceptual Universe as he has sketched it in the above extract. His own allusion, previously quoted, to "the happy dispatch" (hari kari), and to "evisceration" makes this analogy and illustration peculiarly ad hominem. One of the most fundamental formulas of Universology is: The Inexpugnability of Prime Elements; which means the ever-presence of two opposit elementary factors in all spheres of Being.

The relation of the subjectiv Human sphere, the mind, to the objectiv Human sphere the body, or of the Subjectiv and the Objectiv generally, is analogically the same as the relation of the badly named Unknowable to the phenomenal sphere of things at large; and M. Comte far better and more correctly, states the fact when, in propounding his fifteen fundamental laws, he says that there is a greater confusedness or more obscurity, (or as it were, more huddling) between the phenomena of the Subjectiv sphere, which, therefore, needs to be elucidated by a reflex light cast from the study of the Objectiv. And so Mr. Spencer, wiser in his practice than in his theory, treats the world of phenomena as a very real world, while he, on the other side, contrary to his theory, often introduces very essential discriminations into the heart of the Unknowable. One of his disciples, Mr. Chadwick, in the Index, thus states, very prettily, this characteristic of the master: "But these expressions are not representativ of Mr. Spencer's most habitual thought nor of its worthiest implications. The abyss of his Unknowable is not one of total gloom. Some visions of solemn beauty do gleam within it. Some rays of clear light do escape from it. He does not fling us into bottomless negation and leave us there. The conditions which Martineau has insisted on are realized in the completeness of his thought. There is some alternation of light and darkness, of inner silence, and 'a stir of upper air.'"

Let us now recur to the subject of language as a special illustration, in its structure, of the co-existence of a substanciv, occult, and less cognizable factor, and of a morphic, or phenomenal, discriminativ, articulativ, limitary, and more observable and more cognizable factor; and, in this connection, I shall treat of the similar doubleness in the constitution of knowledge itself, and indeed, of all things. In fact, the analysis of knowledge must still, in a degree, somewhat precede that of speech-representation, though the two will go along harmoniously together.

The assumed demonstration that it is impossible to know what Mr. Spencer calls the Unknowable, or that the human mind is incompetent to know certain things, rests on a false understanding of what constitutes knowledge. His definition is only of one-half of the whole field of knowledge, precisely as his "phenomenal sphere of being," the overt world, is only one-half of the total universe, or world—the other half, the so-called Unknowable, being really the occult, or for us less readily knowable sphere. The truer statement is, however, that Mr. Spencer has given to the term knowledge a too limited assignment of meaning. He makes knowledge wholly relativ, and to be merely the mental assignment of any observed phenomenon to a class, a correlating of it with some other knowledge already possessed. His disciple, John Fiske, says that all knowledge is classification. How then can knowledge, or the process of knowing ever begin? What is to be said concerning the first phenomenon, before the mind is charged with any other knowledge, with which to classify, or to which to relate the newly observed fact? Mr. Spencer's definition holds good of co-gnition (knowing with something else), which is relativ knowledge; he assuming all knowledge to be relativ; whereas relativity is only one of two co-operativ elements or factors, of which all knowledge is constituted. The other element or factor is the absolutivity of knowledge, or that which impresses itself upon our minds directly, apart from and prior to all classing or relating whatsoever; or else, as transcending it ulteriorly and elementally.

Every act of knowing (coming to know, Impression) involves the conjunction of these two elements, as precisely as every syllable in speech (Expression) involves a consonant and a sonant (vowel) element, in conjunction. Mr. Spencer's mistake or omission, in the defectiv inclusivness which he gives to the meaning of the term knowledge, is the same in kind, or analogically, as that of the early Hebrew writers, who recognized and wrote only the consonants, omitting the vowels. The phonographers do the same thing, but knowingly; and merely as a convenient device for abbreviation and rapidity. Just, then, as there is a sonant (sounding) and a con-sonant (with-sounding) element of vocal expression, so there is a sensorant (sense-giving) and a con-sensorant (with-or-accompanying sense-giving, or relationizing) element in Mental Impression; which is the fundamental aspect of knowing, knowledge, or the process of coming to know.

The consonant element is the cut-off, the limiting, or finiting, and so the relation-making and relation-marking, element of expression; while the vowel is the unlimited possibility of continuous voice, (not cut-off), and so may be regarded, analogically, as the infinit and eternal element. It is also relativly obscure, or occult, mixed or mushy, substance-like, stuff-like, reality-like, in a word, the contrast, throughout, of the more obtrusiv, rigorous, and definit element, the consonant.

There is, nevertheless, in the vowel sound, by Inexpugnability, a subdominance or minor proportion of limitation, which manifests itself, externally, as modulation (mouth-shaping short of actual cut-off or interruption) and which internally permeates the whole mass, the body of the "klang," or sound, as vibration; and if, with metaphysical acumen, anyone should insist on eliminating all limitation, even this more subtle kind, from vocality (vowel-dom), the result would be that all sound would cease—the ultra-negativ outcome of absolutism, along with Mr. Harrison—and we should hav left either entire silence, or those special silences or rests which intervene between sentences, words, syllables, and sounds, which enter into the make-up of speech; the Nothing being, therefore, after all, as important as the Something in the constitution of things; whether, for instance, as here, of language, or of Universal Being—i. e., we should hav negation or the negativ element of being lingually illustrated. On the other hand, while consonant-sound is, theoretically, mere limitation, cut-off, relation, line, place where realities both meet and go asunder, yet, by Inexpugnability, it is so imbued with vocality, and so borrows a portion of its being from the vowel, that it is only heard, or has any existence as sound, by virtue of such borrowed vocality; while metaphysical or logical consistency which should insist upon eliminating from it everything but its own intrinsic nature, which is line without breadth or thickness, would carry it into absolute nothingness. This is what happens, analogically, and ontologically, when it is affirmed, as by Spinoza, that "all limitation is negation"—although this may be understood in another sense, in which it is practically true; namely, that the limitation is the negation (or hindrance) of the (further) extension of that which is limited—i. e., in this case, merely that the consonant is the limitation of the otherwise perpetually continuing vowel sound.

But, apart from these more metaphysically transcendental possibilities and liabilities, the vowel sound remains substantially the type (in language) of Reality, with only enough of limitation involved to secure its existence; and the consonant the type of Limitation, with only so much of reality as to cause its sonancy; or make it heard, at all.

Hence, 1. In Vowel-dom we hav the illustration of Reality; 2. In Consonant-dom we hav that of Limitation, and 3. In Silence, or the Silences, which intervene, we hav that of Negation—and these three are Kant's three Fundamental Categories of the Understanding, or of our Knowing faculty. Thus we are conducted back to the realm of knowledge, and must seek there, for the same three Categories; only two of which Mr. Spencer has recognized at all, and only one of which he has included under the name of knowledge. These three are: 1. Sensorance (Sensation—the substrate, occult, limitless, causal and primitivly forceful element of knowledge); 2. Con-sensorance (Co-gnition,) the articulativ, discriminating, classifying, cor-relating element of knowledge, and 3. Unknowledge (total ignorance, i(n)-gnorance, non-gnorance, not-knowledge—as a whole—or the intervening patches of unsupplied knowledge or lapses of information). Stripped of explanations these are: 1. Reality; 2. Limitation: and, 3. Negation—the Limitation-department being that alone which Mr. Spencer dignifies by the name knowledge.

In the chance-begotten structure of our ordinary languages, the same mistake has been incurred, which has been repeated by Mr. Spencer, with all his acumen, in the philosophical arena. We hav the words con-sciousness and co-gnizance, and the verb co-gnize, for the relativity of knowing; but we hav failed to form and retain the more radical bases, sciousness, gnizance, and gnize, for the absolutivity of knowing; although we hav borrowed the Greek gnosis, which has been used by philosophers in that sense. It can hardly be imputed to Mr. Spencer, or any other thinker, as a marked personal defect, that he has not been able to transcend the limits imposed on him by the imperfection of our extant languages. It is only by the deeper analogy of the absolute structure of language only of late discovered, as a mirror of the working of elementary principles, that any one could be liberated from the trammels of those disguises of the nature of thought which result from lingual deficiency. Mr. Spencer, indeed, and every other great thinker appeals often and confidently to analogy; but neither he nor anyone else has understood analogy well enough to secure anything like absolute success in the use of it. A great discovery had to be awaited. No subject becomes scientifically understood, in any adequate degree, until it is studied for its own sake, and on its own ground, as a subject of scientific investigation; and not merely as auxiliary to something else. For example, language, as to its etymology and glottological laws, was studied, incidentally, as the helper of literature, many hundred years without developing any proper science of language. It was only, when, less than a century ago, a group of German students entered ex professo upon the study of the structure and glottal laws of language, that the great modern science of Philology or Glottology was developed. And so, now, it is only for the first time, among a similar group of students, expressly concerning themselvs with analogy itself, in the bosom of the Universological School, here in America, that the great new, and in a great sense, fundamental science of Analogic has been developed.

We hav been treating, hitherto, of the elementismus of language (phonetics, sounds). This is what in language corresponds to Metaphysics altogether. The elaborismus of language carries us up to the realm of Grammar, which corresponds with Physics. None of the philosophers, dealing with the world at large, hav ever made this great leading discrimination properly; nor could they hav done so without the aid of this analogy of language. Without it, our sub-analogies are liable to become very mixed. So the vowels, denoting reality, denote Force also, in a deep, metaphysical sense; the force upholding all things; but more generally, Mr. Spencer, in speaking of force, means physical, mechanical force, the lingual analog of which is up in the grammatical domain, in respect to language; and especially concerns the Nominativ (the activ agent, subject, cause) and the Verb (process, transition, the transitiv procedure to the objectiv, etc.). To persue this train of analogical illustration would take us too far afield. Let us adhere to the vowels and consonants.

The reality which vowel-dom represents, when the same idea is transferred to the human body, constitutes and includes the flesh-and-bone-mass, composed of their molecular and atomic constituents; and then the limitation, which consonant-dom represents, consists of the joints or jointings of the body-mass, with a special implication of the bones or skeleton, the "anatomy" as closely allied with the joints. The phonographers call their words written without vowels (the consonants alone), skeleton words. The consonants are habitually know as "articulations," and the joints are also called articulations (little jointings). Both consonants and joints are the relating, inter-ligating (intellect-like, as in co-gnition), or tying-together department of the things which they concern.

Here Mr. Spencer, taking cognition for the whole of knowledge, and holding the whole of the phenomenal world to be relativity (articulation), commits the absurdity, by the analogies, hardly less ludicrous than that of the sack of entrails for the absolute, of making the whole phenomenal world equal merely to the joints of the human or animal body, with a mere suggestion of the bones—better, if the caricaturist could effect the illustration—to leave the bones out altogether, and picture the joints alone, unaccompanied and unadorned by anything else whatsoever. This would surpass the realization of Sidney Smith's aspiration, of a hot day, to take off his flesh and sit in his bones.

So, recurring to thought and knowledge—sensation, consciousness, direct knowledge, gnilion as contrasted with cognition, is that which coincides with vowel-dom in speech, and flesh-mass in the human or animal body; and co-gnition (knowledge proper—Spencer) is that which coincides, analogically, with the joints or articulations, and the consonants; in the physical embodiment, and in speech. As I hav said, Mr. Spencer includes only cognition under his definition of knowledge; still it is frankly conceded that he is not so much under criticism here, in this regard, on the ground of his real idea, as on that of his verbal modes of expression. He abundantly admits and affirms, on various and all occasions, that consciousness is our basis of all thought and certainty, and the most sure of all our assurances, while yet he denies to it the name of knowledge properly so called; but can any better title be conceived of to the name of knowledge than the utmost degree of mental certainty? The very word (con-)sciousness is from the Latin scio, 'I know.' Degrading the word knowledge to synonymy with cognition, he feels the necessity of a struggle with the difficulty of not having any generic term for all kinds of mental certainty. Knowledge is rightly generic, and gnition and cognition, or gnosis and co-gnosis, the specialties. No author has properly the right to make a necessary generic term specific, while leaving us thereby destitute of any fitting generic expression.

If the ground were untrodden, the following would be the proper etymological distribution of the words here appropriately involved:

Gnosis or Knowledge.
3. Co-gnosis; secondary knowledge, in relation to other knowledge.
2. Ag-gnosis (for ad-gnosis); direct knowledge, whether sensational, or higher insight.
1. A-gnosis, not knowledge; i(n)-gnorance.

But there are two practical objections to this arrangement. The first is that with our slovenly English habits of pronunciation, a-gnosis and ag-nosis would be pronounced exactly alike. The other is that the Greek word gnosis has acquired a well-understood asignment with philosophers to the specialty of a kind of direct knowledge. For this reason the following arrangement is preferable.

Knowledge
3. Cognosis, or Cognition, indirect or relativ knowledge.
2. Gnosis, direct or absolute knowledge.
1. Agnosis, not knowledge.

The effect of the imperfection of Mr. Spencer's classification is that it throws him, in popular estimate, upon that negativ and phenomenal side of Agnosticism where he persistently refuses to be placed.

Mr. Harrison says: "Why an Energy? The Unknowable may certainly consist of more than one energy." Mr. Harrison does not insist; but this is a very pregnant inquiry. There is present, in every individual occurrence, in the whole universe of occurrences, that which coincides, by analogy, with my self-hood when conscious of willing to act, and acting, in consequence; and which coincides, in the same manner, with the Substantiv or Pronoun in the Nominativ Case to the Verb. There is no more any one corporeal-real, universal force, permeating Nature, and producing all effects than there is one universal consciousness in humanity—which Mr. Spencer affirms there is not—or one universal Nominativ Case in Grammar, governing all instances of verb action, and filling the entire grammatical field. I say wittingly "no more," for I shall come back subsequently upon the question whether there is a soul of reality differing from the corporeal-real, in such illustrativ instances.

The corporeal-real element, in any action, the body of the action, coincides with matter. There is, then, force, the exertiv element which we recognize as present in every transaction or occurrence, that which coincides with our own experience of the exertivness which occurs in us when we act. But these instances of individual exertivness are all single or separate instances, not made confluent or blended—except by us ideally in a distinct act of mental generalization, which in so far as either Mr. Harrison or Mr. Spencer knows, or would admit, has no objectiv substantiality whatever. Neither of them is authorized to predicate any ideal confluence or unity of things, persons (consciousnesses), or acts, and then endow it with corporeal energy. Yet Mr. Spencer does this, concerning the cosmical forces, Mr. Harrison dissenting; and Mr. Harrison does it concerning the social individual consciousnesses, Mr. Spencer dissenting. If either of them ever gains authority to do so, they must borrow it from their spiritist neighbors—A. Wilford Hall, for example, with his doctrin of Spiritual Substantialism—some other element of being, which has not yet been introduced into this discussion by any of us. Upon their own ground, as mere positiv scientists, they are forever precluded from assuming any collectiv unity of acts in the Universe, or of consciousnesses in Humanity—which, nevertheless they mutually assert, or deny, in these different but coincident cases, as suits, arbitrarily, their different views.

Mr. Spencer must, at the least, either become atheistical to his newly discovered God-principle in Nature, a sort of vital principle in the Universe, or he must yield the point to the Comtists that there is a common consciousness for Humanity; and Mr. Harrison must abandon the idea of a unitary soul for Humanity, or yield to Mr. Spencer his demand for the recognition of a universal soul.

The confluent unity, antagonizing the divergent variety, is the same principle, in both cases. It is fundamental with Universology that there is always and in everything a confluent unity co-operativ with an antagonistic individual diversity in the constitution of the higher or integral unity—the Unism, the Duism, and the Trinism—as the inevitable and invariable constituents of Universal Being. Universology, therefore, decides with Mr. Spencer, as against the implication of Mr. Harrison's question, that there is indubitably, a unitary effectiv potency permeating all Nature, as well as an infinity of individual instances of force; and decides with the Comtists against Mr. Spencer that there is, and must be, a collectiv consciousness in Humanity as well as individual consciousnesses; whether we are as yet fully awake to the experiential perception of it or not.

The second difference between Mr. Harrison and Mr. Spencer to be noticed, which, however, has been alluded to, and which is a branch of what has been considered, is that which is expressed by Mr. Spencer in these words: "In pursuance of this view the Comtean system limits itself to phenomena and deliberately ignores the existence of anything implied by the phenomena"—implying, on his part, that the Spencerian System, as he elsewhere affirms, penetrates to the heart of things, and looks out from within. Availing ourselvs of the humano-corporeal analogy now established (the human body type) we can exactly illustrate what Mr. Spencer is here intending to say. While claiming that he and his system reside, as we hav seen, in the entrails of universal things, the vital center, he charges that Comte, Harrison, and the others of that school, inhabit the outer walls, or rather the face of those walls, where posters and advertisments are usually exhibited—the place of "shows." Charles Fourier said long ago, of Frenchmen, his fellow-countrymen, that they dwelled in the skin of the Grand Man, and nobody understood him; but Comte was a Frenchman, and by the aid of Mr. Spencer's symbolism the matter begins to become intelligible. But we must giv to this outerness a broader inclusion than the mere skin. It means the bony framework, joints, and flesh annexed, skin, traits, or features, wrinkles, and all of the discriminativ, limitary elaboration of the body, as contrasted with the semi-formless splanchnic region within. What then shall we say of Mr. Harrison, who repudiates formality, formulæ, theology, and the like, in trying to get at the working basis of reality for his religion? Why, that he is quarreling with his own bones, as a partisan of the more vital muscles. But a muscular religion alone is not adequate. Both parties must learn that they must coalesce and embrace "the whole animal;" if they would attain to that Integralism which is indispensable to completeness.

The third great difference pronounced between the two contestants in this notable controversy is, that Mr. Harrison holds Humanity to be worshipful, and Mr. Spencer holds quite otherwise. I shall make but slight comment on this point, especially as I seem to previse, that it is here that Mr. Harrison will exhibit his brilliant power of repartee and logical eloquence in reply; a power of which he is the pre-eminent master; and I hav no wish to attempt to anticipate him in a field so remarkably his own. I shall merely observe that Mr. Spencer might as well advert to the epithelial scales upon the surface of the human body, to prove the individual man to be a scaly or a scabby fellow, as to cite the short-commings of the Humanity of the past to belittle the divine personality of the race, uprising from age to age toward its transcendent destiny, at the head-ship of the concrete universe. Man, as a race, he says, has no concrete consciousness; which means only that he is not yet conscious of any such consciousness; or rather that he is not conscious of being conscious of any such consciousness; but, as he says of the Positivists, on another point, he thinks and knows like other men; and every instance of sympathy between any two is an instance of race-consciousness. And all sympathy is Altruism, and Altruism is to be the dominant of the practical religion of the future, precisely as the great child-soul of Comte—I think he knew as little of the world, of real men, as an infant—intended to affirm. I shall advert again to this question of race-consciousness.

The fourth and last and paramount great difference to which I shall now call attention, between these contestants, is, that Mr. Harrison, following Comte, propounds and defends the Religion of Humanity; while Mr. Spencer defends the thesis that the gist of religion is in the comprehension and worshipful regard for the "Infinit and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed." This is again, by the symbolism now established, the grand final issue, now directly made up, between the Vital Force of the Universe, dwelling at the Inmost, and working outwardly, on the side of Mr. Spencer, and that muscular effectivness and comprehensiv practical energy, residing in the outer walls, limbs, and features, and manifesting itself in positiv work, which is demanded by Mr. Harrison. It takes but a glance of the eye of an Integralist to see that both are alike requisit and indispensable parts of the totality of the social synthesis.

Mr. Harrison has predicated, indeed, both necessities in these striking words: "The religion of man, in the vast cycles that are to come, will be reverence for Humanity as supported by nature." Mr. Spencer, on the other hand, unhesitatingly admits all of the anthropic attributes of religion affirmed by Mr. Harrison; indeed, affirms that the Infinit and Eternal Energy culminates, in manifestation, in the intelligence and feelings of man. The road ought, then, to be a short one which will reconcile them—by the universological method. They need only perceive that they are looking through the telescope from different ends; and that, in other words, their difference is only in emphasis—which may readily be so changed as will suit the purpose at the time intended.

But in the mean time the war rages. Explanations and rectifications are still to be made. Revision of statements made by each party will hav to be considered. And, firstly, let me say that Mr. Harrison's contrast, so insistently put by him between Religion and Theology, will not hold good. Theology is a definit and essential part of religion. It is the skeletonic framework of ideas which upholds the whole fabric. This whole discussion is theological. One of the prime questions of Theology is to determin what is the true religion; and this is just that which we are trying to do. A religion without theology is navigation without a chart; an army without a science of tactics; music without a Thorough Bass; a great edifice without an architecture; a molluscous animal body without a skeleton; a soft mush of fleshy parts without backbone, scapulæ, cranium, or phalanges. Here, again, Mr. Harrison is quarreling with his own bones, joints, outlines, traits, features, and wrinkles, in the behalf of the mere flesh mass, without any such limiting element; with form, in a word, as against substance or stuff.

The solution here is, that: There are three fundamental factors in the human constitution, individual, or collectiv: 1. Sentiment, 2. Intelligence, and 3. Activity. This is Comte's own doctrin and precise terms; drawn from the metaphysicians, but adapted to the social sphere, and made practical by him. There are, then—and this is universological—and especially, there are to be, three corresponding grand Institutions in Society: 1. Religion, 2. The University-State (lawdom), and 3. The Business World—the Heart, the Head, and the Hand of the Social Synthesis or Grand Man.

All of the three social factors are equally in and through all the three social institutions. Religion is dominantly Sentimental, with the two annexes of activity (worship, life, and conduct) and intelligence; which in this sphere is Theology. The University-state (school and legislature) is dominantly Intelligence, with the two annexes, activity (study and regulation) and sentiment (love of learning); and Business is dominantly Activity, with the two annexes, sentiment (love of wealth) and business-intelligence; or thus:

1. Religion equals Sentiment plus Activity, plus Intelligence.

2. University-State equals Intelligence plus Activity, plus Sentiment.

3. Business-World equals Activity plus Sentiment, plus Intelligence.

The symbolism here is, in full canonicals, this: The female body, with its soft lusciousness, is the type of religion—with heart, head, and hand of its own. The male body, with its angular hardihood and severity of outline, is the type of the University-State; and the Youth (or "Junker") body, male or female, is the type of the Business World, or Activity. But if the whole were to be represented in a single body—for which the female body is preferable—then the trunk, centered and represented by the heart, and especially the lap and bosom ("the bosom of the Church"), symbolizes Religion; the head symbolizes the University-State; and the limbs symbolize Business Activity.

For those who hav conceived a prejudice against religion, on account of its perversion and wickedness, it is well to show the fact that each of the great social factors, with its accompanying institution, has, in addition to its normal development, an inverse and repulsiv presentment, as its foil or back-ground; and that religion is no way different, in that respect, from the others, except in the sense in which we are more shocked at the degradation of women, and that woman, when bad, has the genius of being worse then man. The following tabulation will show this important point clearly:

I. Sentiment.	1. Normal—Love, devotion, goodness.
	2. Inverted—Hate, persecution, badness.
II. Intelligence.	1. Normal—Wisdom, impartiality, justice; the true and the right.
	2. Inverted—Folly, cheating, injustice.
III. Activity.	1. Normal—Generous, Progressiv Enterprise, beneficence, voluntary, self-taxation in behalf of the good and true.
	2. Inverted—Business Greed, invasiv conquest, grab game; hunkerish withholding; and obstinate reaction and conservatism.

In the final grand shock of the encounter between these two contestants, it is Mr. Spencer who draws the first blood. On the relativ priority of Ghost-religion and Nature-worship or Fetichism, he has, I should say, on this cursory diagnosis, too effectivly winged his antagonist for any promis of a healthy recovery. Mr. Harrison, following confidingly Comte, who never investigated, but only thought, was badly grounded in particulars; while Mr. Spencer is, doubtless, the best furnished with facts on these subjects of any man living.

In the second bout, on the worshipfulness of humanity, I judge Mr. Spencer's triumph will prove to hav been more apparent than real, and will turn into a defeat, as I hav indicated.

In the third bout, in Mr. Spencer's attack on the Comtean doctrin and polity, he is more successful; but not wholly so. He scatters his strength in random blows, and attacks in piecemeal, instead of striking at centers, or showing up, for once and all, the intrinsic defect of the Comtean philosophy.

The final criticism on Comte, in this respect, remains, therefore, still to be made; or remains rather uncompleted by Spencer than exhaustivly accomplished. It is, in a few words, somewhat after this order:

Comte undoubtedly missed, entirely, of any right understanding of the dawning spirit of the new civilization. He was never born into the idea, never penetrated with the radical conception of Individuality. He was essentially medieval. He looked for every thing to unity, organization, and competent authority. He, therefore, mistook the developing genius of this age, and failed to comprehend the drift and "place in Nature" of the really leading nations and peoples of the world, and their progress along the lines of more and more independence of the individual, more and more self-assurance, and more and more contempt for the arbitrary prescriptions of leaders and saints. He never attained to any adequate notion of the meaning of Protestantism, or Republicanism, or Socialism, the three great rising, commanding, and leading forces in the world—the growing end of the huge vine of human progression. He only knew them as inversions of the true order of progress, to be clipped and overcome by the spirit of Catholicism.

Comte was bred a Catholic and remained imbued with that character during his lifetime; and Catholicism is a religion for the world's infancy, or non-age; and not for adult men and women; save that, by the universological principle of Terminal Conversion into Opposits, or, more especially, by the Antithetical Repetition of the Lowest in the Highest, it will be a legitimate tendency of the adult world, as it gets through the first wild period of the enjoyment of its new-found freedom, to revert to somewhat more of the gentleness of its childhood. But that must be superimposed upon the achieved and established habits of a fully developed individuality; and not be incompatible with them. Comte, with no understanding of these facts or laws, resorted, as Mr. Spencer has so abundantly exhibited in illustrativ instances, to a child-method of ruling child-like men; or to the almost insane supposition of the possibility of prescribing the dictates of his personality, judgment, and will, as the rule of action of coming generations; a method out of all harmony with the time, and with any times which are likely to come again on this planet. With all his greatness as a comprehensiv agglomerativ conceptualist, which was really immense, and with an ambition nearly large enough to compass the world, Comte was a child-man, in the presence of the immensely expansiv and progressiv social forces which are rapidly developing themselvs in the world: and chiefly through those very causes of growth which he recoiled from, through his conservativ instincts, organization, and surroundings.

On the other hand, Mr. Spencer, who is eminently in accord with, and pre-eminently a representativ man, almost the representativ man of the reigning social spirit and intellectual manly hardihood of the day, is hardly more satisfactory than Comte, when judged from the universological standing-ground of criticism, or measured by the requirements of integral human development, as conceived of by us; the fanatics of the new order of sociological ideas. What seems to us his undue confidence in the sufficiently satisfying results of the mere free fight between strong people and weak people, in a general melee, under the unmodified action of natural forces, belongs, we think, to the hobbedehoy period, the crude boyhood of the development of the race; which ought soon to begin to giv way to the sweeter culture of refined man and woman. We accept Comte's grand coupling of the Invariability of Law with the Modifiability of Phenomena by Human Intervention. It is the flower of the old Theology that it givs to man the high dignity of being a co-worker together with God, a partner in the concern, instead of a mere lackey. Spencer seems to us hardly to assign to us any such partnership with Nature. He has nothing very specific to suggest for men to do. He is the philosopher minus the reformer; while Comte evokes our sympathy by being the reformer plus the philosopher—all his philosophy being intended merely as a basis for a wiser and more energetic human activity. And so Mr. Harrison always inspires us with a high purpose; when, even, we do not see our way to accept all his theories and methods.

These reflections conduct me back to Mr. Spencer's denial of a common consciousness in humanity.

He says: "It will doubtless seem a paradox to say that human evolution, with all its marvels, is to be credited neither to humanity as an aggregate, nor to its component individuals; but the paradox will not be difficult to justify: especially if we set out with some analogies. An apt one is supplied by that 'thing of beauty'—the Euplectella, or 'Venus's flower-basket,' now not uncommon as a drawing-room ornament. This fragil piece of animal architecture is not a product of any conscious creature, or of any combination of conscious creatures. It is the framework unknowingly elaborated by innumerable ciliated monads—each a simple nucleated cell, with a whip-like appendage, which serves, by its waving movements, to aid the drawing in and sending out of sea-water, from which nutritiv matter is obtained; and it is simply by the proclivities which these monads hav toward certain modes of growth and secretion, that they form, without the consciousness of any one, or of all, this complicated city they inhabit." And so of the coral animals; and so, says Mr. Spencer, of the co-operativ activities of man. Let us call this low, mechanical form of unthoughted concert of action, for the sake of a technicality, Natural, or Mechanical, or the lower variety or sort of Euplectellism—Basso-euplectellism; and then I shall be understood when I allege that there is another, a specially human, or Spiritual higher style of Euplectellism—Alto-euplectellism—latent in humanity; and ready, at any moment, to spring into dominant activity. The combination of these two may be called Co-euplectellism.

Let us, then, take another, and, in its lower stage, a parallel analogy with that here adduced by Mr. Spencer. Suppose a comic actor, who, by his quips and facial grimaces and funny ways, has completely fixed the attentiv interest of every individual spectator in the house; and that a ripple of intense jollity is moving the mind of every one of them; but each individual is attending directly and absorbedly to the actor, and is wholly unconscious that everybody around him, the houseful of other individuals, is thinking, feeling, and acting precisely as he is. This is Basso-euplectellism; or exactly repeats what Mr. Spencer has illustrated by his analogy. But, then, by a sudden impulse, some one casts a side-glance, in the midst of his own rollick, at a friend or a stranger in a neighboring seat; the glance is reciprocated, and each is struck at the same instant with the fact that the other is stirred in the same way as himself. The fun is hightened by the mutuality of the recognition. Presently they glance at others; and others at them. A common consciousness (Alto-euplectellism) bursts into being, of the utter comicality of the situation, carried to its utmost hight by that very consciousness. They laugh at each other, and with each other, and are overwhelmed and penetrated all through by the inner sense that everybody is engaged in enjoying the same fun.

What is it which has passed from one to another in that momentary glance of intelligence, and which, literally, "in the twinkling of an eye," has converted a merely mechanical concert of unconscious acts into an uncontrollable gush of conscious and sympathetic emotion?

Ask A. Wilford Hall, with his doctrin of Spiritual Substantialism! If the merely "mechanical-causal" theorists, Buechner and Haeckel for instance, should catch a glimps of this superior manifestation of mind-force, they would enter upon a higher phase of scientific development, which is as yet terra incognita for them. There are some noble souls already, in the world, who are, at least partially, awake to this common consciousness of mankind. If a score or even a less number of Frederic Harrisons existed, and if they chanced to look each other's way, they might perhaps be the first in the theater to rouse the grand eclat of the world's new birth into hilarious happiness; and of the dispersion of the gloom and spiritual deadness of the past.

It will be the supreme effort of Pantarchism, glimpsed at by Ward, to lift all mankind suddenly, by a concert of influences, reaching from the lowest material to the highest spiritual sources, into this Collectiv Consciousness of the Race—demonstrating to all minds their Unity of Interests; and what may be called the Solidarity of their Common Destiny.

Comte uses the terms spiritual and material as freely as any churchman, but in a sense quite peculiar to himself. Spiritual, with him, relates to humanity as a higher sphere of Nature than the Cosmical; and he calls the tendency of the lower cosmical sciences to encroach on the higher spheres of science—that, with Buechner, for instance, to trace all Vital phenomena to Chemism and Mechanism—"the materialization of the sciences;" and the counter-tendency—to anthropomorphize, or anthrophize (man-form-ize or man-ize), all the forces and forms of lower Nature—"the spiritualization of the sciences." Ward, following Comte, contrasts habitually Nature—meaning lower Nature—and Man, as a superior Nature, or department of Nature; so that some modification of super-naturalism, some intrusion of a Dualism counterparting the Monism, seems inevitable; and the spiritual sphere of things is to be, in some form or other, sufficiently distinct to claim some appropriate technical recognition in philosophy. So, Mr. Spencer says, "Now on page 9 of the essay Mr. Harrison criticises, there occurs the sentence—'The final outcome of that speculation commenced by the primitiv man, is that the Power manifested throughout the Universe distinguished as material, is the same power which in ourselvs wells up under the form of consciousness;' and on page 11 it is said that this necessity we are under, to think of the external energy in terms of the internal energy, givs rather a spiritualistic than a materialistic aspect to the Universe." Spencer educes his spiritualism from the lower cosmical sphere, sweeping up through the whole scale, while Comte and Harrison recognize Humanity, above Nature, as the peculiarly spiritual domain, basing it, nevertheless, on Nature; the Great Being, in the terms of Comte, upon the Great Fetich. Spencer merely puts the emphasis on the Infinit and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed, and Harrison on Humanity.

Surely, then, these two doctrins ought not to be difficult of reconciliation. Both, in their conjunction and mutual necessity to each other, were intuited and adumbrated in that sublimest dogmatic utterance ever addressed to human acceptance: "Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and thy neighbor as thyself."

In the first branch of this wonderful epitome of religious duty, there is the recognition and paramount assumption of Mr. Spencer's Infinit and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed, and in the second branch the full and extreme assertion of Altruism, preceding Comte and the religious positivism founded on it. What science and the new forms of philosophy do is to rally the intellect to the clear understanding of these fundamental principles; and to eliminate mystery; except the ultimate mystery of being itself; and that excessiv veneration which, converted into sanctimony, superstition, and priestly assumption, has "dealt damnation round the land," and cursed the world with bigotry and hate, in the place of love.

But the principles remain forever true, and will reconstitute religion in harmony with science, philosophy, and practical life.

It may be assumed with confidence that there has never been a deep intuitiv perception of the race which the Supreme Science will not ultimately recognize as true, and confirm; so that High Science has within it the power of reconciliation altogether beyond the diverse schools of philosophy, and extending to every religious dogma of all time. The New Catholic Church of the Future will hav in it as many colors as Joseph's coat; as many mansions as there are in "my father's house;" or as many aspects as the infinit variety of universal things.

First and chiefly, Atheism, Theism, Pantheism, and Agnosticism will be reconciled as merely different aspectual statements of a truth which is too immense and too various to be formulated by any single utterance, and all other and minor instances of reconciliation will follow in their due order.

Pantarchism, in this regard, is the installation of the Fourieristic principle of Alto-euplectellism, or High Harmonic Attraction or charm, as paramount over, but integrating, the Spencerian principle of a scattering and wasteful laissez-faire or go-as-you-please, and the still farther back, more retrogressiv, Comtean principle of tradition, prescription, and personal authority—of a Guided Spontaneity, predominantly replacing a helter-skelter, chaotic free competition, on the one hand, and an enforced or compulsiv system of order on the other hand.

In conclusion, one word on the chief defect, had in common by the two systems of Sciento-philosophy which hav here been especially reviewed—the Comtean and the Spencerian—in respect to the social sphere. Neither of them has the slightest intimation or conception of any law of Commercial and Social Equity. They make no appeal to the god of Equation—which may, after all, hav something to do with the "Religion of the Equator." In this vital element of individual justice the American backwoodsman, Josiah Warren, is yet to become the re-founder of both systems, and the means of rendering them, in the supreme sense, truly sociological.

Freethought Propaganda.

"They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick" (Matt. ix, 12).

This is a remarkable passage of scripture. Unlike most other passages, it is true and teaches a useful lesson. It is wise to rescue the few pearls that may be found in the Bible from the rubbish by which they are surrounded. It is profitable to apply all sound doctrin to the helping onward of our own cause.

Our object is the advancement of the human race. It is to do good to our fellow-men. The greatest benefit we can confer upon them is to heal those who are incapacitated by sickness from taking part in the great struggle of life. It is by mental rather than by physical energy that the greatest works are accomplished. The thinkers and workers labor together for the common advantage, but the success of their mutual efforts depends more upon the former. If the thinkers think rightly, their influence prevents the workers from acting wrongly. Therefore it is a nobler and more important task to "minister to a mind diseased" than to giv sight to the blind or hearing to the deaf.

The worst evil that can afflict the intellect of man is religious belief of any kind. Deluding him with visions of an uncertain hereafter, it causes him to neglect the realities of his present condition. Confining his affections within the narrow bounds of his own little sect, it excludes from his heart that real charity which the spirit of humanity would otherwise encourage and develop. Fixing his attention on the silly fables which constitute its foundation, it keeps him in ignorance of facts, a knowledge of which is essential to his progress and happiness. The unbeliever possessed of mental health and strength is a whole man. The believer, in the truest sense of the word, is sick, for his brain, fed upon fancies and falsehoods, is incapable of assimilating solid truths.

This brings forcibly home to us a duty which too many are apt to forget. Although they hav ceased to hav any belief in religion themselvs, they appear to consider it a trifling matter that others should continue to believe. They know that the doctrins of Christianity are false, but do not fully realize that they are evil. Experience has taught them that its moral system does not make men better, but they do not clearly see that its tendency is to make them worse. Thus they rest satisfied with the freedom which they hav themselvs obtained, and make no attempt to emancipate their fellows. They hav not yet become humanized. That dark spirit of Christian selfishness which once led them to expect happiness in heaven, with the larger half of mankind in hell, has left its unholy mark in their hearts. The pure rays of human sympathy hav not yet penetrated through and dispelled the dark cloud.

It is no argument to say that some Christians are good men and women. We all know such and appreciate their virtues. We only regret that they are not better, which they all might be had not religious training caused them to substitute a false for a true motiv. The good man does good for its own sake, and not for the sake of himself or any god of his own imagination. He regards all living beings as objects equally entitled to his benevolence. This is the spirit of real goodness which all religions tend to extinguish in the heart.

Our plain duty is not to hide our light under a bushel. When Christianity is extinct, and not till then, the pulse of humanity will beat healthfully, and pure blood flow freely through the veins of the community. The man who, satisfied with his own cure, does not make known to others the danger of the disease, and point out the remedy, may be an honest unbeliever, but is a most illiberal Liberal. Let those who are now whole remember the sick who hav need of the physician. The sick are the children whose minds are poisoned with Bible and hymn-book. Purge the schools of the loathsome infection, and send the physician with the wholesome medicin of human science. They are the criminals and paupers taught to continue in crime and poverty by state-paid chaplains. Stop the chaplains' pay, and turn them out to earn an honest living. They are the church-going population, whose eyes are blinded by the parsons till they see men as trees walking, and fail to distinguish cruelty and abomination from justice and holiness. Send among them the physician, that the light of reason may dispel the darkness of faith.

Let Freethinkers awake to the fact that Christianity is a foul pestilence which infects the air we all hav to breathe. We hav before us a missionary duty. When we find the disease we must apply the remedy. But we must not do this work in the spirit of the churches. Fire, sword, and persecution hav ever been their weapons, for their cause is allied to tyranny. Gentleness, moderation, reason, are ours, for we are on the side of humanity, equality, and liberty. By disseminating among them Freethought literature; by bringing to their doors Freethought lectures and discussions, we must introduce and encourage doubt in their minds. Faith is essential to revealed religion. The moment they begin to question—to try and square their doctrins with their natural ideas of right and wrong—they are acting upon human principles and throwing revelation overboard. Those who receive the Bible as God's word, believe all the infamous tales recorded in the Old Testament. Their notions of right and wrong, cruelty and mercy, freedom and tyranny, are distorted. When they admit that some of the vile actions recorded of the divinity cannot be true because they are inconsistent with his goodness, their human virtue is getting the better of their religious faith. When they perceive that no being so wicked as the Bible God ever existed, humanity has wrought the cure, and faith is banished.

Funeral of Mrs. Lizzie Palmer,

WIFE OF CHARLES E. PALMER, AT SOUND BEACH, CONN.

Mrs. Lizzie Palmer, aged thirty-four years, died on Monday morning, August 18th, of malignant typhoid fever. Her death was a sudden and severe affliction to her husband and many friends. But she dies with blessed memory, and her last words were those of comfort, reconcilation, and promis. She was the daughter of Frederick Wilson, one of the old stanch Liberals of New England. Through her influence and that of her father, her husband finally came from the orthodoxy of his birth into the light of Liberalism. Mr. Palmer and his family are among the most respected inhabitants of Sound Beach, and almost all of them are advanced thinkers. Charles Palmer has ever been courageous in the expression of his views, and no doubt has deeply disturbed the minds of his Christian neighbors; but his life has been a noble vindication of the value of his principles. His wife, the deceased, was one whose life was ever sweet with service, with purity, and with joy born of the duties of this world. Her faith was founded in science, and she lived the life of reason and humanity. The services were held in the Congregational church, and it was filled to the utmost by those who came to mourn the loss of a wife, a mother, a friend and neighbor. The services were conducted by Samuel P. Putnam, of New York.

The following is the substance of his address:

We cannot penetrate the veil of death. We confess our ignorance. No priest and no church can giv us one gleam of light. This, however, we know, if our friend livs she livs in a world as beautiful as this, where the same laws guide and the same justice prevails, where the same reward is given to virtue and the same luster to the pure and noble character.

Thus with hope and courage we meet the inevitable. Let us obey the lesson of the earnest life which has now passed into the invisible. Would she not tell us to turn from the decaying flesh to the immortal purpose by which it was animated? Would she not point to the grandeur of the truth and bid us to liv according to the simple truth? She has passed forth into the immortality of the race. Her individual life has surrendered itself to the life of all. She is now of the "choir invisible whose music is the gladness of the world." A dear wife, a noble mother, a true friend, a faithful woman, a brave thinker, a sincere worker, we crown her as we would crown a queen, with all the loveliness of that nature in which she so firmly believed. We crown her with the flowers and stars, symbols of that eternal beauty which cannot pass away.

After the body was lowered into the grave and covered with the sod and flowers, Mr. Putnam said:

We do not say "dust to dust" with the old thought of theology, for the dust is not inert. It is alive. It is the flowing garment of the universal spirit. It is the constant expression of life.

When we sing in the new hope that old-time triumphant hymn, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," we do not mean nearer to some far-off abstraction in the skies. We only mean to what is best in ourselvs. God, if anything, is goodness, truth, beauty, our own highest ideal. Let these great thoughts inspire us and illuminate us out of the heart of nature.

Farewell to thee, thou noble dead! In the chambers of memory thou shalt shine, in the halls of hope thou shalt be be crowned. Blending with all that is beautiful in the natural world, the trees, the flowers, the waters, the tender blue, the eternal stars, thy life shall ever be an impulse in our lives to heroic service for humanity.

Fare thee well, fare thee well! In death and in life we are one; for the universe and humanity are one; and in the sublimity of death we join heart and hand and consecrate ourselvs anew to all that is best in human work and worth.

Editorial Notes.

Discussing the "Church Question in Italy," a writer in a religious journal of a recent date says: "To the impatient observer the religious problems so intimately connected with the church question in Italy seem to indicate the renewal of the struggle in a new phase, namely, that between faith and reason. But he does not take into consideration the peculiar characreristics that distinguish the present struggle from that in former times. As Professor Nippold well observes, there has scarcely ever been an epoch in the history of mankind in which bolder dogmas hav been proposed in the name of religion, and bolder negations expressed in the name of science, than now. On the one side there is the 'infallible' pope, and on the other a phalanx of scientists and philosophers, disagreed as to their theories and hypotheses, but united in their efforts to destroy faith in God and the Bible. In Catholic countries, like Italy, there is a fearful abyss between the fanaticism of papacy and the cold, but not unheeded, negations of science and philosophy. This abyss, bridged over in Protestant countries both by the spiritual life and evangelizing activity of the different religious denominations and a genuinly religious literature, is in Italy only thinly covered by the (ironico-Jesuitical) skepticism of the intelligent classes, and the indifferent stupidity of the ignorant masses."

The saying that one must go from home to get news is exemplified by the following paragraph cut from the London National Reformer:

"In the National Reformer for May 25th (page 362) we quoted from the Christian a story, professing to be taken from a paper called The Truth, of an Infidel young man alleged to hav been struck dead while delivering a blasphemous prayer at a Young Men's Christian Society, date and place not given. It turns out that the paper called The Truth is published at St. Louis, Mo., and is edited by the Rev. J. H. Brookes, who now professes to hav had the information from the Rev. W. Staymaker, Presbyterian minister, Pass Christian, Mississippi, who pretends to hav the story from Dr. T. N. Angin, of Birmingham, Alabama, who is supposed to state that the young man was a Dr. A. T. Jones, of Birmingham, and that the incident happened at Gainsville, Alabama, date not given."

If any of our friends know anything of this case we shall be happy to publish the facts and thus nail another Christian lie. We strongly suspect that it is the story of the Jenkintown, Pa., blasphemer retold, with additions by the clergymen mentioned.

The New York Evening Post makes the following startling admissions as to some of the great men whose virtue has hitherto been supposed to be unassailable: "The standard by which some ministers now propose to exclude Cleveland from high place would hav prevented Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Hamilton—not to go any further—from taking any prominent part in the foundation of the American Republic. It would hav excluded from office in England nearly every great statesman and reformer of the last hundred years, except, perhaps, Romilly, Wilberforce, and Gladstone. It would hav visited nearly every prominent politician in the Republican party since 1860 with popular odium. It would, had the Democrats chosen to apply it, hav defeated one Republican candidate for the presidency by charges worse by far than Cleveland's, in that they added the sin of broken vows to the sin of incontinence." The Post might hav further elaborated its point by mentioning a few biblical heroes by way of comparison.

Mr. Bradlaugh recently lectured in Cardiff, South Wales, to an audience numbering about 2,500. Though probably the majority of the audience differed from the lecturer in his religious sentiments, they all agreed that he was shamefully treated by Parliament. At one of his hits against the prevailing religion of the country, a butcher interrupted him, but was ejected. The dealer in meat returned, and, gaining the platform, attempted to assault Mr. Bradlaugh with a stick. The South Wales Daily News reports that "then the audience witnessed a sight which rejoiced them exceedingly. The herculean form of Mr. Bradlaugh moved out to his opponent, grasped him, and soon he was over the platform, and was for that night effaced." The News adds that "after keeping the meeting enthusiastic for an hour and a quarter, Mr. Bradlaugh ended apparently with an impression created on this audience which will not soon die in the present course of events."

Professor Julius Euting lately took a journey to Arabia to obtain an Aramaic inscription at Teima. He was successful. From the time of Hilkiah, including Shapira and Bryennios, scarcely a religious antiquarian has been known to fail in finding whatever fragment of religious writing he chanced to be in pursuit of. Professor Euting's "discovery" in engraved on a stone. The date of the writing is set back to the eighth century before Christ, contemporary with the book of Job. According to this, the engraving, with the exception of Job, is older than any part of the Bible, and reads something like the one hundred and nineteenth Psalm. It is in order to appoint a committee of distinguished theologians to revise it.

Mr. Charles Watts is expected to arrive in this city Sept. 1st. He will accompany us to Cassadaga Lake, remaining there till the close, and then proceed to Toronto, Ontario. He comes with thirty lectures prepared, as his circular announces, which he is anxious to deliver in any place the Liberals may specify. For terms, etc., address him care of Mr. J. A. Risser, 185 Richmond street, West, Toronto, Ont.

Buckley, of the Christian Advocate, is in Europe. While passing through London he visited the International Health Exhibition, and was "much interested" in the show of bees.

Mithras.

To the kindly questioning of Dr. Lazarus in a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will answer I hav only read extracts from the works of Dupuis and a few other reputed authorities. The only rational ground which I feel that I can take is that the Persian Mithras, like all other gods of the ancient world, was a solar myth, a mere personification of the sun, having had no personal existence, but quite likely identical with the astrological man of that old system of judicial astrology by which the world was evidently in a measure (through a method of priestly interpretation) governed. That he, like many other gods, had a "human legend" is very probable; yet that is no evidence of its truth, especially in view of the fact that about all other mythical characters had a human legend. The more wonderful and impossible a story, the easier it is for a fool to gulp it down. Mankind, or, more properly speaking, the riff-raff, were governed in those olden days as now—through their ignorance.

The very fact that the birth of Mithras has been fixed at almost the exact period of time when the vernal equinox ceased to occur in the old sign of the Bull is very significant of his astronomical birth and character. He is represented on ancient monuments as a beautiful youth clad in flowing raiments, wearing a Phrygian bonnet, and thrusting his sword into the throat of a bull. This settles the astronomical character of Mithras. The time of his birth is fixed 2250 B.C., which, according to modern computation, fixes the period of his pretended birth within 150 years of the time when the Ram became the vernal sign, and the Bull, which for 2,150 years had led the heavenly hosts, was slain. This carries us back also to the Ab-ram-ic age when that old personification of Time saw a ram caught in a thicket, and the Lord told him to use mutton for sacrifice instead of his boy Isaac—the same ram, lamb, sheep, and mutton which finally became the principal factor in our Christian mythology. This zodiacal Bull is identical with the bull Aphis, of Egypt, the Mithraic bull of Persia, the white cow of India, the heifer of Judea, the calf of Samaria, and of Aaron, and the unicorn of Job and David—"unicorn" being a false translation of the word reem (see Webster). The reem was an animal of the ox species, and unquestionably used by the astronomical priests of the more northern nations as the symbolic sign for the month of the vernal cross. "Save me from the lion's mouth, for thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorn" (reem); the ecliptic passing directly between the horns of the reem (or bull), and David being the astrolog of the ancient skies, and no man is necessarily on the horns. "But I am a worm, and no man"—that is, a worm when in the sign of the Scorpion—"and despised of the people," for the reason that the Scorpion was the great sign of evil. See Psalms xxii.

We are told by learned dunces that the ancients knew nothing concerning the recedence of the signs back from the sun, miscalled according to Burrett the "precession of the equinoxes," until the time of Cleostratus, 550 B.C., and that he was the discoverer. Let us see.

"For Israel (the stars) slideth back as a backsliding heifer: now the Lord will feed them as a lamb in a large place" (Hos. iv, 16). Now, if a "backsliding heifer" does not mean the heifer of the zodiac which did slide back, I would like to be informed what a backsliding heifer is.

When the heifer of the zodiac slid back the vernal cross occurred in the 30th degree of the the celestial Ram, or Lamb. "Now the Lord will feed them as a lamb in a large place." It seems to me that symbolic language could hardly be made plainer. No longer bull beef, but mutton, for sacrifices. "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone." Ephraim is a personification of the old sign of the Bull, and no man. The meaning of the word is, "He that brings fruit"—that is, the old fruit-bringing sign, in which the sun performed its "spring's work," but it has gone back, and "the fools who can't see it" are joined to their idols; they are Ephraimites, bullites, heiferites, calfites or cowites, according to the symbol used for Ephraim the fruit-bringer. They stick to beef when, to be in harmony with their god, the sun, they should use mutton for sacrifices.

Again, "Thy calf, O Samaria, hath cast thee off; mine anger is kindled against them; how long will it be ere they attain to innocency?" (Hos. viii, 5). In other words, How long will it be before they learn their calf has slid back, too? And I may as well ask a similar question, How long will it be ere Liberals and Spiritualists will stop their inconsequential speculations and useless wranglings on subjects they can never settle, and turn their attention to the elucidation of this grand old science, and true key to the bottomless pit of all theological bedevilment? Let us guess the mind-destroying old riddle, and experience the pleasure of seeing the Christian sphinx plunge headlong into the dark waves of eternal oblivion. Once more: "Ephraim is as a heifer that is taught and and loveth to tread out the corn, but I passed over upon her fair neck!" God Almighty on the neck of a heifer!—or the sun making its last crossing there before entering the 30th degree of the Lamb—which? Mithras, the person fication of the sun in the old Magian system cutting the throat of the zodiacal Bull, and the Jewish priest, even of the present day, cutting the throat of all animals eaten by his people, and the Freemason (another slave of ignorance) swearing to hav his "throat cut from ear to ear," are all of the same kind of cloth, and no doubt symbolize the cutting of the throat of the zodiacal Bull in the last great sacrifice before the sun entered the sign of the Ram.

All fire-worship was nothing more nor less than sun-worship, and to think of making a distinction between the two would seem to me to be the hight of nonsense.

Sun or fire worship is the most natural, and hence the first. We of to-day unconsciously worship the sun. All animate and inanimate nature worships it. What would the world be without it?

Christ on the cross of Calvary labeled "I. N. R. I." shows him to be a personification of universal nature, as those letters truly signify, being the initials of fire, air, earth, and water (see Taylor's works). In order to be saved we must pass through fire (St. John's Day), be doctored by the Holy Ghost (healing wind or gust), be baptized in the water, and buried in the earth, and raised from the dead. Leave out either one of those elements, and no life could exist on the planet.

I would say to Dr. Lazarus that the best works I hav read on this subject are the Jewish and Christian scriptures, Burrett's "Geography and Atlas of the Heavens," Rebold's "History of Freemasonry in Europe," Robt. Taylor's works, and Dwight's "Grecian and Roman Mythology." But a study of the Bible, with a tolerable knowledge of ancient astronomy and history, is far better than trusting to the deductions of even the best writers on the subject. I hav only read extracts from the works of Dupuis and a few others who are quoted as authority.

The fatal mistake of M. Dupuis was in locating the origin of the twelve signs in Egypt instead of in the temperate zone of the earth, where the greatest intellectual and spiritual development is always found. The civilization of ancient Egypt was an outgrowth of its physical condition, a fertil valley bounded by sandy deserts. It is, no doubt, to the Aryan race that we must look for the true source of the highest and best ancient civilization—for that mighty stream of intellectual and spiritual unfoldment which, flowing from the East toward the West, gave rise to the habit among the more Western nations of looking for the "wise men from the East." It is quite likely we hav in this idea a recognition of the spiritual powers of the Indian Gymnosophists (the naked teachers—"Gynosophist: naked philosopher"—Webster). All men were initiated naked into the mysteries, and so in a symbolic sense they are to-day. These wonderfully endowed men, the Gymnosophists, were the "wise men from the East."

"The terrible scenes of the initiation into the mysteries were well calculated to try the nerves of the most courageous. The Mithraic mysteries were celebrated in subterranean temples, as among the ancient Hindoos, which were called the retreats of Mithra" (Rebold). The necropoli of ancient Egypt, the "quarries," so-called, under the temple of Jerusalem, the vast excavations under ancient Byzantium, and, in fact, the temple crypts of the ancient world, were used for the same purpose. "The aspirants for the privilege of initiation submitted to proofs so terrible that many became insensible." The mysteries were the real colleges where all who proved themselvs worthy and well qualified were admitted and instructed in physical and moral science (for the two were combined), and the fearful scenes to which the candidate was subjected, were well calculated to cultivate true physical and moral courage. Men were tempted by women who were initiates, and who acted their part in the ceremonies, and for the male candidate to yield to their temptation was death to the weakling. This lets in a little light on the Adam and Eve performance. The candidate was fasted forty days with food where he could lay his hand on it. He was tempted with gems of gold and diamonds, yet the first false step showed him unworthy of the divine honors of the apotheosis, wherein he was to be raised to the rank and dignity of the god of the mysteries; but having entered the sacred vestibule he was lost to the world forever, and death ended his career. "He that endureth to the end shall be saved." Let the sphinx be dethroned!

Mithras Subjected to the Light of Druidism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: For the benefit of Dr. M. E. Lazarus (see THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 26th, p. 469) and your readers, I hav translated the following passage from pp. 66, 67 of the latest published work of the Maximè-Veneraud Myvyr Morganwg, LL.D., and Arch-Druid of the Isle of Britain, and Chief Bard Universal:

"The trinity of the ancient religious system of the Persians was composed of Plennydh, Alawn, and Avagdhu [Druidic personæ and names], under the titles of Ormuzd, Mithras, and Ahariman. We find Ormuzd to be identical with the [our] Perydh and the A-Wen of mid-summer, and to stand for the Creator and the Principle of Good, just as Plennydh stood with us. He was represented in picture as a Winged Sun, with his wings as the wings of a dove; and he was the Iona or Golden Dove which is so famous in some of the Oriental Myths. But as for Ahariman, he is identical with Avagdhu of Mid-winter, almost entirely composed of the Principle of Evil; and more so than Siva of the Hindoos; and we find that an unrelenting and eternal war subsisted between him and Ormuzd. And as to Mithras and his spouse, they are Hu [Hea or Hesus] and Morgwen. Mithras, in the character of [our] Alawn was considered to be the Sustainer and Mediator, and he was regarded as in himself a Triplicate God, and sometimes entitled Mithras Triplasias. This one, namely, the second person in the trinity, even here again [i. e., in the Persian theology], we find to hav been incarnated as the Savior of the World.

"Of Mithras it is related that he descended from heaven, from his eternal throne in the Sun,* and came down to put on flesh upon earth, for the purpose of enabling him to guide, reform, and save mankind from destruction; that he was born out a rock (in reference, no doubt, to the Ark-Stone—the Ark of the Sun, as well as the Cave, which were symbols of the Womb of the black Virgin, Mother of Hu), and that at the time of the winter solstice (Alban Arthan), and the night of his birth was called "The Night of Light." Then after having accomplished his mission, he is represented as having ascended again to heaven, to the bright regions of glory and bliss.'

"The baptism of Mithra was in vogue and famous in the East long before ever a Jew existed in this world.

"Hu, or Ormuzd, Seed of the Woman, that is, the son of the Black Virgin of Midwinter, born of the Sea of Hades, we further identify with that Hoan who had the lower-part of his body in the form of a fish, and who formerly was engaged in preaching to the people of Babylon. Sometimes among the Babylonians, the Persians, and Assyrians he was portrayed in picture-work as a Winged Sun, and often in the similitude of a man from his middle upward arising out of that Winged Sun, with a bow† in his hand, as likewise it is related of the word of God in the book of Revelation. See further at pp. 53, 92, 93 of "Ancient Glory of the Kymmry."

The foregoing extract is an instance of the manner in which oriental myths are capable of interpretation before the blaze of Druidic light, but it is short and meager compared with the articles on Chrishna and (the non-historical) Buddha to be found in the same work.

CORAVAR AMERIG.

*Note 104. The name of Huan applied to the Sun in our Bardism signifies the Dwelling of Hea.

†Note 105. "A bow in his hand," that is, a bow to shoot forth his rays, with which Hea fights against Avagdhu, prince of winter, darkness, and destruction.

What Theosophy Really Is.

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER for June 7th there appears the following editorial note:

"Col. Olcott and Madam Blavatsky are said to be rousing Paris and London with their Theosophy. The madam alleges that the colonel has performed several hundred miracles within the past few months. . . ."

Now as Theosophists hav every sympathy with the Freethought movement, being in every sense Freethinkers, and as the above statement is (inadvertently) untrue, the writer has taken it upon himself to endeavor to present to your readers a few notes upon the subject of Theosophy and the society which is its advocate. The objects of the Theosophical Society are as follows:

First, To form the nucleus of a universal brotherhood of humanity, without distinction of race, creed, or color.

Second, To promote the study of Aryan and other Eastern literature, religions, and sciences, and vindicate its importance.

Third, To investigate the hidden mysteries of nature, and the psychical powers latent in man.

What is Theosophy, then, or what does it profess to be? It professes to be nothing more nor less than the long-looked-for reconcilation of science and religion. It shows that religion, to be worthy of the name, must be based upon experimental science, and that science is unified or bound together by religion—in short, that men must hav a reason for their faith, that faith begins where knowledge ends.

That science and religion are divorced at present, scarcely any thinking person will deny. Among our scientists and literary men, orthodox religion is looked upon as an exploded farce (vide Herbert Spencer's "Religion—a Retrospect and Prospect," recent number of Nineteenth Century magazine, and the scientific attitude in general is that of pure Agnosticism.

With so-called orthodox Christianity, Theosophists hav not the slightest sympathy. They hold that the doctrin of a vicarious atonement is pernicious and an incentiv to evil. They look upon Christ as one of the Seven Principles, which a little study of occult science shows to compose the unity to which nature is progressing. Some call that principle Christ, some Chrishna, some the son of God. Some call it spirit; others (especially occultists) call it, in a metaphysical and yet real sense, matter. In Theosophy we come into the region of exact science. We bring humanity on all the planes, material, moral, and spiritual, into relationship with corresponding planes external to itself; and all the various religious writings, such as the Vedas, the Sankhya, the Puranas, the Upanishads, the Zend Avesta, and the New Testament are, when rightly and esoterically understood, indicativ of the course which human nature must pursue in harmonizing with the cosmos, of which it is the center.

Contrary to the teachings of uneducated Christians, the Theosophical Society maintains that the impulse of nature is for good, and hence that to be good is to be natural.

> "Before Beginning and without an End
> As Space eternal and surely sure,
> Is fixed a power divine which moves to Good;
> Only its Laws endure."

Large and important works hav lately been contributed to existing Theosophical literature, among which are "Isis Unveiled," by H. P. Blavatsky, editor of the Theosophist; "The Perfect Way; or, the Finding of Christ," by Dr. Kingsford and Edward Maitland of the London Hermetic Society; "The Unpublished Writings of Eliphas Levi," the occult scientist of France; "Esoteric Buddhism," by A. P. Sinnett, president of the Simla Eclectic, now of the London Lodge, Theosophical Society; "The Occult World," by same author, and the "Lectures on Archaic Religions and Theosophy," by Colonel H. S. Olcott, president of the parent Theosophical Society. All these are harmonious in their teachings. They raise the phenomenal to the noumenal, the historical to the allegorical, the material to the spiritual or sublimated material, the real to the ideal, which is in turn the only real. They demonstrate beyond a doubt the essential unity of science and religion, and deal fully with the subtle metaphysical questions regarding matter in its higher sublimations.

It may be well to try to know something of the real founders of the Theosophical Society, viz., the mahatmas of the himavat. Now who and what is a mahatma?

Having proved to ourselvs that the only true religion is the natural religion, it follows necessarily that the only men who are truly religious are those who hav caught the inner meaning or scientific essence; and as we hav shown, or attempted to show, that all religions are but phases of one natural truth, it follows that men, by working out their purification, rising from gross to sublimated matter, from sin to virtue, from Maya to reality, though born in different places on the globe, must sooner or later come together into relationships of intellectual and spiritual harmony. Now, as we know that knowledge (religion) is power, and as there are multifarious degrees of knowledge, we see that men who are at a certain stage of material and moral evolution can form no definit conception of the intellectual, moral, and material strata which may be above. Accordingly the withholding of higher strata of knowledge from those who might misapply and misuse the same is not only advisable but (for the welfare of humanity) absolutely necessary. As humanity liveth after birth (for metempsychosis can be demonstrated to be scientific and essential for a harmonious ethical philosophy), rises by its own effort perceptibly higher in the scale of sublimation, it gets ultimately to a point where knowledge is so greatly enlarged, and power accordingly so enormously increased, that it is an absolute necessity to keep back from those not yet prepared for its reception the fruits of its enlarged experience.

Thus we see that human nature has been, is now, and will be the same; and when we look along the line of history, we find Rishis Munis Magi, "wise men," and mahatmas in every faith in every land. These are the men who, by the religio-scientific process we hav spoken of, hav raised themselvs "from earth to heaven." Their "miracles" and wonders are the theme of all religions and sacred writings, and although by the populace they hav been reckoned to be gods, yet they themselvs hav not, and do not, make any such profession. The reason for their retirement and careful guarding of their secret knowledge is twofold: (1) because they could not liv among humanity and preserve their spiritual power —the gross, impure, magnetic emanations being stifling and degenerating; and (2) because the putting of the spiritual (i. e., sublimated material) powers into the hands of the uneducated masses would be ten times worse in its results than the disclosure of the most potent factors of modern destruction, viz., dynamite and gunpowder. They know and realize more fully than we the tendencies of unregenerate nature, and accordingly, for ages, the Occult Brotherhood has carefully guarded its treasures, dealing them out only to Chelas (disciples), who, after undergoing a course of training, under their master's supervision, for years, are permitted to enter the path of practical Occultism, and are intrusted with the handling of the secret forces of nature. Thus now we learn that what has often passed for fiction contains a large amount of fact, and the history of Glyndon in the late Lord Lytton's "Zanoni" is that of an unsuccessful probationary Chela. The Brotherhood, as it now exists (for it has never been extinct), is described, as far as by an outsider it can be described, by Mr. Sinnett in his "Occult World" (Trübner & Co., London), which will giv the reader a more comprehensiv idea of the "Brothers," and of their connection with the Theosophical Society. The reader there will find that the secret and august fraternity, looking to the utter dearth of spirituality in modern religion and to the grossly "materialistic" tendency of science, has resolved to disclose to the world as much of their knowledge as their rites of initiation will permit, that Madam H. P. Blavatsky, a Russian of rank and fortune, and Col. Henry S. Olcott, an officer of distinction in the American civil war, are the Chelas chosen for the mission.

The Society was founded in New York in 1875, and there was compiled and prepared that marvelous compendium of authorities, "Isis Unveiled," much of which, it is an open secret, is the work of the mahatmas. Shortly after its inauguration, the operations of the parent society were transferred to India, over which continent and in Ceylon there are now no fewer than ninety branch societies. There are branch societies in Odessa, Corfu, Holland, Paris, London, New York, Rochester, St. Louis, West Indies, and Australia. Besides the general council, composed of representativ men from all parts of the world, there are thirty-four officers (many of them graduates) of the parent society alone, all working without pecuniary remuneration (presenting rather a contrast to the missionaries in this respect) for the cause of science, nature, and humanity. The London Lodge Society (to which the writer has the honor to belong) and the London Hermetic are both flourishing societies, containing men of light and leading. The former devotes itself more exclusivly to Aryan literature and science, the latter to that of Hermes Trismegistus. To become a fellow of the Theosophrical Society (F. T. S.), it is necessary that the candidate should be introduced by two existing members, who certify to his good faith and character, and that an obligation should be given as to keeping secret certain signs and passwords. A branch may, at the discretion of the president, be composed solely of Co-Religionists or Non-Religionists under its own executiv officers. Thus it will be seen that the Theosophical Society is an intellectual brotherhood composed of men of different races, different ranks and creeds. This is what every religion professes to be hopeful of accomplishing; but up to this point all missionary movements, except in secular and educational matters, hav proved but lamentable failures.

In conclusion, let us press upon your readers the fact that there is essentially nothing supernatural about Theosophy or Occult Science, phenomena so-called being but expressions of the higher, and hitherto generally unknown, laws of nature.

There is no religion higher than truth.

Signs of the Times.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I know that your paper is not a political party organ hired to play tunes weekly to please your employers, but that it is an independent journal giving news on all subjects affecting human interests. Therefore, I send you as news—for I hav not seen it announced in any of our Freethought papers—the fact that the Greenback and Labor Party, of which General Butler is the presidential nominee, has a plank in its platform of principles which carries out the first of the Nine Demands of Liberalism, viz., the taxation of church property. It is as follows: "Fifth, All private property, all forms of money, and obligations to pay money, should bear their just proportion of public taxes. We demand a graduated income tax."

It is certainly encouraging to see how the principles of radicalism are permeating the public sentiment. The state superintendent of schools in New York, as far as his authority goes, has enforced the Fourth Demand of Liberalism. And a large political party has indorsed the First Demand, and, if in power, would be compelled to tax church property like all other private property. INDEX.

Christians Murder Mormons.

The methods by which Christians convince religious opponents of their errors received another illustration the past week in east Tennessee. For several months past a handful of Mormon elders hav been canvassing a portion of Tennessee in the interest of their superstition. They hav not taught nor attempted to practice polygamy, well knowing that the inhabitants would resent the introduction of that peculiar institution. Notwithstanding their forbearance in this respect, warnings hav been repeatedly served upon them, which hav, however, been disregarded. Their presence and preaching in the state hav now led to a tragedy disgraceful in inception and monstrously cruel—women and children being among the victims. We copy a special dispatch to the New York World from Nashville:

Elders Thompson and Berry had announced a Mormon meeting for Sunday at the house of James Conder, a convert, and were joined by Elders Gibbs and Jones, who had been canvassing Hickman and Lewis counties in the interest of Mormonism. Jones started for the house of a man named Garrett, a mile and a half distant, and when half-way fourteen disguised men rushed from a thicket, twelve armed with shot-guns and two with large pistols. All wore long gowns.

Jones threw up his hands. They forced him across a field, punching him with their guns, and finally left him guarded by one man, the rest going to Conder's house. Jones soon heard firing, when the guard, saying, "My God! they hav fired among women and children," told him to run. Jones did not stop until he reached a shady grove, several miles distant. He is beardless, good-looking, and twenty-five years old. Elder Thompson, who escaped from Conder's, says they had just finished singing when the mob rushed in, seizing Conder, who was at the gate. Elder Gibbs had just taken up a Bible when one of the mob, David Hinson, deliberately leveled his gun and fired, the charge passing through Gibbs's body, killing him instantly. Hinson then took aim at Elder Thompson, but Elder Berry grasped the gun with both hands, and a scuffle ensued. The mob fired on Berry and he dropped to the floor dead. Thompson rushed for a back door, but at that instant a woman with a babe in her arms passed between him and Hinson. The latter lowered his gun and Thompson escaped to the woods.

Conder's two sons then rushed in, Martin grappling with Hinson, who drew a Derringer and snapped it at Conder, but failed to fire. Some one else then shot Conder, killing him instantly. While Martin Conder was struggling with Hinson his half-brother, James R. Hudson, ran to the loft to get a gun. As he came back two men clutched him, but he wrenched away and shot Hinson, who was standing in the door. One of the mob shouted, "I'll hav revenge," and fired immediately on Hudson, who died after half an hour in terrible agony. The mob outside then repeatedly fired through the window, one load entering Mrs. Conder's hip, causing probably a fatal wound. Several charges were emptied into the bodies of the dead elders, the mob taking malicious pleasure in riddling them. Hinson's friends carried off his body. The other dead were buried in Conder's yard.

A Call for the Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League.

All citizens of the United States, whether they hav heretofore acted with this League or not, who believe in a secular government and a secular republic, separation of church and state, the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all, and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press as the basis of universal suffrage, are invited to appear or to be represented at the Eighth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, to be held at Cassadaga Lake, Chautauqua Co., New York, on Monday and Tuesday, the 8th and 9th of September next (at the close of the New York Freethinkers' Convention at that place).

The League has for its objects the purposes above stated, and has sought to carry them out by securing:

1. THE TOTAL SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE; this is the first and chief object of the League, and includes among other things the taxation of church property and the suppression of sectarian appropriations; and, as necessary to that general object, the League insists upon,
2. The protection of all citizens in their equal religious, civil, and political rights, without regard to religious belief or want of such belief.
3. The universal, secular, and scientific education of the people, so as to emancipate them from the prevalent superstitions.
4. The impartial, secular administration and enforcement of the laws by secular authorities only, who shall be directly responsible to the people.
5. The inviolability of the mails, and their impartial administration for postal purposes only.
6. Freedom of the press and of speech, without any censorship except responsibility before the jury of the country for any abuse of that freedom.

Year by year we find that the above principles and measures are openly or covertly violated more and more in every state and by the general government, and chiefly through church influences. Any sect, church, or "religion" that militates against these principles openly or covertly, directly or indirectly, is the enemy of American liberty and of the American people. The League is opposed to churches and "religions" only as they are opposed to liberty and to the rights of man, the general education of the people, and the progress of mankind.

All American citizens, therefore, to whom these principles and objects commend themselvs, should rally to their support by a common and permanent organization, which is now the National Liberal League, and should make it the nurse and defender of freedom in every town and state as well as in the nation. In no other way can "the blessings of liberty," the birth-right of American freemen, be effectivly maintained. At this Congress it is designed to revise the basis of the League so as to make it so broad and Liberal that all who sympathize with its general purpose may co-operate with it to the end that a general union of all citizens of Liberal sentiments may result, and that new officers of the League may be selected without regard to past differences.

All Charter and Life Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Each Auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates—its president, secretary, and three other members—to the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats in the Congress, and to votes by the permission of the Congress.

Combine, then, for your common defense, for general secular education, and for the firm support of the essentials of free institutions. Let it not be your fault if, in the growth and prosperity of our people, their liberties and yours are frittered away and lost!

Vexed Congregationalists.

The hatred which regular orthodox Christians entertain toward scientific thought and Freethinkers is again brought out, this time over an almost open grave.

In another column will be found an account of the death of Mrs. Lizzie Palmer, of Sound Beach, Conn. The services, as conducted by Mr. Putnam, we conceive to hav been appropriately beautiful. Certainly his words, as given by our report, were infinitly more respectful to the dead and cheering to the living than the mocking promises of orthodoxy.

But the churchmen of Sound Beach, which is a hamlet two miles west of Stamford, are up in arms because the discourse was delivered in the church. They claim the "sacred edifice" has been desecrated, and in the daily papers their complaints are loud and long. A reporter of the Sun of this city found the pastor of the congregation standing on the steps of the building the Saturday night following the funeral. He was radiant in white choker and vest, and held in his hand a bunch of tickets to a secular entertainment to be given within, which he was exhorting the public to purchase. His plaint to the reporter runs:

"I should not hav permitted the funeral to hav taken place in the church," he said, "had I not been assured that the services would be conducted by a regularly ordained minister of the gospel. A friend of Mr. Palmer's family applied to the chairman of our church committee for the use of the church, and, after the matter had been referred to me, consent was given on the condition above named. Mr. Samuel P. Putnam, of New York, came to conduct the services. He told me that he had been an ordained Presbyterian minister. He felt that in view of the condition that had been attached to granting the use of the church he should say this much, and that he was not now strictly a regularly ordained orthodox minister. On assuring me that nothing should be done or said at the service that orthodox people would consider offensiv, I permitted the use of the church.

"He began the services by reading a regular jingling poem on some scientific subject, and he closed them with an address in the same line and shadowed throughout the spirit of Materialism and the doctrin of evolution. The scriptures were not referred to or opened once during the service; there was not a prayer or an amen; the name of the savior was not mentioned, and that of the supreme being was mentioned only once. At the grave there was neither prayer nor scriptural reading, and the only hymn that was sung was 'Nearer, My God, to Thee." There was and is much feeling in the congregation on the subject, and the matter is causing a great deal of talk. The majority of those who attended the funeral were Freethinkers, though, of course, a good many of my congregation were present. There will be a funeral to-morrow (Sunday) in the church, which will be conducted with an evangelically Christian burial service, and it is expected much interest will be manifested, as something of a protest against the services of last Thursday. Part of the Freethinkers here are indigenous to the soil and part are imported. It is quite a hot-bed of them."

The insinuation of the Rev. Martin Kellogg is that deception was practiced to obtain the use of the building, and the direct statement is that he would not hav allowed the services had he supposed them to be other than orthodox. The insinuation we are in a position to deny point blank. Mr. Putnam deceives no one. He is honest in every fiber of his being, morally and intellectually. A close acquaintance of years warrants us in saying this. The church was hired from the chairman of the board of trustees, and the case seems to be that that individual's humane impulses overcame his religious bigotry, for which he is now sorry, as the congregation are censuring him, and he invents the cry of deception to shield himself. He could easily hav chosen a nobler course, but scarcely a meaner. However, if the building can stand being used for a secular entertainment without desecration, we should think that sheltering a mourning group performing the last offices for the dead wife and mother would not collapse its Puritan walls, though the sentiments of the speaker and listeners are not such as could be approved by the witch hangers who founded the society.

We extend our sincere sympathy to Mr. Palmer in his irreparable loss, and share his indignation toward the sectaries who would force him to quarrel over the grave of his wife. We doubt if so despicable a spirit could be manifested in any but a Christian state, or by any but Christian people.

Parallel Superstitions.

"How Buddhists Pray," is the title of an article now going the rounds of the religious press. It is intended, doubtless, to indicate the depths of superstitious depravity to which the "heathen" are sunk, but when viewed from the standpoint of Freethought impartiality toward all superstitions, it throws considerable light upon the origin of the peculiar superstition that has been inflicted upon this country by European ecclesiastics. It also shows the common basis of all supernatural religions. By piecemeal we quote the article nearly entire.

Buddhism, the pious press forget to mention, is several hundred years older than Christianity. Its superstitions, then, clearly are not copied from the Christians. But let us compare the matter in detail —the Mongolians with the Christians of this civilized country.

"Almost nine out of every ten Mongols you meet," we are informed, "will hav rosaries in their hands." Well, that proportion is considerably larger than the Christians can boast in this country. The Catholics who exclusivly use the rosary here are only about one in eight (7,000,000 in 53,000,000) of the population, and the openly professed Christians about one in three (17,000,000 out of 53,000,000). Let us be thankful for that.

Some of the Mongols are depraved enough to hav two rosaries, and

"By the time the worshiper has got round both strings of beads, he has said one hundred and eight times one hundred and eight prayers. One of the prayers most commonly used consists of six syllables."

How does that parallel the Christian rosary? This way. The Christian instrument is

"A series of prayers prescribed by the Roman Catholic church. The Greater Rosary is a synonym for the whole series, and is made up of three lesser rosaries. Each of the three lesser rosaries contains five decades or mysteries. Each decade contains one meditation upon one of the fifteen mysteries of the faith, one pater noster, or repetition of the Lord's Prayer, ten ave marias, and one gloria patri. The name rosary also designates the chaplet or string of beads used in the repetition of the rosary. The pater nosters are marked by large beads, and the ave marias by smaller ones. The beads are of various materials, and are blessed by the pope or by some duly authorized ecclesiastic. The beads serve as counters during the recitation."

The Mongols hav the faith to carry their rosaries in their hands. Search a Catholic, and one will be found concealed somewhere, either around the neck or in the pocket. Often besides will be found a "caul," or cross, or relic blessed by priest or pope. The "Greater Rosary" answers to the one the Mongol uses "to count his individual prayers;" the little rosary can be used by Catholic or Mongol to "keep record of each complete set of prayers that hav run round the whole rosary." Only the poor benighted Mongol does not appear to hav a big bead for a pater noster, and a little one for the ave marias. The loss is the heathen's. He has not kept pace with modern improvements and the rapid strides of civilization.

Then, again, the Mongol has one special prayer of six syllables:

"Ask one man what these six syllables mean, he will tell you one thing; ask another, and he will hav another version of the meaning; ask a third, and he will most likely giv an answer which all will agree in, namely, that it does not matter what they mean; the efficacy depends not on the meaning, but on the repetition of the prayer."

How like the Christians! Ask a Methodist what one verse in the Bible means, and he will tell you one thing; ask a Baptist, he will hav another version of the verse; ask a Unitarian, and he will tell you, like the third Mongol, that the letter killeth, the spirit alone giveth life, and the main thing is to believe with all the heart. Prayer is of the understanding, not by set forms. How like the heathen Mongol! and precisely as satisfactory.

"Acting on this belief, the Mongols rattle away at their prayers—paying no attention to the meaning, whether they know it or not. Each repetition is believed to hav a certain efficacy; the more repetitions, therefore, the more efficacy; and so men and women spend much time and energy in the so-called praying, hoping thereby to make merits which will, among other things, cancel their sins."

Did the writer of this never listen to a New England deacon saying grace? Or an Episcopal minister on Sunday mornings? Or a Catholic before retiring, or at meal time, or when kneeling before the altar? The fluency and mechanical manner of the deacon, in a hurry to get to work in the field, are very like the rattle of the pagan Mongol: "O Lord, bless the food of which we are about to partake, and which thy bounty has provided; may it strengthen us and enable us to the more glorify the giver. We ask it for Christ's sake, Amen!—pass the bread." Three times a day this stereotyped formula is repeated—hastily in the morning, very hurriedly at noon, and as fast as the words can be repeated at night, so the hired man can get through supper and get the chores done. And alongside of an Episcopal, the indifference of the wretched oriental would seem earnestness incarnate. Episcopalianism is the lazy man's religion. Prayers are ready printed, rules and forms for everything are laid down in the book, and religious duty is done when they are mumbled never so shiftlessly. But a Catholic can discount the most expert Mongol of the East. He can cross himself so rapidly that his motions are lost like the individual spokes in a swiftly revolving wheel. He can repeat a pater or an ave so quickly that it can't be told whether the father, son, or Virgin is the subject of his remarks. His fingers tell his beads on the rosary as rapidly as the prayers are evolved from the machine of the Mongol described in this next paragraph:

"But mouth repetition is a slow process; and, to expedite matters, a praying-wheel has been invented, into which are put a large number of printed papers; the wheel is turned round, and by this simple act all the prayers contained in the machine are supposed to be repeated. This is a wonderful acceleration. The wheel is fitted on to a handle, which a man can easily hold as he walks about; and thus it comes that men may be met with examining their cattle or going from one place to another, whirling their prayer-wheels all the time."

But the Catholics long ago could giv the heathen points. The poor Mongol's machine is an individual contrivance. The Catholics pray by wholesale. They giv out the contracts to the priests, who do it cheap by large lots. No heathen association extant can rival the "Purgatorial Association" of McConnelsville, O., in the extent of appliances and facility for turning out work. At least, we never heard of the Buddhists sending out advertising appeals like this:

"THE PURGATORIAL ASSOCIATION.—SPREAD OF AN ORGANIZATION INTENDED TO DO A GREAT CHARITY.

"McConnelsville, Morgan Co., O., July 7, 1884.

"To the Editor of The Catholic Review:

"The Purgatorial Association continues to grow rapidly. We are now saying about fourteen decades of the rosary every week, for the poor souls. Persons wishing to unite with us in this devotion may send their names, plainly written in English, to the Rev. S. S. Mattingly, McConnelsville, Morgan Co., O., and also inclose a postal directed to themselvs, for answer to their application.

"The obligation on the part of the members is one 'Our Father' and ten 'Hail Marys,' or one decade of the rosary every day for the souls in purgatory. The benefits derived by the members of the association are: (1) One mass, once a week, pro de functis, for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the members, according to each one's intention; (2) a memento is made every day in holy mass, according to the intention of member. We takes these rosaries, said by the members of this association, every day to holy mass with us and ask God to hear our prayers and liberate those suffering souls. Other benefits for the members of this association are being sought for by us, and that we may be successful, we ask the prayers of the members. S. S. M."

"Fourteen thousand decades of the rosary" means that the ears of the Virgin ache from hearing 140,000 prayers to her every week from this one institution alone; but the father escapes with 14,000. Perhaps they think the father has more important business to attend to. It is asserted above that the Mongols believe that "the more repetitions the more efficacy," but what shall be said of these 154,000 machine prayers? A charge of blackness comes with bad grace from the pot, addressed to the kettle. Are human machines any better than wooden? If God is moved with much speaking and vain repetitions, why condemn the Buddhists for lightening the task by labor-saving machinery? If saying Hail Mary ten times a day moves the father once, will saying it twenty times move him twice? It seems to us that if numbers are desirable, the Buddhist machine is the more economical. It requires no food, while the priests must be luxuriously fed; the machine wears no clothes, drinks no wine, produces no illegitimate children, needs no foundling asylums, monasteries, and nunneries, while the priests do and require these and innumerable other things.

But another Buddhist parallel to Christian superstition is found in family wheels for family prayers. The operators are the same in both cases—the old women:

"In some tents there is a stand in which is placed a large wheel, bearing about the same relation to the hand-wheel as a family Bible does to a pocket Bible. A thong is fixed to a crank, the inmates taking their turn in pulling it; but the aged grandmother usually spends most time over it."

Family wheels and family prayers, in which one member grinds out both, are strikingly similar. The old crone turning the handle and the old crone crooning passages of scripture from the depths of her easy-chair are first cousins, if not nearer relativs. A turn of the wheel, and a prayer goes up. A chapter read, and God is pleased. If true worship lie in the intent, God knows of one as quick as of the other; and where is the difference?

Really, the parallels between the two superstitions are most striking. But why do not the religious papers point them out? An argument for the plenary inspiration of the scriptures can easily be founded on the universality of the same religious sentiment.

"The Tae."

Some months ago the world was startled by the production of a new Bible. It was labeled by the author, "Oahspe." It was produced, we believe, by J. B. Newbrough, a dentist of this city. Mr. Newbrough was of course inspired to write it. In the composition he had a decided advantage over the Hebrew prophets. They were hampered in their expression by the incompleteness of the Hebrew language, which had no vowels, punctuation points, or spaces between words. Thus very much was left to the imagination of the translators, who found little difficulty it making the Bible read several ways, according as their predilections ran to golden harps or brimstone. Mr. Newbrough, however, livs in the nineteenth century, which has several modern improvements over the B.C. centuries. Among these is the type-writer. When this modern prophet felt inspired he sat down before his machine, closed his eyes, and gave to the world a chapter or two of holy writ. When the Oahspe was completed it made a bulky volume which the modest dentist found beyond his means of printing. Recourse was had again to divinity, who, or which, assured the author that he need not let his heart be troubled—the hard cash which skeptical printers demanded would be forthcoming. Thereafter, Mr. Newbrough asserts, he was in the habit of finding thousand dollar bills tucked under his office door and of mysteriously receiving by mail large sums of money, until enough was on hand to print the Oahspe. Having received the contents of the book by divine inspiration, and of course gratuitously, and having been given the lucre wherewith to satisfy the sordid printer, it would seem that Mr. Newbrough ought to hav presented the volumes to the world, to the end that the new revelation might be duly blown abroad. But Mr. Newbrough persisted in charging $7 for the sacred volume, and thus many thousands of poor people hav been kept from a knowledge of the new gospel.

But it appears that enough hav heard of the Oahspe to found a new sect. It does not require a large number to do this. Jesus Christ, Joe Smith, and other reformers, began at first with one. Then the sect grew. Perhaps the Faithists will grow. At any rate, we shall watch with interest the progress of the new sect, whose intentions and doings are set forth in a circular just forwarded to us.

"The Tae of the Faithists" is the beginning of "a community unlike anything that has been tried before in any part of the world. It is to be built up with children." Herein the Faithists show a marked degree of worldly wisdom. But the children are to be benefited, as may be seen from a clause of their incorporating charter: "The object of our Association is to gather in and care for foundlings and orphans, and other unprotected infants, and to found them in a colony or colonies on western lands, where we shall procure a tract of sufficient size; to prohibit the sale and use of intoxicating liquors, and where the children may be educated and raised out of sight of drunkenness and profanity, so common in our large cities."

The children thus taken are to be instructed in the new Bible, Oahspe, in which the grandeur and beauty of the scheme is made plain. The Faithists are religious people, but worship only the "one true God" Jehovih, the creator. "Their rites and ceremonies are more imposing than any that hav ever been practiced, and yet they are given only as a matter of education and disciplin." While not placing themselvs under the guidance of spirits, "angel communion" is taught. "The Tae" is composed of an Inner and an Outer Council. Any of the homes or families will constitute an inner council, but there is to be only one outer council, and the king-pin thereof will receive large benefits. The members draw no pay for their services. All will be provided with homes, food, and clothing. But members can not be accepted, according to the circular, "until they giv in all their earthly possessions and isolate themselvs from the customs, usages, and vanities of the world." The scheme is not yet well under way, the Tae only having been in existence a few months. But "a call for volunteers has been responded to from nearly all parts of the United States, showing that Our Heavenly Father has really provided the people for such a great and holy work," and also, we may add, if the statement is true, that all the fools ready to part with their money and liberty at the solicitation of a few fanatics are not yet dead. The plan of "The Tae" is thus indicated by the new holy writ:

"There shall be two Councils, an Inner one and an Outer one, and the twain shall be known as THE TAE.

"The Inner Council shall be within the place of Jehovih's chosen, the Faithists in Him, after the manner of my Holy Council within the place of the second resurrection of in heaven, whose chief I am.

"The Outer Council shall be with the world at large, after the manner of my sub-Holy Council, which dealeth with mortals and with the spirits of the first resurrection who dwell on earth.

"Each and every Council shall hav a chief, and his official acts shall be founded on the base expressed in the Book of Disciplin, to wit—, "hav not the Uzians resolved their colleges into pupils and teachers? and jurisprudence, so that testimony and not the judge governeth the decisions? Out of the wisdom of the government of the college, and the judge's position in court, thou shalt find the key for the decrees of the chief.'

"An individual member within the colony shall not transact business on his own account with the Outer Council nor with the Uzians, even as the angels in the second resurrection in heaven manifest not in places below them.

"Though on earth, and in case of valuable bequeathment to an individual member already in the colony, he shall hand the matter over to the Inner Council for benefit of the fraternity.

"As to the second resurrection in heaven your God hath said: Whosoever will free himself from all things below shall enter therein. Moreover, I said: Go found a place of second resurrection on earth in like manner.

"Now therefore let this be a law amongst you, that henceforth whosoever joineth a colony shall put away all Uzian possessions and bondage ere he become a brother with you.

"And if a wife desire to enter, and her husband will not, she shall say to him: 'Not I, but Jehovih putteth us asunder; for I go not after the things of earth, but my Father in heaven.' And she shall depart away from him.

"And if a husband desire to enter, and his wife will not, he shall say to her: 'Not I, but Jehovih putteth us asunder; for I go not after the things of earth, but my Father in heaven.' And he shall depart away from her.

"But when an applicant for membership is encumbered with a house, or land, or other earthly possessions, he shall donate the same to the Outer Council for the benefit of the fraternity."

As the worldly-minded would say, it was a great head that concocted the Oahspe, and one well calculated to take care of itself in the matter of wealth. Christianity, Mormonism, the Oneida Community, the Shakers, hav all been drawn upon for the principles of the scheme, in which benevolence and superstition are inextricably entangled. It is the old, old story of using love and kindness for selfish aggrandizement. The "Outer Council" is but a disguise for a high priesthood, and like all priesthoods will inevitably obtain the lion's share. Communities founded on "divine revelations" are to be distrusted. Even though beginning with seeming fairness, they are easily perverted. Mormonism was as decent as any alleged supernatural religion at first. But new revelations can be had. Type writers are comparativly cheap, and inspired "prophets" are thick as huckleberries. Once settled in communities, the leader of the Faithists, like the Mormon elders, can reduce their servile followers to the most abject condition of mental and physical slavery by simply getting an appendix revelation to Oahspe.

When people co-operate they should co-operate for their own good and share the profits of their own labor. No "Outer Councils" should be allowed to monopolize the products of a whole community's toil, even though disguised under the name of benevolence. Prospectuses of the kind issued by the Faithists are to be distrusted. Concealed behind the altar in the "temple of worship, opened in subdued light," there may be a scheme not quite so happy in its results as the hooked fish sees on the surface. Religion has been used so many times as a bait that its temptingness may now be discouraged. Let Joe Smith remain the last of the prophets.

Interesting News.

Editorial in Banner of Light of the 23d inst.

By reference to a letter from Cassadaga Lake, in another column, it will be seen that George Chainey, the Liberal lecturer of this city, has seen enough of the phenomena to convince him that Spiritualism is a truth; and that on the 13th he publicly avowed his new faith, or rather newly acquired knowledge, and renounced Materialism.

The following is the letter referred to:

CASSADAGA LAKE CAMP-MEETING.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BANNER OF LIGHT: During the past few days we hav had lectures from Mrs. E. C. Woodruff, J. H. Randall, Mrs. R. S. Lillie, George Chainey; and others, while the phenomena of Spiritualism hav been witnessed through some of the best mediums in the ranks. W. A. Mansfield is sustaining and increasing his reputation for the phase of slate-writing, having more business than he can easily attend to. Mrs. E. S. Silverston, just come from Lookout Mountain meeting, givs circles for tests, and her psychometric readings are very perfect. That jolly but not ethereal lady, Dr. J. M. Clark, attends to the ills that flesh is heir to, and to see her laugh is better than a tonic; and other mediums deserving of mention did space permit, do their good work day by day. Walter Howell made us a pleasant but all too short a visit, and Bishop A. Beals dropped in and told us of Spiritualism in the West. Dr. A. W. Edson and wife hav come from Lansing, Mich., and at the time I write J. F. Baxter is moving among the people like an inspiring presence.

The sensation of the week at this place is the conversion of George Chainey, the great Liberal orator of Boston, to a belief in the Spiritual philosophy. That gentleman, after having evolved through the stages of the Methodist and Unitarian ministry into a full-fledged Freethinker, was brought by a seeming accident to this place, where investigation of various phenomena produced a conviction of the truth of immortality, and placed him upon the highest round in the ladder of religious thought. He bravely renounced Materialism, and on Wednesday, the 13th of the month, in a lecture upon the subject, "My Religious Experience," he crossed the Rubicon of doubt and boldly planted his standard upon the field of modern Spiritualism. In his lecture he reviewed his entire experience in and out of the church, pictured the mental struggles which he experienced in breaking away from old associations, and related the history of his labors in the field of Liberal thought. He confessed the dissatisfaction which he had felt at the lack of enthusiasm among the Liberals, and considered it due to the Agnosticism which they profess. A mere negation has no vital force, and a system which can only deny will never giv birth to a great organization. The grand truth which he now has grasped fills him with a high enthusiasm, and will be the motiv power of a future career of usefulness to his fellow-man. Instead of going upon the stage, as he had contemplated, he will direct his efforts to the dissemination of the noble teachings of the Spiritual philosophy. The horizon of his mind had been bounded by the limits of this mundane life; now his mental vision pierces beyond the grave, and in the abyss of eternity he sees gleaming the star of immortal life. He has gone to Ontario to fill an engagement, but returns immediately to remain throughout the season. GRAPHO.

Extract from the Buffalo Express's Report of his Speech of Confession.

After two years of labor he found that Agnostics had little enthusiasm in propagating their ideas. A mere negation has not the vital force of a grand living truth. He became disheartened, and began to think of preparing himself for the stage, confident that the drama can be made a grand instrument for the propagation of truth. But for a seeming incident which brought him to Cassadaga he would hav carried out his purpose. That star for him has set, but a far grander one to-day shines in its place. When he came here he had no more expected to become a Spiritualist than he had expected to jump over the moon; but now he can no more doubt the fact of spirit communion than he can doubt his own physical organism. If we can believe our own senses, we know that those who sit before me are but a few compared with the cloud of immortals who listen to my words. Between slates are written communications from loved ones in their own handwriting. In dark circles where all are adults, childish fingers, soft and delicate, lovingly caress the cheek. I ask for no more proof, for I do not need it. I make this confession first to you, because to you I am indebted for my experience—and that experience I would not part with for all the gold of earth. I now experience a new desire to pray—not to an unknown God, but to the arisen friends who stand by our side and know our griefs and wants—not in a formal, ritualistic way, but as friend calls upon friend for sympathy and aid.

Editorial in same paper.

The speaker was filled with a greater enthusiasm than at any of his previous lectures, and fairly outdid himself in eloquent flights and touching pathos, alternately moving his audience to stormy applause and tearful silence.

THE benediction of all connected with this office rests upon Mr. B. Hussey, of Aroostook county, Maine, for the gift of about twenty-five pounds of the best honey that the little busy bee ever improved each shining hour putting inside a hive. May long life attend him who makes so good a use of it!

Letters from Friends.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Aug. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.00, for which continue the grand old paper four months longer. It keeps up its well-earned reputation nobly, and the press of the country is beginning to fall into line. Light is dawning. Hell is gone and the sulphur smoke has lifted. All Liberals should vote for Ben. H. M. BURFIELD.

DOWAGIAC, MICH., Aug. 14, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.50 to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER until January 1, 285. We send the extra fifty cents for not paying at the commencement of the year. Long liv THE TRUTH SEEKER. We wish its name was The Civilizer. We think that would be the most appropriate name, for we consider all supernaturalism heathenism. C. A. CODDING.

MINNEAPOLIS, Aug. 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I desire to express my hearty appreciation of your paper, and send beneath the name of a solid Infidel as a new subscriber. Minneapolis has been my home for only six months, yet I hav made a goodly number of Infidel friends. This will inform friends in Maine and elsewhere that I am just as much of an Infidel as ever, just as proud of letting the world know it in a quiet kind of a way.

Yours for truth, GEO. S. PERKINS.

TO OTTO WETTSTEIN.

MY DEAR BROTHER: Your communication in the last TRUTH SEEKER chills every drop of blood in my veins, and makes me sick and sad. A thousand icebergs anchored around me would not affect me half as much. If we Spiritualists are mistaken, if "death ends all," even then our belief is more cheering, for it is the only philosophy or religion that has any incentiv to noble lives, the only belief that has any sweet, soul-elevating music in it. With not one note of beautiful, sweet music in your cold philosophy, what is there in it to cheer our sad lives? It may feed you, my brother, but to my warm, loving soul it is sad and chilling. Your friend and brother,

SEWARD MITCHELL.

CENTRALIA, ILL., Aug. 12, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of this city hav been honored with a lecture by Mr. J. L. Andrew, of Fort Scott, Kansas. Mr. Andrew is a clear, forcible, and logical speaker, convincing his hearers very soon of the correctness and truthfulness of his arguments. The impression produced by this gifted and talented orator has won for him the golden opinions of the Liberals of this city and surrounding country. He is a young man of fine personal appearance. His gestures are elegant and impressiv. From here he goes to Kentucky to meet engagements to lecture. On his return to Kansas, we hope to be fortunate enough to engage him to giv us a regular course of Liberal lectures. Yours very respectfully,

WILLIAM LEE, SR.,
Secretary Liberal League.

NEW YORK, Aug. 10, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: On page 503 of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S issue of the 9th inst., "A. A. B." takes E. B. Foote, Jr., to task for writing a most rational article about the "Georgia Wonder." "A. A. B." asserts that "the tricks of Miss Hurst hav been explained over and over again, but the public seem to care nothing for the explanations." If, as he affirms, Mr. Foote has "dipped his pen" to befog the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, will he not do the same to enlighten them. I would suggest, however, that if he has never attempted to put a chair to the floor while Miss Hurst had her hands upon it, nor has even been to see others do it, his efforts to enlighten readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will be much more likely to befog them than Mr. Foote's, as that has evidently been the effect upon the public of all the explanations (?) which hav so far appeared.

Come, Mr. "A. A. B.," let us know all about it. MILES.

SEWARD, NEB., Aug. 12, 284.

MR. EDITOR: After a long time I make another effort to pay my subscription due THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav read your paper from the first number. It arrives here in Nebraska promptly.

I would like to attend the Congress this fall, but it is too far away. I attended the Congress in St. Louis in 1882, and it was a happy treat for me.

I am staggered about our election. I think I'll balk until some pledge is made which the Liberal League demands. I am now in the seventy-third year of my age, and am anxious that something be "did" pretty soon.

If we in this place could hav one week of Liberal lectures by a good organizer, we could boast of one of the best auxiliaries in the West. This young city of Seward (two thousand inhabitants) is alive with Infidels. We proclaim our prin ciples on all occasions. H. L. BOYES.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, Aug. 15, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The laws of nature, like nature itself, hav ever existed. Neither nature nor its laws are the production of any power or force superior to or distinct from itself. No God, gods, or any ideal spirit power, in which Brother Seely seems to believe, hath one iota to do with nature's forces or laws. The universe is an eternity, and all its motions to everlasting activities are within its own independent supremacy.

But the eternity of matter, as a universe, doth not imply that animal life, including man, is also eternal. The eternal existence of nature is one thing, and the transient existence of animal life is another. The one is an eternal entity, the other is not. Will Brother Seely clearly state what is the name of the entity or force which he asserts acts on matter, but is not matter, either in name or property, but something quite distinct? Let Brother Seely show wherein Materialists are so very illogical and so wide of the truth. Sir, the world breathlessly waits for the great secret. Yours in friendship,

T. WINTER, Materialist.

OSAGE MISSION, KAS., Aug. 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I am pleased to see everyone favoring harmony in the National Liberal League at the next Congress. Stand by the original Nine Demands. Secularize the state in all departments. Let no other issue be allowed to enter this organization. We hav, each and all of us, ten thousand ideas and notions that it would be a blessing to the world to hav adopted and practiced. Let us form all the societies necessary to carry them out. But don't pile them all on the back of the National Liberal League. It will be too great a strain for any one back. When the League shall hav secularized the state we can retire it with honor, as Garrison did the Abolition party and the Liberator when negro slavery was abolished. And the good to the world that will result from our achievements will quite equal that secured by Garrison and his colaborers. Green, Putnam, Chainey, or Burnham will any of them be eminently fit for presidents and secretaries. But pray don't ask them to work for less than $2,000 and traveling expenses. The money must be raised to suitably pay the officers of the League. H. L. R. JONES.

POMONA, CAL., July 28, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please send "Bible Myths." I inclose petition for state secularization. It is in a dilapidated condition, owing to careless handling. The wealth represented by the thirty-two signers amounts to two and one-half million dollars—more than the combined wealth of the entire Christian element of the township in which Pomona is located. I could get more signatures by presenting it to Christians, those who hav had their names registered in the "lamb's book," when they were infants. But I prefer to hav only men who hav broken down the walls that the God of superstition had erected around them and so numerously pictured at every point with his bigoted agents, the parson, the holy man of God, the expounder of creeds—often the destroyer of virtue, the ravisher of reason, the blighter of the joys of life, the curse of the world in which we liv—to hav men who hav the moral courage to stand, as rocks, impregnable by their (the Christians') false readings, and hurl them back wrecked, shattered, and demoralized. "The world does move," and men are being moved by the great power of Freethought on to a happier condition. H. L. SHAUG.

EAST BROADWAY, Aug. 12, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I am very well pleased by your analysis of the presidential candidates. You hav hit the nail on the head. Liberals really hav no candidate to vote for, and the only object they can hav is to change the order of things, and then it may be "out of the frying-pan into the fire." There is one thing reasonable—Liberals will be not far from right to go the other way from the church.

I wish the name of the National Liberal League could be changed—that is, the word League. I don't know if it conveys to other minds the same meaning as it does to me, but it seems inconsistent with the search after truth and the professions of Liberals. It seems to be, or mean, a combination for some secret purpose, which perhaps is not for the good of the world.

I don't believe in our humbling ourselvs too much to the slanderous vagabonds who hav resorted to every means to injure their betters because they could not rule them. It will only make them feel that they are of great importance, and accomplish nothing for the good of the cause. Let them alone, would be my advice, unless they first showed a willingness to co-operate and drop their misrepresenting course.

Yours truly, M. E. ROSE.

PRESCOTT, IOWA, Aug. 3, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $27.00 for books, which please send as per inclosed list.

THE TRUTH SEEKER was never better—in fact, it improves with age. In the foremost row of the able corps of correspondents stand Charles B. Reynolds, John Peck, and Holt, on the Bible. Andrews, Putnam, and Bradford cannot be over-estimated in their line. Elmina has become familiar to and admired by every reader. E. C. Walker, J. L. York, and a host of others—especially Miss Wixon—merit praise.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is growing grander and greater. Its field for operation is widening. It is sowing the good seed, preparing the minds for a peaceful earthly future, when supernaturalism shall be a belief of the past, and when all dare avow their honest belief and not conceal their name and residence for fear of being persecuted or ostracized.

I, like many others, depend on my labor for a livelihood, yet I never fail to giv theology a stab whenever an opportunity presents itself, and, therefore, my heterodox views are well known, inasmuch as after reading THE TRUTH SEEKER I generally send it around where I think it will do the most good, hoping thereby to gain some adherents to Freethought.

Yours truly, JOHN W. YEADON.

BENTON, TEXAS, Aug. 12, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Preaching and drouth is the order of the day in these parts. As farmers hav no crops to gather, they are passing the time in thanking "Gaud" for all his mercies. The long-prevailing drouth that is parching crops up so fast is sent by the Lord to humble us into submission, they say. The Baptists are howling away on their third week, and not one, I hear, has gained yet, but a few knelt at their seats a few nights ago after the proposition of the acting clown, to thus show their preference whether, at any time, they preferred to go heavenward than the other place; and hence they are encouraged to continue the Lord's fight. I heard the local preacher of this church remark the other day that "women were the first starter of evil, and to this day three-fourths of all crimes and mishaps to men in this world might be traced to woman's doings." This is true Bible doctrin, and this good brother stands high as a saint. He has a wife, too, but how sad and broken she looks, toiling over the wash tub and in the kitchen, cooking for several boarders, while he luxuriates in his corpulency sitting in the shade! Still, in the face of all this, women are the great supporters of the church.

We need women educated for the lecture field as well as men, and in my opinion our cause will drag slowly until there are many more Wixons, Slenkers, and Miss Gibsons in our land. Children are early taught superstition by mothers, and once the seed is plantad, it's hard, indeed, to eradicate the poisonous weed. Yours for success, H. B. JONES,

BURLINGTON, KAN., July 20, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you my photograph, and $1.00 for its worth in "False Claims," by our Kansas Liberal, John E. Remsburg. I hav sold 126 copies of Ingersoll's last lecture on "Orthodoxy," commencing about June 1st, and am selling one occasionally yet. I hav made it a point to sell as many to young men as possible, and hav placed one in the hands of three of our city clergymen. I hav learned that two and three hav read the same pamphlet. It is more difficult to introduce "False Claims," as Brother Remsburg is not as popular yet as Ingersoll.

Will THE TRUTH SEEKER giv us, its readers, the status of Butler, Blaine, and Cleveland on orthodoxy? Butler was intrusted with the petition that was presented to the House of Representativs a few years ago for the repeal or modification of the Comstock law, and I judge by his speeches that he is a Liberal. And we also hav a right to claim him on account of the interest he manifests in the elevation of the laboring classes. The Greenback or legal tender cause is gaining slowly but continuously, here in the West, and I hope to hear that Butler has polled a heavy vote all over the country, if not elected. And if the Democrats had not committed political suicide at Chicago in not nominating him—to please the old Shylock, monopoly—if they had taken him instead of Cleveland, he would be our next president. That was the opinion of a number of the other parties. The late decision of our Supreme Court has given the Prohibitionist the blues, and the sooner old orthodoxy is defeated in making another link in her chain to unite church and state in that scheme, the better it will be for the people. CHRIS. BROWN.

MILWAUKEE, ORE., Aug. 12, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I was out to one of those camp-meetings the other day where they consider it a sin to pray out loud and be heard for your much speaking. But they will hop up and spat their hands and declare that they are anointed and sanctified by the Holy Ghost. So after it began to die down, the minister raised both of his hands and ordered the front seats cleared. Then reaching his hands out over the audience he said: "All you that wishes for anything, come and kneel down at this anxious seat—the least thing you may desire, either in earth or in heaven—come and kneel at this anxious seat." They commenced stringing in, and finally all got down but me—thirty-five all told. Then he reached out his hands as though he wanted to get me right around the neck, and says, "Come! come!—anything that you least desire either in earth or heaven." I saw that he meant me, and I rose up and said that I could not think of one single thing that I really desired. Said I, "I hav enough of this world's good to last me while I stop here, and I don't feel as though I wanted any more; and as for heavenly or spiritual things, I hav a fair share, for I was sanctified by the Holy Ghost." "Glory to God!" he yelled. Said I, "The sanctification of the Holy Ghost carries its mark with it, and the mark is a spiritual gift. Paul tells you all about it so plain that we need not make any mistakes, and he that has a spiritual gift may claim sanctification by the Holy Ghost, and no others hav a right to make the claim." By that time he had squatted by the bench with the rest, and I picked up my hat and left. I got off about forty rods, turned around, made a very low bow, and bid the camp good-bye.

E. W. CRESSEY.

PACIFIC, MO., Aug. 11, 1884,

MR. EDITOR: I thought I would accommodate you with those back numbers you called for without saying a word, but, dear friend, it seems impossible for me to do so because of what I read. As a rule, insult is heaped on injury. Much I hav suffered in body and mind; much through what is denounced as a fraud and a humbug. That is, being subject to spirit control and influence. I say, all this injury, all this ridicule, and these names of fraud, idiots, and what not, are very bitter. I, together with all those who believe in such, am confronted and denounced for their writing. Here, again, is this "Realistic Meditation" of Otto Wettstein occupying the first and foremost place in THE TRUTH SEEKER, as though it was the greatest truth, when, in reality, it is the sheerest nonsense. He, the almighty, self-created, fails to create a spirit. The elements that he gathers vanish. O my! O my! and that is evidence per se there are no souls—no spirits. Are such ideas, such assumptions, not idiotic? Let me ask this mighty reasoner, has he made himself, or is his capacity—the power of his state—a mighty reasoner, as he is himself? Hav the laws which constitute him created him, or he them? Now I demand of him, and them (his kind), to say which. Only a fool can talk the way he does. What? organisms may be analyzed and resolved into their component parts by man, and yet that which does it has, after all, no real existence? And with this same "none-real," this same "nonentity," he would undertake to analyze, to dissect, a human soul or spirit, nature's whole and total ego! You! who declared in the Iron-Clad Age that this world was but an insignificant dot! What must you compare to it? Now, answer. If there were no spirit, no mind, or entity, what could analyze, what could solve the object, what could judge of cause and contend it itself as the condition? Now, I want you to come right out on that. Tell us, deluded Spiritualists, what sort of matter your matter is that can claim such prerogativ of conceiving. Has it never occurred to you, sir, that spirit is not a concrete affair, and does not bear the same relation to the object sense? Is corn the same as whisky, or wine as grape? How would you prove it? How would you prove man a spirit when he is dead? Your whole three columns contain nothing that has a rational relation to matter and spirit. You talk a great deal about game, but never once call attention to the hunter, which is spirit. Whether the spirit world is a reality or not, thought has object, and so has the dream, and you know it. Does that not prove such a state? Ah, but you cannot apply it, you say. That is just what is the matter. Because it is in spirit, that is the why. A. H. KRUGER.

BOULDER CREEK, CAL., Aug. 7, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Here I am, back in California. I hav been traveling since May, and hav been able to get and read but five or six copies of the good old TRUTH SEEKER in all this time. You are no doubt sending my TRUTH SEEKER to Russellville, Tenn., where I stopped for over two years. I could not endure the enervating heat of the South. I was raised there, and lived there until I was twenty-five years of age, but hav lived from 1850 to 1881 here in California. I hav lived longer in this state than in any other, so this is properly my home; and I am proud of it, chiefly because it is one of the most Liberal states in the Union, and that you know is equivalent to saying it is one of the most enlightened. I love this climate. It is warm – yes, we may even say it is hot, but the cool breezes prevent the sun from baking our brains into superstitious pancakes, as in Tennessee and the most Southern states. I find that the Jehovah doctrins flourish best in hot climates, and am fully convinced that the gentleman who invented the idea that evil spirits are most effectually punished in the hottest of all climates, had utterly failed to observe how very favorable extreme heat is to the growth of superstition.

I am behind for the year of 1884, but will pay up soon. I hav hardly been here long enough to get my breath good yet, but hav found a man who wants to try THE TRUTH SEEKER for three months. I think, judging from the way he talks, he will become a permanent subscriber. I send you the postage stamps. Please send THE TRUTH SEEKER to the address of said man, viz., Boulder Creek, Santa Cruz Co., Cal.—there, I hav forgotten the name of the man. I will go right off to the adjoining place and see him. Later.—I hav been to see him and now inclose his name. WM. L. WARLEY.

ST. JOHNS, ARIZ., Aug., 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Before reading Col. Kelso's book, I wrote to a young lady cousin of mine who resides with her parents in the town of Modesto, California, to get her opinion of the colonel; and knowing her to be strictly orthodox, I expected she would giv the colonel a real Christian send-off. Here is what she says of Col. Kelso: "As to Col. Kelso, I do not know him personally, but papa is well acquainted with him, and says Col. Kelso is a good man, and that everybody likes him. Papa says the only objection he has to Mr. Kelso is on account of his Infidelity. By occupation Mr. Kelso is a teacher, and a good one too; he is also a poet, and occasionally writes poetry. Papa says he is strictly honest in all his dealings." Her orthodox opinion of the colonel would not hav biased me one way or the other; I simply wrote to get her views out of mere curiosity. It is strange the Christian press cannot see one redeeming virtue in an Infidel. No matter how honorably he may act toward his fellow-man, if he but holds independent views on religious matters contrary to the established dogmas, he must be ostracized. This proves their weakness, for if their so-called religion is of divine origin, and not an institution of man, they should not hav come to fear for the result, as the omnipotent, whatever or whoever that may be, certainly has the power, according to the Christian view, to take care of his own affairs I hav too high an opinion of the human understanding, too much confidence in the natural common sense of mankind, to believe for a moment that a single Bible-pounder of the period, who possesses as much reasoning power as a clam, can or does believe the divine-origin humbug; but on the other hand, he or they know full well the Christian religion, and all others, are mere inventions of man, gotten up for his own selfish interests.

Inclosed please find three dollars, for which send one "Bible Myths."

Go on with the good work, enlightening all who desire to know the truth. Hoping that truth and reason must prevail, I am Yours in the cause, A. F. BANTA.

VINELAND, N. J., July 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Perry, in his criticism of my last communication, states that Mr. Putnam says that that which perceives and knows of forms is nothing. If I understand Mr. Putnam, he says that that which perceives and knows is matter, but that perception and thought are not things. When I ask, Are the senses that perceive and the brain which knows not things? Mr. Perry says: "It seems that the gentlemen makes no distinction between sensations and perceptions and the organs by which they are conveyed to the mind. Now, I ask, if it is the mind that perceives and knows of things, of what use are organs to convey sensations and perceptions to the mind? We know there are nerves that lead to the brain, but what nerve leads to the mind? Again, Mr. Perry says, "The thought that moves the form is better and higher than the form, no matter how beautiful the latter may be." Now, this assertion I deny, for it is on the body that thought and its quality depends. The body is not that gross thing Spiritualists would hav us believe. It is self-acting, it generates its own force, and builds up its own frame; it feels by the use of its nerves, and thinks by the action of its brain; it needs no parasite to prompt or guide it.

Mr. Perry asks, "How does he know that consciousness, having evolved from, or by any other means associated with, the most advanced organic forms, will at death, cease to be so associated?" I know it because the dead form is not conscious. Consciousness is only evolved by a living organic form. Again he says, "I do not believe that friend Rothwell has studied all the facts of nature, and I doubt his authority for saying that the mind decays with the body, and at death there is no more thought, as thought is but nervous motion." It is not necessary to hav studied all the facts of nature to know that the mind decays with the body. I hav known several instances, and I will refer to the account of the death of Mr. Weed, where it is stated that for some time before his death his mind failed. And Mr. Emerson, I believe, for some time before his death showed proof of mental decay.

In conclusion I will refer to Mr. Perry's last assertion. He says the body and mind are not one thing, but two things—intimately connected and related, but still distinct things. This is equal to saying that a bell and its sound are not one thing, but two things—intimately connected and related, but still distinct things. Can Mr. Perry show that sound is a thing? Respectfully, P. ROTHWELL.

BURR OAK, MICH., Aug. 12, 284.

MR. EDITOR: In a letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 2d, Mr. John A. Gerting says he would like the paper better "if you printed fewer articles on Spiritualism, which I consider a grand humbug." Did not Mr. Gerting feel conscious of a little selfishness creeping over him when he penned that remark? No matter how grand a humbug Spiritualism may be, there are many estimable citizens who sincerely believe that a pure and valuable philosophy may be established on its alleged facts, and those persons ought not to be deprived of the privilege of making their statements. Being an Agnostic, of course, I hav yet to see the first particle of evidence that any such thing as a spirit ever existed, but THE TRUTH SEEKER comes nearer my ideal of a Freethought paper just because it admits an occasional article on Spiritualism, the tariff, and other questions upon which its readers are certain to disagree. The present management cannot be too highly commended for showing clearly that the pipe of bigotry is entirely out in THE TRUTH SEEKER office; and let me add that the moment it is lit that moment the influence of the paper will begin to decline. Instead of being an annoyance, it is a real pleasure to me to see the supreme and loving confidence in Spiritualism shown by such persons as Mrs. Severance. See how happy she is in her rock-rooted faith, and how sure that the object of her devotion is a fountain of blessings at which thirsty wayfarers hav already been greatly refreshed, and whose streams of joy will flow yet more copiously in the good time coming! But I would kindly suggest to those very confident persons that it would place them on safer ground, and they would convince just as many if they would use the word believe, instead of know, when referring to supernatural things. No man knows anything that cannot be demonstrated. There may be a degree of probability so great that we are almost forced to regard it as equivalent to certainty, but if any element of proof is lacking, we should not use the word know to express our opinion of the matter. It is strange that there are intelligent people in this country at this day who cannot see that a positiv assertion either for or against the existence of a God or a supernatural world, is simply a waste of so much breath that might be better employed. When all the data and conditions of proof are absolutely wanting to a proposition, the "I believe" of the old church creeds is as strong an expression as any one is justified in making. In regard to politics I am glad to see that the course of THE TRUTH SEEKER is above reproach. There is much temptation to mix in political discussion, but to do so continuously, even though briefly, would prove ruinous to any Freethought paper. No matter how independent the paper may be, it is poison to its influence to be giving frequent expressions of opinion in regard to candidates, parties, political squabbles, etc. An editor of a Liberal paper cannot be too careful of those dangerous reefs. On political matters THE TRUTH SEEKER wisely says but little, and even less, I think, would be still better. I hav a smaller Liberal journal in mind that would do well to heed the above remarks. N. G. WATKINS.

CHARMING DALE, ARIZONA, June 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Books and your explanatory letter arrived today at Charming Dale. So you see that Charming Dale is still here and is likely to always remain here.

Now for a story, and a true one. Honor is the subject of my story.

In the year 1867, I emigrated with my family of wife and five children to this country. Neither pen nor tongue can describe the difficulties through which I passed in journeying to and making a permanent settlement in this country, so the narration of the many skirmishes with the nativs, the robbing of my stock, the burning of my house, the stealing of my crops, we will leave only to be remembered among the things that were. But after arriving here all my energies were bent to the building up of this country, and especially its educational interests. And as the result of one branch of my efforts, Charming Dale sprang out of its wild and naturally worthless condition into a lovely garden surrounded by cosy dwellings and several work-shops, and ornamented with artificial groves of both wild and fruit-bearing trees, and shrubbery both useful and ornamental. Every season—yes, every day—has added new luster to the charms of Charming Dale. Its location is on a generally-traveled road, the mail route, which, before the coming of the A. P. Railroad, was the most popular, a daily mail, with its eastern terminus at Prescott, the capital of the territory, and its western on the Pacific coast, passing daily. I secured the establishment of a post-office, and was myself the post-master for three years, during which time a series of mail robbing from registered packges was committed in the office at Prescott. The post-master there was a Christian, activ in his church, but coy and utterly reticent when it was discovered that a robbery had been committed in his office, and although he did not do the robbing, yet being responsible, therefore he used his Christian position to cast the suspicion upon me. The detectiv agent—a fawning villain—used every effort in his power to convict me, and twice placed me under arrest, seized my office, and all the paraphernalia belonging thereto, and after giving me duplicate schedule receipts for the same he stole them, leaving me nothing whereby I could establish my rights or claims against the government. He grossly misrepresented me in San Francisco and made no returns to Washington of the amount of postage stamps he took from me, without which there was a small balance due me from the government, and in posting up the auditor issued a small warrant in my favor, which I sent by a gentleman to San Francisco. It was repudiated, and the bearer insulted, with the statement, "That is from the mail-robbing postmaster."

The mail matter which you sent was unfortunate enough to fall into the San Francisco office, and, no doubt, to continue the insult, it was returned. If it had been allowed to come on I should hav received it at my nearest post-office. I am an Infidel in the entire sense of the word, which is only another name for a truly honest man—honest to the world, and honest to the convictions of his own senses. When they ceased to persecute me, one of the deputies in the Prescott office, fearing that they would spot him, cut his own throat, and thus relieved the world of his presence and the only witness against the remaining one. And thus the matter stands to-day. It has never been sifted out, and probably never will, while I stand in the eyes of government officials as a mail robber. Trembling now as I am on the verge of the grave, justice will never be done me. But as long as I liv, Charming Dale is my address, and damn the government officials that refuse to forward my mail matter.

Yours and THE TRUTH SEEKER's forever, S. C. ROGERS.

RICHFORD, VT., July 25, 284.

MR. EDITOR: "But without faith, it is impossible to please God. For he that cometh to God must believe that God exists, and is a rewarder of those who diligently seek him" (Heb. xi, 6). Here it is intimated that some one may come to God and not believe he exists, or that he is a rewarder! The devil will hav no such folks, if there is a devil. In this text is shown the grand secret of priestcraft. There is not in the world to-day one particle of good evidence, to prove to our sober reason and senses that there is such a real entity as the Jewish or Christian's God in the universe, aside from nature. What is nature? Answer. Boundless space, and all it contains. But all priests of superstition, Brahman, Bhuddist, Zoroastrian, Mohammedan, Egyptian, and all others, hav fabricated names, and made them persons, real Almighties, who created all things out of nothing. So each of the thousands of gods is the only true and living God, and every sect is the only true superstition, religion, idolatry. The Jewish, Christian God is omnipotent, omnipresent, omniscient, and immutable. He who does not believe an omnipotent God could not drive out the Canaanites, because they had chariots of iron, shall be damned! He who does not believe that an omnipresent, immutable God came down to see if Adam and Eve were in the garden-trap, and talked with Noah about drowning the world, and came down to see the Tower of Babel (Gen. xi, 5), and came down to see if the Sodomites had done as he heard they had—"If not, he would know"—(Gen. xviii, 21); also came down upon Mount Sinai (Gen. xix, 20)—he that believeth these things not shall be damned. Who can believe that an immutable, unchangeable God could make the universe and pronounce it very good (Gen. i, 31), and be sorry afterwards, and grieved at his heart? We hav no evidence that the Jewish God ever made one man know that such a thing ever existed. We wonder that a being with such attributes as are ascribed to him did not make everybody know positivly. Proof conclusiv that there is not such a thing! Then the Jesus, that came into the world to save sinners, tasted death for every man, claimed that he was co-equal and co-eternal with the Jew God, and never made one person, even his own mother, know that he was anything but the carpenter's son, at which trade he worked until he began to be about thirty years old, and had increased in wisdom and stature (Luke iii, 23; ii, 52). Wonder when God Almighty began to be about thirty years of age! What year was it Jesus would not allow Simon Barjona, or anybody else, to call him Messiah? He forbid anyone to tell it. Yet we are all to be damned if we do not believe he was perfect God and perfect man, of the same substance, power, and eternity with the father (Methodist creed, Art. 1 and 2, John Wesley; also see Athanasius). Jesus did not reveal to Simon that he was Messiah, but said his father had (Matt. xvi, 17). Faith is the gift of God. We are saved by hope. We are saved through fear. We are saved by faith. "Faith cometh by hearing" (Rom. x, 17) a thousand differing mystagogs who tell lies in a pulpit for a salary. All promis heaven to those who employ them. All superstitious faith is equally sincere—all a human damning curse. Real things here are all we hav got a capacity to deal with. We know nothing about God, devil, heaven, hell, or future life, only what priests tell us. We know not what any Bible means, only as we hire a priest to tell us. That is our faith on which we rely. It is a great mystery that the Christian's God, who knew enough to make the universe out of nothing, could not manage it without an Abraham, and Moses, giving the keys to Simon Barjona, the Satan and the pope, now his vicegerent on earth. There are some twenty texts in our Bible that affirm we shall hav no knowledge or conseiousness after we are dead. What if there are as many that lead us to think that when we are dead we are not dead, if all priests do affirm it for a salary? God don't know, or he would not hav made our Bible to support both notions. Who knows that man individually will liv after he is dead? No God has told us; we hav nothing but priests babbling for a salary. Ever since two men lived on earth, the law of humanity has required: "Do to others as you would hav them do to you. And do not to others what you would not hav done to yourself." Which covers all morality and virtue—the whole duty of man. All else is hypocrisy. JOSEPH NOYES.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

This Life is What we Make It.

Let's oftener talk of noble deeds,
And rarer of the bad ones,
And sing about our happy days,
And not about the sad ones.
We were not made to fret and sigh,
And when grief sleeps to wake it,
Bright happiness is standing by—
This life is what we make it.

Let's find the sunny side of men,
Or be believers in it;
A light there is in every soul
That takes the pains to win it.
Oh! there's a slumbering good in all,
And we perchance may wake it;
Our hands contain the magic wand;
This life is what we make it.

Then here's to those whose loving hearts
Shed light and joy about them!
Thanks be to them for countless gems
We ne'er had known without them.
Oh! this should be a happy world
To all who may partake it;
The fault's our own if it is not—
This life is what we make it.

Aunt Avis.

"Won't you tell me about my Aunt Avis?" said little Susie one day. "You know she is dead now, and I went to the funeral. It was all so strange to me, for I never saw her so still before. Poor Aunt Avis, she is resting now," and Susie breathed a little sigh, and drew her chair close to mine.

Aunt Avis was "great-aunt" to little Susie, by her father's side, and "aunt" by courtesy to almost everybody in her neighborhood, so, with others, I, too, called her aunt.

"Will you begin now?" inquired Susie, with her usual impatience.

"Yes," I said, "I will begin now, and you may ask all the questions you like."

Children like to ask questions. It is their right to do so, for everything is new to their young minds, and they are entitled to civil, intelligent, and comprehensiv answers.

"Aunt Avis was born ninety years ago, in Dighton, a pretty town on Taunton River."

"Ninety years is a good long while, isn't it, auntie?"

"Yes; almost a century."

"And what is a century?"

"It is a period of time—a hundred years. Well, when Aunt Avis was born—"

"And what is it to be born, auntie? What does it mean?"

"It means that a new being is come into the life of this world, to grow from babyhood into childhood; to expand, develop, progress on to womanhood or manhood, according to sex; to hav interests, hopes, joys, and fears; to work, to plan, to love, and to grieve and be sad and sorrowful; to make mistakes and blunders, sometimes; to finally grow aged and—"

"Yes, but go on about Aunt Avis."

"Well, we must suppose she was a healthy, handsome baby, and was loved, petted, and played with, and that her parents made many plans for her, and had many bright hopes for her future. This was a new country ninety and a hundred years ago, and Aunt Avis did not hav advantages that little girls hav to-day. Everybody spun and wove all the cloth that was used in making the garments that they wore, and it was not of the finest quality, either, but it was homespun and durable."

"What is homespun and durable?"

"That which is spun at home, and durable is that which lasts a long time."

"Aunt Avis was durable, then, wasn't she? She lasted so long—ninety years."

"Yes, she was durable. She was of good stock?"

"What do you mean by good stock?"

"I mean that her parents and grandparents were healthy, and not diseased; that they were firm and hardy, had good blood and good constitutions, and gave the same to her, which is the best heritage under the sun. Do you understand?"

"Yes, auntie—go on."

"There were no steamboats, railroads, telegraphs, telephones, electric lights then; no stoves, no carpets, no gas, not any of the modern conveniences that are considered indispensable to comfortable living, nowadays."

"But I suppose people were just as happy then as now—don't you think so?"

"Perhaps happier. Surroundings do not make happiness. Some who hav all that heart can wish for, as to comfort, physically, are yet not happy. The rich and those who hav the most luxuries are sometimes the most miserable. They suffer the same as the poor."

"Did Aunt Avis hav to suffer?"

"She did—very much. She was not rich, except in her good health and happy spirits, but she did not suffer simply because she was poor—oh, no! Very early she was trained to work, to use the foot-wheel, the spinning-wheel, and the great looms that made the yarn she spun into cloth. She had little time to play, as girls hav in these days, but when she did play she no doubt enjoyed it as much as any girl does to-day. She was witty and lively, and made many friends. In course of time she became a young woman, and then she had lovers. Among them was a young soldier of the war of 1812. Aunt Avis was bright, smart, and industrious. He thought she would make him a good wife, and he wanted to marry her. After a brief courtship they were married, and began housekeeping. And we may suppose that Aunt Avis was as happy as the birds when they begin nest-building in the spring of the year. She worked and sung all day, just as the birds do. By and by there came a sweet little baby to her—a new, fresh, little life, as bright and beautiful as the rosy morning."

"I s'pose she was happier than ever, then," said Susie.

"Yes, she must hav been. The world suddenly grew broader and brighter, and she felt a new and stronger interest in life, when she held that little bud of a human being in her fond, motherly arms. And after awhile when another 'wee darling' came, and she had two little chubby babies to care for and love, she doubtless thought she had reached the acme of human happiness. Of course she had to work harder than ever, but she was young and strong, not more than twenty, and she did not mind hard work, but toiled and sang merrily all day. At that time they lived in a secluded spot away over by the 'swamp meeting-house,' as the little church was called. People in those far-off days ate coarse food, and a great deal of corn and rye meal. They carried the corn that they raised on the farms to grist mills, and had it ground into meal. The mill that ground for Aunt Avis was a good long distance off, not far this side of the city of Providence, in Rhode Island. One day Aunt Avis said to her husband, 'We are almost out of meal, dear, did you know it?'"

"'Is that so?—then I must go to mill tomorrow. It is a long journey, and I shall hav to start by break of day.' And the father of the two pretty babies tossed the oldest one in the air, and said, 'What does daddy's boy want meal for?'

"'To make some hastee poodin'!' lisped the little fellow, then three years old. 'It is dood.'

"I think it is good, too!" laughed Susie. "It does very well for a change."

"Joel Barlow wrote a long poem to Hasty Pudding. He says:

'I sing the sweets I know, the charms I feel,
My morning incense, and my evening meal—
The sweets of Hasty Pudding. Come, dear bowl,
Glide o'er my palate, and inspire my soul.
The milk beside thee, smoking from the kine,
Its substance mingled, married in with thine,
Shall cool and temper thy superior heat,
And save the pains of blowing while I eat.'

"He thought Hasty Pudding superior to 'Hoe-cake,' 'Johnny-cake,' or 'Corn-dodgers,' and ended his poem thus:

'Fear not to slaver; 'tis no deadly sin.
Like the free Frenchman, from your joyous chin
Suspend the ready napkin; or, like me,
Poise with one hand your bowl upon your knee;
Just in the zenith your wise head project;
Your full spoon, rising in a line direct,
Bold as a bucket, heeds no drops that fall,
The wide-mouth'd bowl will surely catch them all.'"

"Well, go on with the story; it is all true, isn't it?" and Susie raised her beautiful eyes inquiringly.

"Every word. The next morning, bright and early, the horse was saddled and bridled, a bushel of corn in a bag was swung across the horse's back, and Aunt Avis brought the smallest baby, only three weeks old then, for its papa to kiss, while the other baby clung around his knees and said: 'Daddy tiss me, too,' which he did, and then, taking the face of Aunt Avis between his two hands, he kissed her, telling her to keep the supper warm, as he would, perhaps, hav to wait for the grist, and would not, probably, return till nightfall. Then he mounted his horse and rode away whistling.

"Aunt Avis went on with her work, nursed the babies, and sang lullabies to them all day, while she thought of the lover husband gone to mill. Now comes the strangest part of this story."

"Yes, auntie."

"About sunset, Aunt Avis began to look up the road, and to listen for the sound of horse's feet. She kept the table waiting, nor would she eat one mouthful till he should come, but she gave the children their supper and put them to bed. There were no near neighbors, and she was alone with her children. It was in August, and warm weather. Night came on with its lengthening shadows, and still he did not come. The merry song was hushed on Aunt Avis's lips as she watched and waited. What could hav detained him so long? She grew anxious and tearful. Presently the moon came up, and, in the bright moonlight, she could see a long distance up and down the narrow country road. Nine, ten, eleven o'clock by the hour-glass, and still he did not come. Throwing her blue and white apron over her head, she went out in the dead of the night, and walked a little way up the road listening. Tall ferns and golden rod with its heavy yellow clusters of flowers grew on either side of the road, and brushed her clothing as she passed. There was no breeze stirring, and the stillness was oppressiv, only broken by the call of some night bird, or some animal as it fled swiftly to its home amid the sumach and and young maples. Back and forth she walked at intervals, straining her eyes and ears, watching, listening, with heavy, aching heart the whole night through, and still he did not come.

"The next day a messenger was dispatched to the mill, and returned at night with no tidings of the missing husband and father, who had not been even at the mill. Day after day, night after night, Aunt Avis watched, waited, listened, looked for the return of her husband. The summer fled into autumn, and autumn was lost in the winter, and still he came not, nor were any tidings heard of the wanderer, or of his horse. Ah, how Aunt Avis trusted and hoped for his coming! How she scorned the thought of his faithlessness! He would come, he must come! He could not so heartlessly desert her and his little ones—she would not believe it. Many nights she would go out in the road, and look eagerly, tearfully, hopefully, for his approach, but he never came. There was no telegraph then, no railway, as I hav said, only the slow, plodding stage coach, but by-and-by Aunt Avis began to watch for a letter from him. But all in vain. The months lagged along until they grew into a year, and that year went to make other years, and still he did not come.

One baby sickened and died, and its dear little body was laid away in the ground.

The song did not return to the lips of Aunt Avis again, and slowly, painfully, she realized that she was alone with her one boy, to battle with life as best she could."

"She didn't die, Auntie?"

"No, she could not die, because she was expecting her husband every day, and she felt that she could not die till he came.

"She had to put her mind to the business of living, providing for herself and the little one still with her. 'I must work, or I shall go wild—I shall be a raving maniac,' she said.

"And so she toiled, early and late, and only wept in the night, when everbody else slept.

"She toiled and saved, for he might return poor and desolate, she said. People proffered her means, but, 'I am not a pauper, nor a beggar,' was her reply; 'I will make my own way,' and she did.

"After awhile she built a comfortable home, and began to hav a bank account, and as the years went by, there was no need for her to work so hard.

"'But I must work,' she said; 'I cannot be idle and liv.'

"Youth and the meridian of life passed, and the weight of years came upon her, and in her old age her idolized son, her only stay and comfort, was swept from her. He died, and left her alone, except one granddaughter.

"Nobody understood the great sorrow that overflowed her heart then."

"Poor Aunt Avis!" said Susie, sadly.

"Everybody said, 'Poor Aunt Avis!'

"But that did not help her any!" and Susie dropped a tear upon my hand.

"No; but it was sweet to hav sympathy in her trials. She did not sink then, even, but toiled on, and sat by the window looking still, occasionally, for the one who never would come in this world. In her burial lot in the cemetery she caused to be erected a marble tablet inscribed with her husband's name, and the date of his departure from his family, after the words, 'Left his home.' When she was ninety, she was still hale and vigorous, but a settled melancholy was in her features, even when she smiled. She tried to be cheerful and pleasant to all, and was respected by everybody who know her. Some exposure caused her illness, and, when it became apparent that she had completed her journey in life, she felt glad, and went out of the world that had brought her so much life-long sorrow happy, peaceful, and glad that she had reached the end. She accumulated, by her industry and frugality, a handsome fortune, and went away owing no one anything."

"It was a sad life, wasn't it?" said Susie, crying softly.

"It was, and yet a very noble one. We may learn a useful lesson from that sad and troubled life. She had many virtues, was kind, forgiving, generous, industrious, and prudent. The sick found in her a tender friend; the sorrowful, a ready sympathizer, and faithful, kind, and true she was in all the relations and trials of life. She did not sink under misfortune, nor sit down and grieve over her great troubles. Her days were spent in activity, in doing good, and, if there is a heaven anywhere beyond this world, we feel sure Aunt Avis deserved its best and highest joys."

"She ought to hav something good to make up for all the bad that fell to her lot here, auntie, hadn't she?"

"Yes; I think she should hav some recompense. But she left a bright example for us to contemplate. We must not sink under trouble, but be brave, and look above it all. We must forget sorrow in useful, activ work for the good of others."

"Yes, auntie; and now, will you please put Aunt Avis' story in verse so I may commit it to memory?"

"Yes, dear, if you want me to," said I.

"Right off?"

"Yes, right off. Here it goes:

Aunt Avis once was young and fair,
With comely face and soft brown hair;
Her voice was tender, sweet, and low
As murm'ring brooklet's gentle flow.
In time came suitors her to woo,
With words of hope and promis true;
From all, she chose the soldier brave,
And unto him her whole heart gave.

In sweetest trust, they then were wed,
"For better and not worse," he said.
And all their days were days of joy,
Brimfull of love without alloy.
Aunt Avis felt her bliss complete,
Of heaven sure a foretaste sweet,
When babies two came her to bless
With wealth of precious happiness.

One morn the husband, smiling, said,
As to the door his horse he led,
"Dear wife, I go to mill to-day,
But not long shall I be away."
He kissed her lips, so red, so sweet,
And kissed the babies, face and feet.
"Good-bye," he said, "my darlings three,
And keep the supper warm for me."

Aunt Avis watched him ride away,
Her fond young husband, bright and gay,
Then cheerily to her work she turned,
With spinning flax all day concerned.

At length 'twas time for him to come,
He who had made the light of home;
Aunt Avis laid her work away,
Wond'ring why he should so long stay.
She watched the shadows slanting west,
And rocked her babies to sweet rest.
No supper would she touch, till he,
Her husband dear, with her should be.
But daylight into twilight crept,
Till night upon earth's bosom slept,
And still she waited there alone,
Waited the coming of her own.

Ten—eleven—twelve!—the midnight hour
Wrapped in darkness leaf and flower;
Anxious, she listened at the door,
For ne'er had he so stayed before.

That night, and many nights the same,
She watched for one who never came;
Listening, waiting, night and day,
Till youth and beauty fled away.

Oh, what suspense, and doubt, and dread!
Was he alive, or was he dead?
For since that morn that dawned serene,
Horse, nor rider, ne'er was seen.

One babe soon vanished from the earth;
The other in fair manhood's worth,
Passed sudden into dreamless sleep,
And left her all alone to weep.

With her, to labor was to pray;
With earnest work she wreathed each day,
And every night, through shadows dim,
She kept the supper warm for him;
And waited still with hopes and fears,
Through the mists of seventy years,
Till patience, industry, and thrift,
In gloomy cloud made shining rift.

"To sit and think," she said, "would kill,
But work bids storms of grief, 'be still.'"
And though her heart was sad and sore,
She toiled till wealth came to her door;
With it she many comforts gave,
And some, from sin, her hands did save;
And her good deeds to young and old,
Returned in love, a thousand fold.

Pure, and more pure, grew her sweet face,
Saintly, in tender, holy grace,
Until she entered into rest,
By ninety years crowned and carest.

O woman's love and woman's trust!
Faithful, till dust doth enter dust!
If blessings wait beyond the pall,
Aunt Avis, thou deservest them all.

BEES! BEES! BEES!

FROM $2,000 TO $5,000 A YEAR KEEPING HONEY BEES.

The particulars are simply to prevent the great loss that most bee masters hav to contend with annually. Then giv the bees a chance to increase and collect surplus honey to their fullest capacity; all of which can be easily accomplished by using the kind of hive described in "Kidder's Secrets of Bee-keeping."

Send for the Book and see how easily it can be done with a few swarms of bees.

THIS BOOK IS A RELIABLE GUIDE

to all persons that keep bees, especially to the novice or new beginner, as it teaches how all of the troubles and disappointments that the bee master is liable to, can be successfully overcome, such as Foul Brood, Dysentery, Bee Robbery, Ravages of Moth Millers, Loss of Queen, loss of bees in Swarming time, by their flight to the forests, also the great loss in winter and early spring management, which is usually more than all other ways combined. This book will also inform the bee master HOW BEES WILL INCREASE AND THROW OFF SWARMS to an enormous extent, all conditions being favorable. The old stocks will frequently swarm three or four times each, and oft times the first swarms thrown off will swarm once or twice each, with a good hive and right kind of management. In warmer climates the bees will increase and swarm to a much greater extent.

GREAT YIELD OF SURPLUS HONEY.

This Book will inform the bee master how to get the greatest amount of surplus honey, and at the same time hav it in small packages weighing three-quarters of a pound to two o. three pounds, as may be desired, which will command the highest price in market. In a good season the bee keeper may calculate on two or three hundred pounds of surplus honey from each old stock, and from fifty to one hundred pounds from the earlier young swarms, especially if they do not over-swarm.

NO MORE BEE-STINGS IN MANAGING BEES.

The Book will post the bee-keepers how to manage them when putting them on, or taking off surplus honey boxes, and not get stung in the whole operation.

BEE-KEEPING FOR OUR SONS AND DAUGHTERS.

It being the most pleasant, as well as the most profitable business that young people can engage in, and at the same time remain at home with their parents. The author has known of several young men who commenced the culture of the bee in their teens, and are now making more money than their fathers who run the farm, and doing it easily and with small investments. We must also remember that the women folks often make the best of bee-keepers, and not so liable to neglect them as the men folks.

KIDDER'S BEE BOOK

should be in the hands of all persons who like honey, and take an interest in the little honey bee. It contains more matter than many books that sell for two dollars, and is embellished with numerous cuts and drawings. There is no trouble, loss, or damage that a bee master has to contend with but what the book will giv the proper remedy by simply referring to the index, and that will point to the page where it is fully explained.

In order to bring this book more prominently before the mass of bee keepers, the Author proposes to giv, as a premium to each purchaser of a book, from this date until Aug. next, the privilege of making his Celebrated Patent Bee Hive, as spoken of in book, for their own use (but not to sell) Free of Charge, otherwise there will be the usual Patent Fee of Five Dollars to each individual that wishes to make and use the hive

PRICE, BOARD BOUND, 85 cents.

N. B, The directions for hive making with cuts, drawings, etc., will be inclosed within each book sold, until Sept next, (not longer). Now is the time for all bee-keepers to avail themselves of this liberal offer, which is simply to buy a book at the Regular Price, before Sept. next

Poetry.

The Fiddler of the White Breast-Water.

As a grand old harp, his violin
Had a world of unsung music in,
Sweet as the notes of an Alpine horn;
And Uncle John was a Saxon born,
And the power that thrilled his trembling hand
Came down from the shores of his Fatherland;
That Fatherland with the flowing Rhine,
Whose hills were red with the Autumn wine,
Where mountain tops in lone clouds dim
Had sung of evolution's hymn.

Though the children played in the corner near,
He lent no eye nor list'ning ear,
But kept to the spirit sweet within
That dwelt with him and his violin.
As he drew his elbow to and fro
With a heavenly light on his face aglow,
We often thought of the pair that died
As standing there at the father's side.
His darling Bessie—she surely came,
And the babe that had no earthly name,
Entrancing his soul, inspiring his face
With the peace of their final dwelling-place.

Not the grieving wind o'er the western hill,
Nor the gliding log in the hungry mill,
Nor the leaping flames, with roar and din,
Could dull the tone of that violin.
His eyes so pale, of German blue,
Transformed with song they bloomed anew,
Borrowing dyes of the purple aster;
And the chiming chorus rolling faster,
Then moaning sad, with a cadence low,
Or soft and sweet as the streamlet's flow,
Reminding us of the sleeping daughter
Alone by the spray of the White Breast-water.
And was it fancy, or did I dream?
Perhaps 'twas the mist from a silver stream;—
But something flitting to and fro
Trembled upon his fiddle-bow,
Stirring the locks of his thin gray hair
That touched the back of his home-made chair.
One with the gift of second sight
Said my dreaming was partly right;
He who dwelt in the soul of things
And walked in the sheen of angel wings
Saw, a winter's night while the fiddler played,
Two misty shapes that softly laid
Their gentle hands on his waving hair,
Around and over his high-backed chair,
Caressing his cheeks with tender grace,
Bringing a balm to his aged face;
While mortal eyes but marked the glow
Of the fire dancing swift or slow,
Chasing the shadows about the room,
Through the great wheel's rim or lumb'ring loom,
'Mong skeins of yarn from the brown old rafter,
That echoed the children's rippling laughter.
Outer vision, with many a flaw,
Could scarcely credit the things he saw;
Unknown to the world or Uncle John,
His inner sight was beaming upon
The shadowy side, where an angel master
In white robes came, and sweet and faster
The thrilling anthems rising o'er us—
He heard above the angel chorus,
Tho' he never could tell how grand it seemed,
"But then," you say, he "only dreamed."
Mayhap he did, but this I know,
An orchestra swayed that fiddle bow,
Revealing a grace that was more divine
Than is often seen at the saintly shrine.
Born of the peaceful rest within,
Sweeping the chords of his violin,
A master mind wrought the infinit glow,
And laid the spell on his fiddle bow,
Sweet as the voice of the angel daughter,
Sleeping near to the White Breast-water.

Clearwater, Neb. MARY BAIRD-FINCH.

The Wounded Dragon.

In childhood's days I climbed an antique stair,
Leaning on columns, rich with quaint device;
And saw a sky blue as the heaven of Rome,
A stately charger, worth barbaric price;

A noble knight, in suit of armor gray,
A gentle girl, upon a palfrey white,
While a fierce lion sacred kept the path,
He challenged harmful beasts to deadly fight.

And often they essayed to wander on,
But a vast, loathsome dragon held their way;
The knight flung fearful darts to wound him sore,
The maiden's glance was pure and bright as day.

I read, you listen to my simple tale,
For Ingersoll hath slain a dragon vile;
While Scorn and many a doubt blocked up the way,
And Truth stood calmly near with patient smile.

ALHAZA.

Dollars and Cents.

I'll write you a ballad on dollars and cents,
Every line shall be perfectly true;
And I'm writing these verses on purpose, my friend,
To present a few home truths to you.

A quarter looks small when you're out with the "boys,"
Fifty cents or a dollar soon goes,
And a ride on the cars or a beer is but five,
Which is "nothing"—as every one knows.

If you squander a quarter each day of your life,
Though it may seem remarkably queer.
If you'd put it away in the bank you would hav
$91.25 in a year.

But a quarter a day isn't half what you waste,
If you count your occasional sprees;
What you waste will well pay for your board and your clothes,
And the rest you can save if you please.

So shut off your treating, and walk when you can,
And giv up the excitements you've craved,
And you'll be quite surprised at the end of the year
At the tidy amount you hav saved,

Twin Songs of Freedom.

A WORKMAN AS GOOD AS A KING.

The lords they may flaunt in their laces,
But these bright-plumaged birds never sing;
They grow rich 'pon their land-rents and plunder;
Oh, "A workman's as good as a king!"

They may prate in their places of power
That the current that flows in their veins
Is a "blue blood" that's finer than ours,
But the freeman such falsehood disdains!

O'er their heads mutters low the deep thunder;
The earthquake is slumb'ring beneath;
And the kings, at the wrath of the people,
Soon shall flee from their keen, fanged teeth!

From the wrath of a down-trodden people
They hav ground, like a worm, in the dust,
Hav enslaved by their mail-coated minions,
Hav debauched to their infamous lust!

Oh, arise, ye bruised, down-trodden millions!
With this shout make the firmament ring—
With the lesson the new age doth teach ye,
That "a workman's as good as a king!"

Look afar o'er the world's mighty chess-board!
Mark ye well yon vast game that is played
'Twixt tyrants, besotted with power,
And the workman, poor slave to his trade!

Poor slave, who receives but the pittance
Of a child, that the king of the land
May bedeck him with diamonds and purple,
While he laughs at the workman's demand!

Witness Ireland, submerged by her sorrow,
The tears that her children hav shed;
See her infants, slow-wasting by hunger,
Where gaunt famin nightly doth tread!

Look 'pon Russia, where, wilder and fiercer,
The hurricane howls through the sky,
With portent in a no distant future
The tyrant's destruction draws nigh!

Arise in your might, O my brethren!
For the new age salvation doth bring,
In the message it bears to the nations,
That "A workman's as good as a king!"

A PÆAN OF LIBERTY.

I sing of the Knights of Labor—
Of the peasant that guides the plough—
Of the hardy mariner, who doth tempt
The storm with his fearless prow.

I sing of the Knight of the Anvil—
Of the myriad sons of toil;
And I sing of the vampires, high in place,
Who fatten upon their spoil!

I sing of the haughty landlord,
Who extorts beyond his due
From the beaded brow of the artisan,
To waste 'pon his menial crew!

Yes, I sing of the Knights of Labor—
Of the shameful wrong they've borne;
And I sing of the doom of man-made kings,
And of Liberty's glorious dawn!

I behold, in no distant future,
A giant power arise;
And ten thousand years of insult
Flash forth from its flaming eyes!

Ten thousand years of oppression—
Ten thousand years of shame,
Fire the zeal of this threat'ning giant,
Whose birth from the people came!

Would'st know the name of this champion,
Who, ere long, shall level to earth
All its kings—all its purse-proud rulers—
Vain puppets of royal birth?

Then know ye its name, it is "Justice;"
And the will of the people cries
In a deaf'ning shout that kindles
Fresh flames in the giant's eyes!

Yea, tremble, ye arrogant sovereigns!
Lo! your doom it is writ on the wall,
As it was in the court of Belshazzar,
And your thrones and your temples must fall!

They shall sink at the blast of the trumpet,
E en as Jericho's sunk in the dust,
For the maelstrom draws nigh in the future,
To engulf your oppression and lust!

Oh, take courage—be joyful, poor workmen,
For the day of destruction draws nigh,
When the crown shall be rolled in the gutter,
And "Liberty" writ o'er the sky!

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

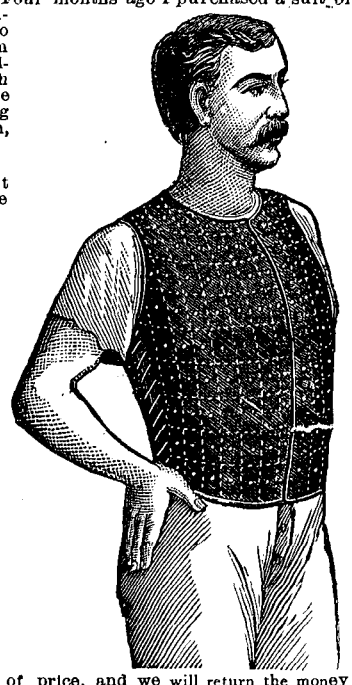
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Superfine Insoles,	1.00
Children's garments upon application.

Any of the above garments sent to any address upon receipt of price, and we will return the money if they are not as represented in every respect. If you are uncertain as to what would best suit your case send us word stating symptoms, and we will advise you what would be best suited to treat you. While our appliances are offered at less than one-third of what others are selling worthless appliances for, yet we will guarantee that the magnetic quality is a hundred fold superior to any other appliance ever offered the public, and will outlast the garments themselves. Every magnet is put through a particular process, and hav raised five times their own weight six months after being magnetized, while not a single appliance in the market will attract the smallest particle of iron, the majority of such worthless appliances having so-called magnets made of material no better than hoop-iron, and not capable of retaining magnetism for a moment. All of our garments are made from the very best material for the purpose, and will outlast any and all other garments now before the public. Every magnet is arranged in the garments upon scientific principles, and not haphazard as in all the others. We offer you therefore

The Only Scientific Magnetic Appliance Ever Constructed.

And challenge comparison with any of the so-called magnetic garments now offered under that head. At the same time the application of labor-saving machinery in our manufacture enables us to offer them about

ONE-THIRD THE PRICE HERETOFORE CHARGED,

So that we can say with truth, None are so poor that they cannot procure them, being but a trifle higher than ordinary clothing.

Remember that we are offering you the cheapest and best magnetic appliances in the market, and if upon receiving the garments they do not meet your expectation, return them at our expense and we will refund your money.

Ladies' Abdominal Jackets and Gentlemen's Vests are made to order, and a fit guaranteed.

Gems of Thought.

DESPISE the hypocrit, the liar, the defamer, and the man who attempts to do a deep wrong to a brother in the name of purity, of higher morality, and of superior virtue. Worse than all other mean acts are those performed by hypocrits under the cloak of purity and virtue.—D. M. Bennett.

BEFORE my meals, and after, I let myself loose from all thoughts, and I soon forget that I ever studied; a full mind takes away the body's appetite no less than a full body maketh a dull and unwieldly mind. Company, discourse, recreation, are now seasonable and welcome; then prepare for me a diet, not gluttonous but medicinal; the palate may not be pleased, but the stomach is, nor that for its own sake; neither would I think any of these comforts worthy respect in themselvs, but in their use, in their end, so far as they may enable me to better things. If I see any dish tempt my palate, I fear a serpent in that apple, and would please myself in a wilful denial; I rise capable of more, not desirous; not move immediately from my trencher to my book, but after some intermission. Moderate speed is a sure help to all proceedings—according to the old saw, Festina lente [make haste slowly]—when those things which are prosecuted with violence of endeavor or desire, either succeed not, or continue not.—Bishop Hall (1574—1656).

IF the Christian believes that he and he only has a divine revelation; that the truth has come to him supremely if not exclusivly; that his books are the sacred books, and all others are profane, then he must believe that the man who does not accept his belief does not accept the truth; is in the bonds of error, is on the way to death. And believing that truth, and truth alone, saves, he is convinced that the unbeliever—the more sincere the more stubborn—is not in the way of salvation, and must be reclaimed from his delusions. Hence the melancholy condition of the religious press all over the country—a condition that is a reproach and a scandal to charity. I undertake to say that I hav never seen a religious paper that had the conscience to be fair to opponents, that dared to be honest, that would be just, that was able to giv its due to any form of hostil opinions, that could take a position of even ordinary kindness toward the heretic.—Frothingham's Sectarian Spirit.

VIRTUE has this peculiar property, that at the same time that we admire her conduct, we long to copy the example. The goods of fortune we wish to enjoy; virtue we desire to practice; the former we are glad to receive from others; the latter we are ambitious that others should receive from us. The beauty of goodness has an attractiv power; it kindles in us at once an activ principle, it forms our manners, and influences our desires, not only when represented in a living example, but even in a historical example.—Plutarch's Lives.

WE hav seen that miraculous power in any individual is no guarantee for the correctness of his teaching. We hav seen that if the doctrins which Jesus taught approve themselvs to the understanding, and the uncorrupted heart, they are equally binding on our allegiance whether he wrought miracles in the course of his career or not. And if the truth that God is a loving father, and the precept, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," derive no corroboration from the resurrection of Lazarus or the youth of Nain, neither can they from that of Christ himself.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

WHATEVER weakens or disorders the internal frame, promotes the interests of superstition; and nothing is more destructiv to them than a manly, steady virtue, which either preserves us from disastrous, melancholy accidents, or teaches us to bear them. During such calm sunshine of the mind, these specters of false divinity never make their appearances. On the other hand, while we abandon ourselvs to the natural undisciplined suggestions of our timid and anxious heart, every kind of barbarity is ascribed to the supreme being, from the terrors with which we are agitated, and every kind of caprice, from the methods which we embrace in order to appease him. Barbarity, caprice, these qualities, however nominally disguised, we may universally perceive, form the ruling character of the deity in popular religions. Even priests, instead of correcting these depraved ideas of mankind, hav often been found ready to foster and encourage them. The more tremendous the deity is represented, the more tame and submissiv do men become to his ministers, and the more unaccountable the measures of acceptance required by him, the more necessary does it become to abandon our natural reason and yield to their ghostly guidance and direction.—Hume's Nat. Hist. of Religion.

HOW cruel it is not to allow men to strive after the things which appear to them to be suitable to their nature, and profitable! And yet, in a manner, thou dost not allow them to do this when thou art vexed because they are wrong. For they are certainly moved toward things because they suppose them to be suitable to their nature and profitable to them. But it is not so. Trust them, then, and show them the right way, without being angry.—M. A. Antoninus.

FOR tyrannicide, in the ancient and proper sense of the word, a strong case may be made. When a man like the first or second (sic) Bonaparte, intrusted with the national force, uses that force to crush the liberties of the nation, and to make himself a despot, placing himself by the same act above the reach of public justice, what can the commonwealth do but arm the hands of private citizens? The Roman law under which Cæsar fell, outlawing and devoting to death whoever should attempt to usurp superior power, whether politic or not, can hardly be called a breach of morality. A Frenchman who had shot down Louis Napoleon on the day of the Coup d' Etat might well hav been deemed by his countrymen a patriot, and, if he had lost his own life, a martyr.—Toronto Bystander (April).

HE who, in the silence of his own thought, plans a crime, has upon him the guilt of the deed.—Juvenal.

N. Y. State Freethinkers' Association.

THE SEVENTH ANNUAL CONVENTION;

Where Held—The Speakers Engaged—The Hotels, Railroads, etc.

THE NEW YORK STATE FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION, in accordance with its established custom, has invited the Freethinkers of all the other states, and also of Canada, to meet them in annual Convention, at Cassadaga Lake, N. Y., on the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th days of September next.

Reynolds, of Rochester, N. Y.; Samuel P. Putnam, of New York; Dr. William F. McCormick, of Franklin, Pa.; and Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., orthodox, of Philadelphia, Pa. And the following hav also been invited, the most of whom are expected to be present: Hon. Elizur Wright, of Boston; F. E. F. Underwood, editor of the Index, Boston, Mass. It is possible that Col. Ingersoll will be present and address the Convention.

THE SINGING.

Professor A. D. Lane, of Olean, N. Y., one of the most popular professional singers in the state, accompanied by as good a quartet of voices as can be found in Western New York, has been engaged to provide the musical entertainment for the occasion. Professor H. H. Hall, who sang for the Rochester Convention, has also been engaged.

THE PLACE OF MEETING.

The location where the Convention is to meet is one of the most pleasant and picturesque in the state. It is described as follows in a circular issued by the Association: "The Cassadaga Lake Camp-meeting Grounds are eight miles from Lake Erie, and seven hundred feet above it; situated midway between New York and Chicago, one and a half hours by rail from Buffalo, five from Cleveland, nine from Pittsburgh, fourteen hours from Cincinnati, sixteen from Philadelphia, eighteen hours from New York, twenty hours from Boston and Washington, and twenty-one from Chicago. It lies on the shore of a beautiful chain of lakes, three in number, and at an elevation of nearly fourteen hundred feet above the level of the sea." The Association last year erected on the grounds an amphitheater, with a seating capacity of twenty-five hundred people, with the seats in a semi-circle, which gives every one present an opportunity to hear all that is said from the speaker's platform.

ROUTES OF TRAVEL AND RAILROAD RATES.

Eastern and western passengers over the Nickel Plate, Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad, and eastern passengers over the New York, Lake Erie & Western (formerly Erie) railroad, change cars at Dunkirk, N. Y., and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to the "Cassadaga Camp-meeting Grounds."

Eastern and western passengers over the New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio railroad (formerly Atlantic & Great Western), and eastern passengers over the Buffalo & Jamestown railroad, change cars at the Atlantic & Great Western Crossing, and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to Lily Dale Station.

To be more definit, persons coming to the Convention from most of the cities and large towns in the United States will find it the cheaper to purchase excursion tickets to Chautauqua Lake. These can be obtained very cheap; and then leave the cars at the crossing of the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad near Jamestown, and then take the last mentioned road to Lily Dale Station, near the camping grounds. Persons coming from any station on the New York, Lake Erie & Western railroad, or any of its branches west of Binghampton, will pay full fare to Dunkirk, and then be returned at one-third fare home. The Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad will sell excursion tickets at two cents a mile from any station on that road.

On Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 8th and 9th, the

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE

WILL HOLD ITS

EIGHTH ANNUAL CONGRESS

At the same place.

In his call for the Congress the President of the League invites "all citizens of the United States, whether they hav acted with this League or not, who believe in a secular republic, separation of church and state; the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all, and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press as the basis of universal suffrage."

All Charter and Life Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Each Auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates—its president, secretary, and three other members—to the Congress. Annual members are entitled to seats in the Congress, and to votes by the permission of the Congress.

Odds and Ends.

THE first cyclone happened in Eden. It was a perfect hurry-Cain.

ISN'T it curious that Bar Harbor should be situated in such a strictly temperance state as Maine?

A COUNTRY girl, getting off a train at Saratoga, was asked if she might be helped to alight, and she replied that she did not smoke.

MR. BLOWER'S wife asked him to buy a thermometer the other day, but he declined, saying: "No, my dear; we will wait until next winter, when they will be much lower."

"WELL, well!" said old Mrs. Gumbo, as she laid down her morning paper. "So they've rescued poor old Greely alive! I do hope that Horace'll take hold of the Tribune again, and edit it sensibly, like he used ter!"

CLERGYMAN (on his way from church, to the son of a parishioner rather addicted to hunting on Sunday): "My little boy, I didn't see your father at church this morning. I am afraid he does not fear God." Young heathen: "Oh, yes, I guess he does. He took his gun with him this morning."

TWO soldiers lay beneath their blankets, looking up at the stars. Says Jack: "What made you go into the army, Tom?" "Well," replied Tom, "I had no wife, and I loved war, Jack, so I went. What made you go?" "Well," returned Jack, "I had a wife, and I loved peace, Tom, so I went."

MAN that is married to Woman is of many days and full of trouble.
In the morning he draws his salary, and in the evening,
Behold, it is gone.
It is a tale that is told;
It vanisheth, and no one knows whither it goeth.
He riseth up clothed in the chilly garments
Of the night,
And seeketh the somnambulent paregoric
Wherewith to soothe his infant posterity.
He cometh as a horse or ox
And draweth the chariot of his offspring.
He spendeth his shekels in the purchase of fine linen
To cover the bosom of his Family.
Yet himself is seen at the gate of the city with one
suspender.
Yea! he is altogether wretched.

WHAT A WOMAN CAN DO.

She can say "No," and stick to it for all time. She can say "No" in such a low, soft voice that it means "Yes." She can sharpen a pencil if you giv her plenty of time and plenty of pencils. She can dance all night in a pair of shoes two sizes too small for her, and enjoy every minute of the time. She can pass a display window of a draper's shop without stopping—if she is running to catch a train. She can walk half the night with a noisy baby in her arms without once expressing a desire to murder the infant. She can appreciate a kiss from her husband seventy-five years after the marriage ceremony has taken place. She can suffer abuse and neglect for years, which one touch of kindness or consideration will drive from her recollection. She can go to church and afterward tell you what every woman in the congregation had on, and in some rare instances can giv a faint idea of what the text was. She can look her husband square in the eyes when he tells her some cock-and-bull story about being "detained at the office" without betraying in the least that she knows him to be a colossal liar. She can—but what's the use? A woman can do anything or everything, and do it well. She can do more in a minute than a man can in an hour, and do it better. She can make the alleged lords of creation bow down to her own sweet will, and they will never know it. Yes, a woman can do everything, with but one exception; she cannot climb a tree.

Notes and Clippings.

"WHAT is the highest of God's creations?" asks a Sunday-school teacher. "The mountains," replies the intelligent pupil.

ELIZABETH CADY STANTON makes the statement in the North American Review that "it was at a Jewish polygamous wedding that Jesus performed his first miracle, and polygamy was practiced by Christians for centuries."

A MAN at West Somerset, England, broke his neck while drunk not long ago. It happened that his grandfather did the same thing, and the intelligent coroner's jury brought in a verdict of "Died by the hereditary visitation of God."

A MINISTER was endeavoring to convince his hearers of the fallacies of Darwinism, when he observed that they were not paying proper attention. "Brethren," said he, "when I am trying to explain the distinguishing peculiarities of the monkey, if you wish to understand them you should look directly at me."

A LITTLE girl, the daughter of a clergyman, relates Dr. G. J. Romanes, was watching her father write his sermon. "Papa," she asked, "does God tell you what to write in a sermon?" With some little hesitation he replied in the affirmativ, whereupon he was ignominiously nonplussed by the further question, "Then, papa, why do you scratch it out again?"

UNDER the title of "The New Calendar of Great Men" the Positivist Society of England propose soon to publish a work edited by Frederick Harrison, and containing short notices of each of the 558 persons whose names appear in the Positivist calendar drawn up by Auguste Comte. The aim will be to make the work a handy manual of the history of the cause of civilization, as understood by the founder of the religion of humanity.

A MAN is running for governor out in Kansas on the following platform: "Whereas, we hav absolute prohibition in the constitution and laws of Kansas, which ought to be satisfactory to the Prohibitionists, and whereas any person can get all he wants in almost any town in the state of Kansas, which ought to satisfy the Anti-Prohibitionists, therefore, be it resolved that we are in favor of letting well enough alone, and opposed to disturbing the present satisfactory status of the prohibition question by resubmission to the people of the state."

A CLERGYMAN recently told his congregation, in describing heaven, that "it will always be Sunday there." The Norristown Herald thinks that this assurance ought to please baseball nines, since the decision of a New York judge that there is no law against playing baseball on Sundays; and persons who devote the day to fishing may make extra efforts to get there; but the small boy who is obliged to accompany his parents to church twice a day, and attend Sabbath-school in the afternoon, will be apt to go into training for some other place, where Sunday doesn't come oftener than once a year.

THE evening before Daniel Webster died his physician repeated to him the words, "Thy rod and thy staff they comfort me," and Webster replied, as if in sympathy, but too weak to complete the sentence, "Thy rod and thy staff —the fact—the fact—I want." Here the matter rested as at first reported. A Bostonian now givs what he declares is the true account, as it came to him very directly. Webster asked whether he was likely to liv till morning. Dr. Jeffreys, not willing to giv a positiv answer, repeated from the twenty-third Psalm. Webster saw the evasion, and in a clear and rather severe tone said: "'Thy rod and thy staff!'—the fact, the fact I want!" He desired an answer to his question.

ACCORDING to a writer in the New York World, cases like that of Cleveland are not unknown among great men. The writer says: "Aaron Burr was chosen vice-president in the year of 1800, when he was forty-four years of age. His reputation as a libertin was certainly well established by that time. And Dr. Benjamin Franklin was well known to be the father of an illegitimate son born in the early part of the last century before the doctor had received any of the honors which were afterwards heaped upon him by his admiring countrymen." These things are discouraging; but it is an ill wind that blows nobody good, and the happiness of Mr. E. H. Heywood over the present moral aspect of things will probably fall little short of hilarious joy.

ONE of those unnaturally bright children who are always getting people into difficulties was at a prayer-meeting the other evening with his mother, when he asked aloud: "Ma; say, ma, who was Dinah Moore?" "Hush," whispered his mother, cautiously; "it's a hymn." "No, it ain't, ma," continued the hopeful; "it's a woman's name. Say, who's going home to Dinah Moore?" "Willie," said his mother, in a ghastly voice, "you're disturbing the meeting; it means going to heaven to die no more." "Dine no more? O ma, don't they eat anything there?" His mother explained as well as she could, and Willie sat still for half a minute, his bright eyes roving about the church. Then he asked, in a shrill whisper: "Ma, is God out of town?" "No, no," answered the distracted woman, faintly. "Then what's Mr. Kelly running this meeting for, ma?" continued the sweet child. The choir sang him down, but as the meeting closed with a moment of silent prayer his gentle voice could be distinctly heard.

GENERAL BUTLER, being asked to explain his position in the presidential race, related the following anecdote: A married couple, somewhat advanced in years, took passage on a Hudson river boat for Albany. The husband was a loving one in his way, and his being crabbed at times did not make any difference with the ways of his wife, who was as affectionate as a wife should be. On the way up the river the husband had the misfortune to fall overboard. As he went over, he caught a rope which dangled by the boat's side. The speed of the boat caused him to bob up and down in the water, his head now in and now out, the good wife in the greatest alarm crying out: "Hold on, husband! Hold on, for my sake!"—the injunction to hold on for her sake being particularly emphasized. As soon as the boat slowed and the half-drowned husband could gain breath, he shouted back: "Hold your tongue, you fool! Don't you suppose I'll hold on for my own sake?" Mr. Butler will probably "hold on" through considerations not wholly unconnected with his own interests.

FOR many years Mr. Parke Godwin, of this city, has been an advocate of Socialistic theories. One of his recent statements is this: "It is clear that in order to advance the well-being of the people, industry must perfect its organization." Now, says John Swinton, he has just cut down the paltry wages of his horny-handed compositors; he has just entered upon a war with the printer's union; he has just had a strike in his office; he has just filled his frames with those outlaws scornfully called "rats;" he has just done his best to crush the slight attempts now being made to "organize labor;" he has "taken advantage of the cruel power which capital has over labor;" he has required his laborers "either to accede to his terms or starve;" he has enforced the worst features of the "system of bargaining which has been substituted for true equity in the relations between labor and capital;" and he has thrown scorn on his declaration that "every man is equitably entitled to the ownership of the fruits of his labor." Instead of assisting the workers in their struggle for organization and life, he has gone back shamefully on the theories which he has so often propounded. It is pitiful.

THE Toronto Through Mail has been attacked with a fit of profound reasoning, and in the following narration shows how an exhorter sometimes mistakes the effect of his labors. The Through Mail says: It is curious how a startling sentence will affect people who are sleeping soundly, sometimes, when suddenly and energetically spoken. The other morning, on a through train nearly all the passengers were lying back in their chairs, sound asleep, when a crazy man jumped up and shouted at the top of his voice: "The devil is chief cook and bottlewasher." "Amen!" shouted a preacher awakening with a start. "Rah for Blaine and Logan," roared an Irishman. "Three times and sold for twenty dollars," bawled an auctioneer. "I object," snorted a lawyer. "I call your hand," said a gambler. "Whoa-haw, Buck," cried a farmer. "Me little dawling," sighed a masher. "Hit 'im again," said a boxer, and then the lawyer hit the preacher with his grip-sack, and the auctioneer rapped the masher over the head with his umbrella, and the Irishman kicked the gambler, and the farmer bit the Irishman's ear, and there was more fun for a few minutes than that crazy man ever had in the same length of time before, and he imagined that his preaching and exhorting was converting them all.

THE origin of miracles is thus commented on by the reviewer of the New York Times, in considering a recent publication entitled, "Dictionary of Miracles:" "As to many of the legendary myths, they arose undoubtedly from a habit of adaptation. It was customary in ecclesiastical houses to adapt heathen tales and to spiritualize them, and so many mythological stories were arranged to suit the religious thought of the day. From the realms of pure invention these stories became in time to be accepted as absolute facts. Even in medieval times, if Origen is to be taken as an authority, he believed that the end sanctified the means, for has he not said, 'Falsehood is quite lawful when told to promote Christianity.' In times of credulity it is impossible not to imagin that there were prestidigitateurs and fakirs, thaumaturgists—call them what you will—men who had nimble fingers, or who called in to play mechanical adjuncts, who really astonished by their performances ignorant but honest people. Had Miss Hurst lived in the times of Ferdinand and Isabella, and exercised her trickery, she might hav been made either a saint or a victim of the Inquisition. Troubled brains hav other eyes than those that really see, and visions and dreams are more absolutely impressed on some minds to-day than are the actual facts. Some persons might, as the author states it, find objections in seeing subjects of this especial character anatomized and laid bare, but it cannot be denied that disputes on topics relating to miracles require for their discussion pathology rather than theology."

THE following case, says London Society, was related to me by a bishop of the church of England. There was a man who had officiated as a clergyman in a large town for about fifteen years. At the lapse of that time it was accidentally discovered that he was an impostor. A new bishop came, or the man went into a new diocese; anyhow, the request came that he would produce his letters of orders. Letters of orders are rather precious and remarkable documents; if once they are lost they can not be replaced. The pseudo-clergyman replied, expressing his great regret that, in the course of a removal, the letters had been hopelessly mislaid, but hoped that the length of time during which he had served in the diocese would be considered a sufficient voucher. The bishop wrote back to say that he regretted the loss of the letters of orders, and that it would be quite sufficient if he gave exact dates, which would enable him to refer to the diocesan registry. The imposture then became known. It was a matter of great anxiety to settle what had best be done under such circumstances. Of course a very large number of marriages had been performed during these fifteen years, not one of which was legal. The first suggestion was that an act should be passed making these marriages legal. There were objections to this course. It was considered that an immense deal of pain would be caused by the publication of the invalidity of these marriages, and that peculiar hardship would be done in the case of children, where one or both of the parents had died in the mean time. On a certain evening there was a solemn discussion between the bishop of the diocese and the home secretary, the result of which was a communication to the villainous false clergyman that, if he left England immediately and forever, proceedings would not be taken, but that otherwise he would be prosecuted.

God's Love for Man.

God is love (1 John iv, 8).

This is a favorit text with preachers. It deals with the attribute they most delight to ascribe to their divinity. They teach us that it was purely for the exercise of this quality of love that the universe was created. God had, according to them, existed from eternity perfectly happy in himself. At length it occurred to him that his infinit self was an insufficient object for the exercise of his infinit love, and he resolved to create finite beings to supply the deficiency of his own infinity. He began by creating angels, beings like himself without bodies, parts, or passions. These beings, for some time, fulfilled the object for which he made them. That is to say, they added their finite love of him to the infinit love with which he loved himself. At length, one of their number, whom he had made superior to all the rest, and most like himself, rose in rebellion. Infinit knowledge of course foresaw this. Indeed, finite intelligence might hav apprehended it, for the being most like God would naturally desire most to rule over all. This angel, called Lucifer, persuaded one-third of the other angels to join him in setting up a rival kingdom. God commanded Michael to head the faithful remainder and attack the rebellious host. His army was twice as numerous as Lucifer's, and he had an omnipotent ally, so he gained the victory. He drove Lucifer and his followers out from the presence of God. God was present everywhere, but Michael drove them beyond that, and threw them into nowhere. Hell is nowhere, and in hell they were confined forever. However, being confined in nowhere does not hinder them from going everywhere when they hav a mind. They are always going to and fro upon the earth, and occasionally visit their old master in heaven; at least, one of them did in the days of Job. Here we see the love of God as shown towards the fallen angels. He sentences them to everlasting imprisonment, but he givs them greater liberty than they possessed before. He changes them into devils, but they are devil a bit the worse.

God's first attempt at creation thus turned out a failure. He had made these angels on purpose to love them, and he found himself hating the poor devils with a truly devilish hate. He tried again, for it would never do for omnipotence to giv up so easily. This time he made man. The angels, whom he had made out of nothing, not having given him satisfaction, he employed a fresh material. He used the dust of the earth. His object in creating man was, as theologians inform us, to fill up the places rendered vacant in heaven by the defection of the angels. But the devil interfered again. Out of malice to mankind, they say, he sought to bring them down to his own miserable condition. Perhaps they are wrong. It might hav been out of sympathy for them that he wished to save them from the eternal monotony of the heavenly choir. The supposition has just as much of probability and far more of generosity.

God had created man in his own image and likeness, but nobody has yet succeeded in discovering in what the resemblance consists. God is a spirit without parts, uncreated, eternal, infinit in all perfections. Man is, or at least has, a material body composed of parts—mortal, weak, and imperfect. Certainly the likeness does not appear upon the surface. Unfortunately for their own purpose, divines hav asserted that God has no passions, or we might detect a resemblance between the divinity of the scriptures and many wicked tyrants who hav reigned upon earth. He is a jealous god; he loves, hates, inflicts chastisments, and acts from caprice precisely as despotic rulers hav always done. He orders blind obedience in some absurd triviality merely for the recognition of his authority. If his subjects displease him, he brutally punishes or destroys them. If they please him by a more than ordinary amount of knee-worship or psalm singing in his praise, he condones their most atrocious crimes. For worshiping the gods they hav been taught to adore, he condemns whole nations to extermination, and converts their possessions into perpetual pensions to enrich the descendants of his favorit, Abraham. But jealousy, anger, hatred, and revenge are passions in the human breast, and passions hav no existence in the nature of God.

Now the devil, undertaking to win the newly created man and woman over to his side, had reason to exclaim, "God is love," for, in spite of their quarrel, that divinity had made his task a remarkably easy one. In the garden where he placed Adam and Eve he had planted a tree, the fruit of which he forbade them to touch. He surrounded them with animals inferior to themselvs, and without the power of speech. Among the lowest of these animals was the serpent. The devil caused the serpent to approach Eve and address her in her own language, whatever language that was. Eve was naturally surprised at hearing the dumb beast speak, and when he told her that he had acquired this power by eating the forbidden fruit, she readily believed him. It would hav been impossible for her to hav doubted him, for, being unaware of the existence of evil, she could hav had no suspicion of falsehood. He further told her that if she and Adam ate of the same fruit, they would become "as gods, knowing good and evil" (Gen. iii, 5). They were originally made in the likeness of God, but the likeness does not appear to hav included this rather important branch of knowledge. It is evident that God had need of the devil's assistance in completing his work.

Our first parents having eaten of the tree, found that the father of lies had told the truth, and the God of truth had—well, his love was too great to allow him to keep his word. He had said, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen. ii, 17). "And all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years" (v, 5). Perhaps he thought that as Adam had committed evil when he did not know it from good, it might be well to giv him the chance of avoiding it afterwards. However, he flew into a terrible rage, and cursed as only gods and their favorit ministers can curse. He cursed the earth and made it steril, so that it should yield no fruit except after long and wearisome labor. He cursed the sea and the air, and made them liable to storms and tempests. He cursed the animals which had no share in this transaction. He condemned them to prey upon and devour each other; to lead a life of suffering only to be terminated by a death of agony. He cursed the man and woman, with all their progeny, to the end of time, making them the victims of every sort of disease and misery, condemning them to toil and sweat for their daily bread, and at last to die in torment and in pain. The serpent he sentenced to go upon his belly, and feed on dust. Only the devil, the author of all the mischief, he let pass unscathed.

Yes, it must hav been God's love that prevented him from carrying out the sentence he had pronounced. He wished man to liv on, feeling that the sword was suspended over his head, might at any moment fall, but that he could never hope to escape it. He wished that first pair to be fruitful and multiply and replenish the earth, that he might hav millions of subjects on whom to lavish his divine affection. Years rolled on, the globe was numerously peopled, yet none returned his love except Noah and his family. So he drowned all the rest. The unchangeable, infinitly happy God "repented that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart" (Gen. vi, 6). The God who is love said, "I will destroy man whom I hav created from the face of the earth; both man, and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air" (verse 7). As objects on whom to lavish his love, God had only one poor family left—and the fish, which certainly enjoyed an unusually bountiful repast.

If God repented that he had made man, he surely repented that he had destroyed him. The earth was soon repeopled, and Noah lived to see his own descendants divided into nations and tribes of every possible variety of complexion, laws, and customs. We might imagin that all the children of the patriarch would be entitled to an equal share in God's love, but it was not so. He selected the Jews as his own people, and allowed other gods to take possession of the rest. Still he remained a jealous God, and commanded his worshipers to make war upon and destroy all surrounding tribes. In this he manifested his love by a cruelty more detestable than the bloodiest earthly tyrant has ever displayed. It mattered nothing to him what might be the moral character of his subjects. It mattered nothing what means they might employ to carry out the mission on which they were sent. It was sufficient that they did carry it out, and slaughter all who bent the knee to Baal, or any opposition divinity. Abraham might seek to rise in the world upon the prostitution of his wife; Jacob, by robbing his brother and swindling his employer; Moses might slay the Egyptian in whose land he dwelt; the whole of the children of Israel might, nay must, borrow their neighbor's goods, and flee the country with their booty. But one thing they must not do; they must not let their hearts be touched with pity or compassion; they must not spare the life of one individual among those surrounding tribes. Not the old man tottering upon the extreme limit of his existence; not the youth looking forward to a life of happiness and pleasure; not the father nor the mother; not the children playing round their knees; not the little infant clinging to the maternal bosom. "Kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him. But all the women children that hav not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselvs"(Num. xxxi, 17, 18). Oh, the horror of that time! Those fair lands but yesterday flowing with milk and honey, to-day flowing only with blood, and reeking with slaughter. Yesterday peace and plenty all around; to-day, overrun with fanatic wretches, killing, destroying all they touch. In vain does the strong man catch up arms and strike in defense of all that is dear to him. In vain do the feeble and the helpless cry for mercy and for quarter. The courage of man, the tears of woman, the shrieks of infancy, are alike unavailing. The command of the Great Jehovah has gone forth, and must be obeyed, "I am that I am;" "Thou shalt hav none other gods before me." It was war which Jehovah had proclaimed against his neighbor gods. It was a war like that which any petty African king might carry on against the wealthier and more peaceful tribes who dwelt in his vicinity. Mars, Jupiter, Apollo, might rule the civilization of the West. Brahma and Vishnu might hold sway in the far East. The men of the North might bow down to Odin and to Thor. These were distant gods, and mighty nations owned their sovereignty. From the divinities of Egypt he turned his back and fled. But Baal, and Moloch, and the other gods of adjacent tribes, few in numbers, but possessed of rich domains, on these he wreaks his jealous fury, and forgets altogether his much vaunted attribute of love. It may be that his ways are not as our ways, but they much resemble those of the savage who has advanced but a little from the condition of the parent brute.

How God loved his chosen people! How he must hav loved them, when all the infinitude of his love was lavished upon them, and the rest of the world totally excluded from participation in it! What evidence he gave them of his love! For forty years he kept them wandering in a wretched wilderness, around the borders of a land he had promised them, but never permitted that generation to enter. Daily he fed them with manna from heaven, at the monotony of which they sickened till they turned from it with loathing and disgust. And when in their hunger and misery they thought with regret even of the days of their slavery, and longed after the fleshpots of Egypt, he sent among them fiery serpents, and all sorts of plagues. He encumbered them, wretched wanderers and dwellers in tents as they were, with a multitude of idle laws and ceremonial observances which would fill a volume. And when the last of that unhappy generation, save Caleb and Joshua alone, had died in that dreary spot, he permitted their descendants to enter and take possession of the promised land.

For centuries after, God so loved the world that he kept all nations, save the one, in ignorance of his existence. He let each god hold his own, and it was a fair competition among the many gods which could do his best to civilize and refine, or brutalize and degrade the human race. At length the Jews themselvs, frequently led captiv by superior nations, began to blend with their ideas of Jehovah the more human attributes of their conquerors' gods. Judea became a Roman province, and the world was prepared for a mighty change.

It seems strange that the love of an infinit God could exhaust itself within the short space of human life, yet Jehovah had, during all this time, never revealed to his chosen people that any existence awaited them beyond the grave. It is true that in the later periods of their history, such an opinion had found its way among them, but it had crept in from without. They had discovered it, not in the law and the prophets, but in the imaginations of pagan poets, and the speculations of heathen philosophers. The rich and prosperous were slow to adopt this opinion, and forming the sect of the Sadducees, clung with true aristocratic convervatism to the old teaching. The poor and suffering, however, gladly welcomed the idea that in another world the injustice they suffered in this would be rectified. The priests, also, who saw the power the new doctrin would confer upon them, became its willing advocates. In addition to this, another and more universal opinion prevailed among the Jews. They were a conquered people longing for independence, and they believed that a messiah would soon appear who would restore to them their kingdom. They were ready to flock to the standard of the first fanatic who might set himself up as he that was to come.

In an obscure village of a despised province, among the poorest of the poor, there dwelt a man said to be descended from the royal stock of David. He was somewhat advanced in years, but had a young wife and son. The revolutionary ideas, which were probably the frequent topics of conversation in the little shed where his father carried on the humble trade of a village carpenter, appear to hav early influenced the mind and behavior of the boy. At twelve years of age, when he should hav been with his parents, he was found in the temple with the doctors, "both hearing them and asking them questions" (Luke ii, 46). His mother rebuked him, saying, "Thy father and I hav sought thee sorrowing. He said unto them, How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my father's business?" (verses 48, 49.)

Thus early, if only the account be true, did the youthful Jesus strike the keynote of his future character. His professed followers hav since confused him in their minds with love incarnate, but he was merely a rebel with a bitter tongue, that brought trouble upon himself, but without strength of character and calmness of judgment sufficient to qualify him for an able leader. Young, of an excitable temperament, with a tendency to insanity, flattered by the attention of a few ignorant fishermen and vagrants, he began to imagin himself the future king of the Jews. Suffering from poverty, he commenced to preach the gospel to the poor.

We are told that his preaching was the gospel of love, of universal, perfect, infinit love. "In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God" (John i, 1). And "God is love" (1 John, iv, 8). "And the word was made flesh and dwelt among us" (John i, 14). Love itself in human form, with human heart and human voice, one of ourselvs. What may we not now expect from his words and from his deeds? Infinit love must embrace all in its affection. It can make no distinction of nationality or rank. The tiniest insect and the most exalted seraph must alike be objects of its bounty. It can hate none, loathe none, despise none, but spread joy and happiness all around. "Woe unto you that are rich! for ye hav received your consolation. Woe unto you that are full! for ye shall hunger" (Luke vi, 24, 25). This is not the language of incarnate love, but of a poor carpenter's son. "The father shall be divided against the son, and the son against the father; the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother; the mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in-law" (xii, 53). These are not words inspired by divine love, but by human jealousy in the heart of a fanatic leader. "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel" (Matt. xiv, 24), could never hav been uttered by infinit love, although it might hav been spoken by Jesus, the bigot Jew.

For two years Jesus traveled about his own country, partly as a religious teacher, partly as a political agitator. In both respects he ignominiously failed. Instead of striving to elevate the condition of the people, he taught them that happiness was to be obtained through poverty and persecution, sorrow, meekness, and humility. Luckily for mankind, his teaching has in only a few very instances been practically carried out. Those who adopted it in early ages fled into deserts. In more recent times they hav inclosed themselvs in convents. In either case the result has been the same. They lived aliens to their own race, strangers to the hopes and fears, the struggles and the toils, the sympathies and kindnesses of their fellow-men. For the love of love they lived unloving and unloved, forsaking the real to dwell in the ideal; and when they died and passed away, this living, moving, breathing world went on and never missed them; for though they had been in it, they had not been of it, and had conferred upon it no blessing to entitle them to its remembrance or regret.

If Christianity be a religion founded by a god who is love, truly it displays but little sign of its divine origin. Jesus is said to hav given a mark by which his followers might be recognized. "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye hav love one to another" (John xiii, 35). But who are those that show this mark of fraternal affection? Those who for eighteen centuries hav persecuted, imprisoned, and put to death, when they could, all who differed from them in opinion? Those who hav carried war and bloodshed on the globe to spread the knowledge of Christianity? Those who maintain that the glory of God is exalted by the torture of an erring brother or sister in eternal flames? Those who say, whether from high places or from low, whether from the cathedral pulpit and the papal chair, or in some miserable village chapel, or over the teapot and the gin bottle in an old woman's meeting, "If any man think not as I think, believe not as I believe, do not as I do, let him be anathema maranatha?" Surely of none of these can we say that they bear the stamp of charity. On the contrary, we are compelled to admit that Christianity has only proved another, and the worst, element of discord in human life. And so if God is love, he even yet remains hidden from us, and the world knows him not.

Will it be ever so? Will he always be hidden under the dark cloud that human malice and prejudice hav raised to conceal him from our eyes? Shall we never see him as the loving, gentle, and merciful father, but only as the cruel, blood-thirsty tyrant and oppressor? Perhaps we may. Possibly when a few more generations hav passed away, when the intellect of man shall hav become more developed and his heart better trained; when Moses and Jesus shall hav taken their places beside Jupiter and Apollo; when national and religious prejudices shall alike hav been swept away, and Christianity be remembered only as a dark blot in the world's history; the race of men may unite in one common religion, the worship of truth wherever it may be found, one common code of morality, each to do his best for all. Then they may say: "We hav found the god unknown to our ancestors. He dwells not in heaven far away, but here in our own hearts and minds. He has no terror for us, for he threatens us with no evils, visits us with no wrongs. He teaches the ignorant, feeds the hungry, clothes the naked, and heals the sick. We hav found him, and we know him for the true god, for the real divinity is Humanity, and he is love."

The Tariff.

The Truth Seeker of August 16th contained an article on the tariff question, by J. G. Malcolm, that was unique and amusing if not convincing. The author ought to hav a copy of it framed and preserved as a relic for the amusement of his grandchildren. Mr. Malcolm is evidently sincere, and I hav no desire to criticise his motives in the least, but I cannot refrain from saying that that article was the most wildly absurd production on the subject that I hav ever seen in print. It would take too much space to go over the whole article and comment on each point, but I will speak briefly on two or three. Mr. Malcolm says, "We add the tax to the price of goods, and people must either pay the tax or do without the goods." The gentleman has plainly fallen into the old, old error of supposing that goods hav a natural or inherent price or value, and every cent paid for them above that price represents a duty or tax. The fallacy of this idea is so easily shown, and has been shown over and over again so many times, that it would be useless to show it again to those who are determined not to see it. Mr. Malcolm would hav us believe that the terrible social evil in all its forms is the result of the tariff, and that if every young man would get married and rear a family of eight children or so, our moral atmosphere would be entirely purified. This shows the limitless scope of a man's imagination when he is mounted on a hobby. There is about as close a relation between the tariff and the social evil as there is between chicken raising and astronomy. When a lustful, incipient libertin is plotting the seduction of a girl, or is in any way led to believe that her chastity is not temptation-proof, how much thought does he giv to the tariff question as a factor in his purposes? There is too much marrying and unmarrying now. It would be a grand blessing to this country if, by a fine or some other means, the production of "large families," and small ones too, such as many now existing, could be prevented. I wish I could make Mr. Malcolm, and ten thousand others, realize that the reckless, unchecked union of thousands of persons totally unfit to marry, and the propagation of "large families" of children who are mentally, morally, and physically unsound, is responsible for a large percentage of the prostitution and vice that surround us. Mr. Malcolm givs a hypothetical case of two young men, and seems to think it is wrong that A, with a wife and eight children, should pay more tax than B, who is single. Would it be right for B to support A's children? He condemns the practice of allowing speculators to buy and hold large tracts of land for speculation, and in this I am heartily with him. But he gets into a dense fog before he gets through with this point. He proposes to shift $493,000,000 of revenue from articles of consumption to the land, and says, "The only way the owners of these lands could avoid paying it would be to let go of the lands." Exactly. It is possible they would be able to do which they chose of these two things, but they would not do both; and long before even a considerable part of the above sum was raised, they would "let go of the lands," and then the anticipated revenue would vanish into thin air. Putting the burden on the lands of actual farmers would not mend the matter. If a man's taxes are $100 for all purposes, what difference does it make to him what he pays it on? If his living is taxed $100, and his land nothing, or his land $100, and his living nothing, will he care much which way it is?

We will all be happy when we find a country where there are no taxes to pay, nothing to do but raise "large families," and call on the government—if there is one—for all the money we wish, with which to support them; eat, drink, and be merry, etc. No matter how hardened an old sinner the tariff may be, I hope Mr. Malcolm will not again attempt to blast its repulation entirely by spreading scandalous reports about it just before election. The National Liberal League.

TENTS FOR SUMMER.—PORTABLE TABERNACLES FOR WINTER.—CARRY THE WAR INTO AFRICA.

One of the advantages of thorough organization of the National Liberal League would be its ability to do efficient work in such cases as that of Mr. Samson, of Erie, Pa., arrested for saving his hay on the Sabbath (i. e., Sunday).

Among the first things for which the National Liberal League should solicit donations would be to purchase a 60-foot diameter tent, and a say 20x80 portable board tabernacle (made in sections, quickly erected or taken down, transportable without liability to damage)—the tent for summer use, the tabernacle for winter.

Often a suitable hall cannot be obtained, while it is generally easy to obtain a suitable lot in a good location to erect a tent or tabernacle.

Had the League been organized and in working order, the officers of the district League in which Erie was located would immediately on hearing of the case of Mr. Samson hav notified the officers of the state League, making an appointment to meet them at Erie, learn the exact condition of affairs, and decide on the advisability of making a grand effort. If favorable, they should notify the secretary of the National Liberal League. The officers of the League would at once send on the tent and the very best available lecturer, thoroughly posted on the Sabbath question, with a full supply of Sabbath tracts, and copies of J. N. Andrew's "History of the Sabbath." The secretary of the National Liberal League would instantly notify every state League of the facts, and send out an urgent call to every local League in the United States for help—cash donations, volunteer musicians, vocalists, distributors, and canvassers (none accepted but those indorsed and recommended by their local and district League officers). At least twenty such volunteers could be used, relays each week if necessary. They should scatter, and only one or two board at a place, in private families as far as possible.

Hav the best choir possible, and let each volunteer seek to interest musicians and vocalists of the place to take part. Let the secretary of the National Liberal League divide village and five-mile circuit of adjacent country into small districts, and apportion each district to the chief distributor and assistants, so that every family would be sure to receive programs of the meetings, be visited by the distributor and invited personally to attend, and furnished with tracts on the Sabbath question, adapted to create interest and arouse investigation; next by canvassers for one of our best periodicals; then by another distributor with "History of the Sabbath," to sell or loan; then by another canvasser for another of our leading papers, each and all trying to create interest in attending meetings and securing members for the League.

Meetings should be advertised by large, handsome painted posters on every barn and billboard; posters and dodgers kept on every available place.

Weekly reports, with all items of interest, should be sent by the secretary of the National Liberal League to the secretary of every local League in the United States, with urgent appeals to use best efforts to get such reports and items in local newspapers. Does anyone doubt the result of such efforts? Once thoroughly organized, and within two years every state should hav a number of such tents and tabernacles, not for emergencies (the National Liberal League can attend to them), but kept constantly at work in places where interest has been awakened by labors of local Leagues, and no suitable hall can be obtained.

Oh, but the expense? It would be but trifling. The majority of places would be self-supporting. But what if it did cost? Are we Liberal only in name, and stingy braggarts in fact?

Let us sow the good seed of love and truth, and we shall reap a harvest of sweet peace and joy, in that we hav not lived altogether for ourselvs. In no way can we so well prepare for death or another life as by doing all in our power to make this a useful and a happy one. In the language of the noble, self-sacrificing truth seeker, D. M. Bennett, "A life of uprightness, actuated by a desire and effort to do good to our fellow-beings, is sure to bring happy results. Our duty and our field of action is here, among the sons and daughters of men. Let us seek to make each other happy, and the world better for our having lived in it." "Those lead the happiest and most peaceful lives who seek most to benefit those around them." Instead of dwelling in solitude upon the barren islands of egotism and selfishness, how much better and happier to organize, and all earnestly unite in efforts for the general good. Exchange the brazen trinkets of egotism and spleen for the golden chain of love. Let all help build each other up, instead of lying awake nights to devise missils and epistles to tear each other down.

Let us hav a live, working Liberal League in every place where there are five live, earnest, true Liberals, and let the desire of each and all be, "Who best can work; who best agree." We can then make our demands with power; for in union is strength—in efficient organization, assured victory.

Chas. B. Reynolds.

A Liberal for President.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The several political parties hav nominated men whom they wish to see elected to fill the positions of president and vice-president of this grand and glorious republic. None of the parties, so far, hav seen fit to present a platform that we, as earnest Liberals, can conscientiously indorse and support. Therefore I would humbly suggest that when the next Liberal Congress meets in September, candidates be nominated to be voted for to fill the positions of president and vice-president of the United States. The time will surely come when there must be an entire separation of church and state; and why not try it now, when the country is in such a mixed condition, politically?

Seaver and Remsburg are the names I would suggest, both earnest workers, and both well known, representing the East and West, the old and young.

I would like to see action taken in regard to the matter, and I hope the delegates at the Convention will propose something of the sort.

Mr. Charles Watts's Third Visit to America.

From "The Present Day," edited by George Jacob Holyoake.

On Wednesday, August 16th, Mr. Charles Watts was entertained at dinner at Anderton's Hotel, by various well-wishers, previous to his third visit to America. The editor of this journal occupied the chair by request. The company included Mr. Mead, tragedian; Mr. Barnes, artist; Mr. Hall, dramatist; Mr. Sadler, poet; Mr. Macdonald, literateur; Mr. Winks, political agent; Mr. Wade, and others.

The first toast given by what the Americans call "the chair," was, "The United States of America, and the Dominion of Canada—countries which, had our relations with them been dictated by the sentiments of the people, instead of the aristocracy, would be our welcome rivals in progress, and our allies in war."

The chairman said the object of the assembly was to wish their guest health, usefulness, and success in the larger England to which he was going. Mr. John Watts, whom many present knew, was several years connected with what was known as the Fleet Street House. He had ability, and clear discernment that things which related to this world were distinct from those which pertained to another. When his brother Charles, the guest of the evening, entered public life, he gave promis of like discernment and capacity. A few years ago he made a stand for quality, and taste, and separateness in Secular literature. Against my interest, I thought it my duty to take his side, by which I incurred the hostility of his adversaries, who were far more able to do me harm than he was to do me good, but it would not hav been a good sight that a young advocate should be seen standing up for the credit of Secular literature, and find himself friendless. But Freethought, like universal suffrage, does not necessarily bring wisdom with it all at once, though it affords a new means of acquiring it; and difference of opinion is sometimes treated, as Christians treat it, as a personal offense. But this should discourage no one, since variety of ideas is the attribute of Freethought, and difference of opinion, when well formed, is a new form of light, In the country to which Mr. Watts is going, he will find more varieties of view than exist among us; but utter diversity of view is compatible with unity and personal friendliness, provided independent thinkers make no dishonoring imputations against each other. It is owing to the acceptance of this rule that he, the chairman, was able to be present that night. The object of the Secular Review, of which Mr. Charles Watts afterward became the proprietor, was to maintain Secularism as a new form of Freethought, which should be self-dependent, not needing any theology as its basis. The Secular principle teaches that morality has the clearest sanctions in science and experience. If a man comes in personal contact with fire, his shriek is the confession of the error of his ways. There is no doubtful interpretation that burning is unpleasant; doctors, spiritual and medical, agree in its meaning. If a man falls into the water and cannot get out, he knows that the condition of things is unsatisfactory, without any revelation. All the prophets, and all the apostles, cannot make the thing clearer; nor can the reading of all the chapters in the Bible, nor all the collects in the prayer-book, save the man who is sinking. There must be secular help rendered to do that. Well, all departures from justice and truth in life are as capable of being shown to be fatal in their way, unless change of action takes place. We know, therefore, that human evil may be averted and mitigated by material means. Is there no pathos in the uses of science as the providence of life? What is there in the re-measurement of the ark, or in criticising the inevitable errors of humble, untaught Jewish fishermen, which can move the heart like the discovery that "each man, in his own hand, bears the means of canceling his own captivity," and that of others under evils otherwise absolute? This brings that intelligent "peace of mind" which is all the more widely attainable because it does not "pass understanding," and which never perishes while our days remain. If Mr. Watts will use his powers of public speech to report that there is a form of Freethought of this nature in England, he will make an addition to the knowledge of many whom he will address, without endangering that prosperity which his friends now wish him.

The vice-chairman, Mr. T. Mead, a valued friend of Mr. Watts, then spoke, who said a very long acquaintance with Mr. Watts had increased his regard for him, and the appreciation of his genial character in private, and what he considered his not inconsiderable public usefulness. He, Mr. Mead, had always found Mr. Watts on the side of progress, and though he had great ardor and eloquence, his obvious aim was to be just to those who differed from him in opinion.

Mr. W. F. Winks, son of the Rev. Mr. Winks, of Leicester, a Baptist minister of repute, with whom the chairman once held three nights' controversy, gave an anecdote of the regard in which his father held his old opponent. Referring to Mr. Watts, Mr. Winks said he had considerable knowledge of advocates, and he had very decided opinions of his own in matters political and social. What he admired in Mr. Watts was, that he had always been on the side of constructiv Secularism, and in the country to which he was going he would doubtless be a valued addition among public advocates, and would well earn the success they all wished him.

Mr. Hall gave a bright and amusing account of his platform encounters with Mr. Watts. Though not holding his opinions, he respected him very much for the unfailing temper with which he maintained them.

The chairman then gave the health of their guest, which was received with many demonstrations of regard and friendly wishes.

Mr. Charles Watts, in an animated and effectiv speech, acknowledged personally to each speaker the kindly words which had been said of him. He expressed his gratification that the chair was occupied by Mr. Holyoake. He said his brother John was trained in the school of Secularism, with which the chairman's name was identified, and his own constant desire was earnestness and sincerity should guide his public life, and that his advocacy should never be wanting in due consideration for the opinions of those who differed from himself. He had always been a partisan of that form of Freethought which meant practical improvement, and his aim was to expound that constructiv Secularism, which taught what was to be done, why it should be done, and how to do it.

Mr. T. Mead, in terms which we could not well report in these columns, proposed in grateful terms the health of the chairman, whom he said he had heard speak in Alison street, Birmingham, forty-five years ago. Mr. Sadler also spoke words which were a very pleasing tribute from a young man.

The chairman acknowledged the courtesy of the toast, and said those who knew him were aware that he always held that there could be no leadership among independent thinkers, save the leadership of ideas, and that gave a chance to all. He was glad when new men appeared in the field in which he had chosen himself to work, and the abler they were the better for the truth—if they had it. He charged Mr. Watts to convey from him a friendly message to the Freethought Convention, which he would attend in America next month.

Mr. Tovey, the secretary of the dinner, gave an agreeable account of the circumstances under which the meeting had originated, and reported two handsome gifts to the dinner and the guest from Mr. H. G. Atkinson, and Mr. Daniel Baker. Afterwards a remarkable recitation by Mr. Mead, and songs by Mr. Barnes and others concluded the four hours' entertainment to their guest, who will sail in the Gallia in a few days.

The Best Members are Driven Out of the Churches.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A few years ago a young preacher was installed as pastor over the Congregational church of this village. Rev. J. K. Beecher, of Elmira, preached the installation sermon. In a conversation that I had with him after the meeting, I said to Mr. Beecher: "I hope this young man has some thought, and will be able to giv the people here some valuable ideas. For, although I am not a Christian or a believer in orthodoxy, I would like to attend church once in a while if we had some live man to talk to us Sundays." Beecher said: "I can assure you that you will be interested in the preaching of Mr. C. He is a live young man. Go and hear him." And I took Mr. Beecher's advice.

And I did find Mr. C. an earnest, bright, seemingly honest young man, desirous of learning what was true and just, and, so far as he was able, putting it into his Sunday sermons. Although, of course, having been graduated from an orthodox theological school, he said many things that were chaff to me, yet he put so much real wheat into it that I liked it, and I attended his church nearly every Sunday; and often Monday mornings he came into my office and we, in the most friendly manner, discussed his previous Sunday sermon. This young man soon became popular with the intelligent young people of the town, and the church seemed to prosper. But soon a few heresy hunters got after him, and he felt it his duty to leave the church and go to teaching. Since then the church here has had quite ordinary and quite orthodox preaching, and, of course, is very weak.

But a few months ago this church procured the services of quite an able and Liberal theological student from one of the theological schools to preach for a short time, on trial. He seemed to be, as I learned from those who heard him, an unusually able young man, and all were pleased with him. But now, as the saying is, "the fat is all in the fire," and the young man "must go," or has gone. It came about in this way: One of the most activ members in the church was a Mrs. B. She happens to be the neighbor of the writer, and we know her to be a very worthy woman in the capacity of wife and mother, a woman who we believe from day to day is trying as best she can to liv what she calls Christianity. But she is no hypocrit, and no bigot, and she thinks that it is good people, whatever their views may be, who are going to heaven, and that if there is a hell, a place of punishment in the next world, really bad people are the ones who will suffer there, and she does not believe there is any sin in honest doubt. This lady, as I before stated, was very activ in this church until now. I think she had the largest and most intelligent Sunday-school class in the church. And some time since she invited her Sunday-school class, this young clergyman, and a few other young people to her home for a social visit. And behold, they, the young people and the young minister, committed a heinous (?) crime while at her house. And what was it? They spent an hour or two in her private parlor dancing. And the good brothers and sisters of the church, whose limbs hav become too stiff for this kind of sport, were filled with indignation, and they soon made it very disagreeable for the young preacher and Mrs. B., the lady at whose house the great crime was committed. And the preacher left, and Mrs. B. has withdrawn from the church. And this Mrs. B., I am sure, was one of the best women in the church, and now she is driven out into the dark and beggarly elements of the world. So we see that always and everywhere the church drives out its best members, for the church is not a comfortable place for a really good person to remain in. A Freethinker.

Marriage—What Is It?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: During the last few months, I hav read in The Truth Seeker and in other Liberal publications several articles bearing directly or indirectly upon the subject of marriage. All of these articles hav been ably written and hav contained some valuable truths. The writers, however, seem to be writing from entirely different standpoints of opinion in regard to what marriage is. They seem to be using entirely different weights, measures, and standards of comparison. The consequence is that they hav made no progress in determining the question of polygamy, or anything else involved in the discussion. They hav gone into the debate without first defining their terms. I now propose that each of them, and as many others as would like to participate in the discussion, giv us, in a concise form, his or her definition of marriage. When we hav arrived at an agreement as to what constitutes marriage, we can easily determin whether polygamy is or is not an admissible form of marriage.

There are only three possible sources from which marriage could hav been derived—only three possible bases upon which it could stand. These are god, man, nature. I say three sources—three bases. I do this, however, simply for the benefit of those persons who believe in the existence of gods. So far as Liberals are generally concerned, the gods might be omitted from the discussion.

If, however, marriage was derived from a god-source, and if it does rest upon god-authority, then from which god or which set of gods was it derived, what is the exact definition of it as given by this god or this set of gods, what rightful authority does this god or this set of gods hav over us here in America, and when did this god or this set of gods begin to be unable to run this institution without the aid of priests, of legislatures, etc.?

Again, if marriage was derived from a man-source, and if it does rest upon man-authority, then from what man, or what set of men, was it derived; what is the exact definition of it as given by this man, or this set of men, and what rightful authority does this man, or this set of men, hav over us here in America generally and in Utah particularly?

Finally, if marriage was, or rather is, derived from nature's eternal and unchangeable laws, and if it does rest upon the authority of these laws, from which none of us can escape, then what is its exact form as determined by these laws, and is polygamy clearly excluded by these laws?

In its social bearings, if not in its political bearings, also, this question of marriage is the most important one now before the American people. It is of special importance, too, to those who, like myself (let all marriageable women re-read the last two words), are candidates for election to the matrimonial office. When a few others hav given their definitions, I will venture to giv mine, though I am not at all sure that I know what marriage is.

A Freethought Newsdealer and the Sunday Law.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I inclose you three slips cut from our Nashville paper, the Daily American, which I desire you to read. Nashville becomes more and more an ungodly, priest-ridden town. The church party has control of this city. They passed a very stringent Sunday law about a year ago. Even the sale of a newspaper on Sunday was a violation. I was arrested on the first Sunday for selling a newspaper, so alleged; was fined five dollars and costs. I appealed to the Circuit Court. The case was there decided in my favor, and then the city appealed to the State Supreme Court, but this court is composed of a set of moral cowards, who were afraid of the church influence, and therefore rendered a decision in favor of the Sunday law.

Our fight had one advantage for our cause. Our enemies got scared and sort of modified the law, which givs only newsdealers and ice cream and fruit vendors and drug stores the right to sell on Sunday, while the other businesses must be closed at 10 o'clock A.M. on Sunday morning.

Now, our boys do enjoy themselvs on Sunday by baseball playing; hence the fight by these intolerant preachers, who are afraid that by these enjoyments their purse will lose a few nickels. The public in general would be with us if we only had one amongst us to take up the cudgel and giv the religious people some good licks in a true sledge-hammer style. I desire you to send me immediately all pamphlets pertaining to the Sunday law question, and if you hav some articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER, send me the respectiv numbers of those old TRUTH SEEKERS. I desire to collect all necessary material to enable me stand successfully a newspaper controversy. Something has to be done. If you could spare some time and devote a small space of your valuable paper to this question, you would receive the heartfelt thanks of all our Infidel friends here. F. PFISTER.

Thought.

The watchword of the day is progression; and not only of to-day, but since time began. Each cycle has been stamped with evidence that evolution, that great power which men call God, was bringing the world up and out of the chaos and darkness of its earlier conditions.

In all ages man has recognized a power which governed the world, and in his ignorance and fear has invested that power with supernatural attributes. And in all ages hav there been those who hav assumed unto themselvs authority over the people, claiming that they were the agents of that power, commissioned by it to enforce what they claimed to be its wishes or commands. And through their love of power and greed they hav held the masses in the bondage of fear, ignorance, and superstition, and like an iron rod the church has held that power over the people, fattening upon their poverty, and fighting the God they claimed to worship.

Evolution rolls on. 'Tis only man that suffers, and through that suffering does he learn wisdom. Necessity is the propelling power which develops thought and brings into activity the dormant powers, through which he is enabled to throw off the conditions which bind and enslave both mind and body in the superstitious thraldom of the church.

'Tis thought, that unseen lever, which is potent to overturn the religious systems and the empires of the world; time and thought, working hand in hand, are destined to bring the world up and out of the superstitions and bondage of the past into the glorious light of liberty, reason, and science. Thought is the great highway of progression, and the great crime of the church is that it has suppressed thought, that liberty of conscience has been denied to man, and pope and priest hav arrogated to themselvs the right to do the thinking for the world. But the day of myths and superstition is past, and though the priest may mumble o'er his creeds and strive with all his might to sustain his tottering altar, the battering rams of truth are leveled against its walls, and with every blow science casts her rays across the darkness, and time only is needed to complete the work; and as the darkness of the past givs place to the glorious light of reason, and man is enabled to think for himself, he does not fear to stand face to face with truth, seeking to know that which he has been taught were the mysteries which were not for man to know; he has learned that these mysteries were but the blind with which the church has sought to hide from him the key to the great storehouse of knowledge which science is throwing open to the world, and from whose inexhaustible supplies the world can forever draw.

But the church is not the only foe to progression which thought has to wage war against. Kingcraft, an outgrowth of priestcraft, has to be driven from the world, and its foster child, monopoly, which is only kingcraft in embryo; but thought and time will accomplish this. For as the mind expands and is capable of new thought, the avenue by which the people can be liberated from the thraldom of the money kings of the world will be opened. Thought is to take the place of war, and arbitration will be the potent power which shall bring the world into a condition where war shall be unknown.

The evils which exist in the United States to-day are the results of conditions through which the government has been passing. Time will bring change. The great heart of this nation is true and loyal to the government, and it will see to it that the government is loyal to the people. The stars and stripes do not float over a nation of slaves, but in everyone's breast throbs a heart that will stand by his country, his liberties, and his rights. The government of the United States was not formed in the interests of any party, but for the people. Evolution is still at work. Order will take the place of this chaos of political strife, and a party of the people, and a government of the people, in which the rights of the people will be recognized, is in the near future. An old hymn reads:

> "God moves in a mysterious way
> His wonders to perform;
> He plants his footsteps on the sea,
> And rides upon the storm."

And from out of this storm of party politics and struggle for power, the right will come uppermost. The rights of man shall yet be recognized, and the stars and stripes shall float over a nation of free men and free women. MRS. J. L. YORK.

Red-hot Politics, and How to Vote.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August the 16th is an article from Mr. J. G. Malcolm on the tariff question, which deserves to be carefully read and studied. It ought to be an eye-opener to many protectionists—of manufacturers, not of home laborers, for these are not protected, but deluded thereby; as immigration is not restricted, the Chinese excepted lately.

Protection is an artificial help. Like a stimulant to a sick person, it is not natural, and will not do in the long run; but the "protected" come never to the time or end to giv it up willingly, and as they are in power, will of course try to keep it. No matter how much profit the protected make, they will never pay any more, for all that, to their laborers than starvation wages.

Now a little red-hot politics. I was an Abolitionist before there was a Republican party of high principles, and when this party was born voted for its ticket when yet in the minority, but since the war has closed it has become a party for thieves and plunderers, at least as bad as, if not worse than, the Democratic ever was. It is a party to enrich the rich manufacturer, the bank and railroad corporations, with presents and privileges, and put the taxes mostly on the laborers and the middle class. Mr. Malcolm's land tax, as proposed, would be just and right; but besides that there should be a graduated income tax. To every thousand dollars income add one per cent up to ninety or ninety-five per cent. Such a tax would hurt no one, except those overgrown rich, which are most always a curse to a country, seldom a blessing. Let the capital pay the taxes, and not the families, as it is the case now.

National banks ought never to hav been allowed double interest on nine-tenths of their capital.

Why does the government keep for years about one hundred and fifty millions stored up in the treasury and hav it watched, while it has to pay interest on its debts, and when its income since the war has closed always was larger than its expenses? Is there a sane individual who owns, say $20,000, and pays interest on it, and will carry around or keep hidden in the house $2,000?

What business has this Republican party government to make itself the keeper and watchman of the rich man's money, to store his gold and watch it, and for his convenience giv him certificates. Does this good (?) government take care of the poor man's savings? By no means.

Turn the rascals out! Any party long in office will deteriorate, and should be changed from time to time. No better time will ever come than now to punish the Republican party for its sins by turning it out, to improve it thereby, if it is possible. The Democratic candidate is a man of unblemished honesty, to the contrast of the Republican candidate, who, as is proven, has enriched himself by the aid of his high office. I hav no love for the Democratic party, but when the Republican party followed other leaders than Sumner and Greeley it went to the bad.

No Abolitionist, nor any knowing, sensible man, will admit that the Republicans hav given to the blacks the vote for justice's sake. No, it was simply done for policy's sake, to make the blacks followers to the Republicans, to keep themselvs thereby in office and power.

Turn these rascals out. FREDK. KOEZLY.

The Rev. John Jasper's Rival.

From the Axtell, Kan., Anchor.

When the Rev. Jasper, the somewhat noted colored preacher of Richmond, Va., raised his voice and said: "Bredren, you gets up in de mornin' and sees de sun in de east, and in de ebenin' you sees it in de west—I tell you, bredren, de sun do move,' he was given credit for having some originality, but we did not know that he had any disciples until last Thursday evening. The Hon. John E. Remsburg, after delivering an eloquent lecture on "False Claims," invited discussion, and one of our local divinities accepted the invitation. In course of his remarks he brought down his digit with terrific force on the Bible, and made the somewhat peculiar statement that the world was flat. The audience was slightly taken aback at his utterance; the house came down.

We believe this man should be pulled off the track. Mr. Remsburg is a Freethinker, but an intelligent man, and to hav a champion of religion get up in an argument and make the statement that "the world is flat" does not help the case one bit. To use the language of one of our citizens, "Christianity was indeed murdered in the house of its friends last Thursday night." The public schools of Axtell still stick to the old version.

Obituary.

Harvy Roser, near Portland, Jay Co., Ind., died of consumption, August 1, 1884, aged twenty-three years and one month. His illness, which he bore patiently, lasted eighteen months. He was a young man of more than ordinary intelligence, and was respected by all who knew him; a Liberalist in the full sense of the word, and died maintaining that belief, though his Christian friends made every effort to induce him to abandon his belief for that of orthodoxy; but he gave them no encouragement. He was satisfied with Liberalism.

W. F. JAMIESON gave a funeral discourse at Currie, Minn., on Sunday, Aug. 24, to a church full of people, over the remains of Selden Shepard, son of Dr. Shepard, formerly residing near Bay City, Mich.

A Slander Nailed.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In his communication to THE TRUTH SEEKER last week, Mr. Stephen Pearl Andrews characterizes Auguste Comte as a "comprehensiv agglomerativ conceptualist," and intimates that Mr. Herbert Spencer is no better. The charge furnishes ground for an actionable cause against the publishers. So far as is known, the character of Mr. Spencer's mother was above reproach. Let the politicians hav the monopoly of scandal.

Poetic but Profane.

After a bee stings once, the naturalist
Says it dies.
The Spiritualist says there is no death.
Now, who lies?
If there is no death, then nature's law
Should be amended,
To kill that cursed busy bee
That hath offended.
Alas! 'tis sad to learn such things
Soar up to heaven on whistling wings,
And dwell in summer-land,
With their damned stings.

NELSON HUNT.

Stray Scraps.

A BOSTON clergyman states he feels that, as a minister of the gospel, he cannot indorse or vote for Mr. Cleveland, since having discovered his deflexion. Why not? His God is the reputed father of a child who was not the son of its mother's husband, and this child is the quasi founder of this gospel of which he is the minister.

SAID Senator Hoar at Concord, Mass., July 24th, at a meeting of the Republicans, quoting from James Russell Lowell's Bigelow papers: "The right to be a cursed fool is human. It's common, as a general rule, of every man who is born of woman." Then it is not common with men who are not born of woman, those who are born of horses, monkeys, dogs, cats, etc.? How is that for the Bible, the author of the Bigelow papers, and Senator Hoar for sound statement? And yet when our distinguished senator uttered the foolish scriptural aphorism he was greeted with "great laughter and applause."

A MIRACULOUS ESCAPE.—William Strange, one of the members of the Bicycle Club of Brockton, had a miraculous escape from instant death Friday morning. He was walking along the tracks of the Old Colony Railroad near Soule's lumber-yard when he was struck by the Woods Hall express, commonly known as the "Flying Dude," and was thrown twenty feet into the air. He landed by the side of the track, and when picked up he was found to be unhurt, barring a severe shaking up and a few bruises. The "Flying Dude" was making forty-five miles per hour when it struck Strange.—Boston Journal. Is it not about time that such statements came to an end in our respectable dailies? I hav seven by me equally ridiculous. If God was intending to work a miracle, why did he hav the car strike Strange at all, and throw him twenty feet into the air? Had he been suspended in the air a few feet, in the sight of all, directly over the car, and there remained until the train had passed, or been set out by the roadside while the "Flying Dude" was making forty-five miles per hour, and then set back again, there might be some reason in labeling it a "miraculous escape." A sham miracle that, when some one escapes an accident every day, and some one is killed every day, and no God interferes! Hav done, Messrs. Editors, with such folly, or admit that you can swallow Jonah, the whale, the sea, and all that in it is.

AT the New England Assembly, Framingham, Mass., July 23d, Mr. Yan Phow Lee, one of the Chinese students called home by the government two years ago, but who is now released from his vassalage to the empire and has re-entered school at New Haven, first spoke on the difference between the family disciplin of this land and his own—"the former were very severe in case of accident or disobedience. He wished he had the privilege of kissing all the little girls before him." No doubt, no doubt. We see Mr. Y. P. Lee is fast becoming Christianized by his clerical teachers (who shall say civilized?), when he selected, from the thousands of Sunday-school victims, "all the little girls" to kiss, and "nary" boy. And yet his amatory wish was greeted with laughter by the holy crowd of shepards and saints. Ram Chandra Bose spoke of his once being an idolater, worshiping the monkey, etc., and told his Chinese brother that the life of females in his country would exclude him effectually from his coveted osculatory gratifications, as marriage occurred before birth often, and always before nine years of age. And yet these Chinese clericals are instructing the elite of Boston in the way to Zion with their faces turned thitherwards. The conference on the evening of the same day discussed, "Bringing Children to Christian Decision." Mothers, keep watch of these holy kissers, whether Chinese or American, if you wish to preserve those little girls pure and unspotted from priestocracy.

An Idle Day.

DEAR GENE: You will remember that when I stated to Mr. Somerby my intention of going on a vacation by sea and land, he interposed the objection that I would not be admitted aboard any boat that sailed from New York. He thought I looked too much like a Jonah. With his words in my mind, it was not without some misgivings that on July 23d I applied at the office of the New York and Portland Steamship line for a ticket on board the Franconia for the latter place. But I passed in the fare to the clerk, accompanied by my card, and after an elaborate survey of both, he handed me a ticket on which the number of my berth was written and my name painfully misspelled. So far, thought I, Somerby was wrong.

Later on it began to look as though our business manager had made a close guess. In less than thirty minutes after leaving the wharf we bumped into the Sound steamer Rhode Island. She was sound no longer. We carried away the rail on her starboard quarter abaft the wheel. I don't vouch for the maritim architecture of that sentence, but if it is incorrect you know enough about repairing accidents to splice it. As for ourselvs, the projecting prow of our boat was broken off and far around with fragments strewed the sea. Down went the anchor, the cable hustling out through the iron-rimmed hole at great speed, and with a noise like that made by a train of cars. When it had been ascertained that the sailing qualities of our boat had not been impaired, the chain hustled back again, winding itself about a capstan which the crew revolved by means of handspikes. I noticed that the exercise of turning the capstan fast enough to take in the slack of the cable as it pushed itself out of the water caused the men to perspire and swear freely. When the anchor had climbed aboard, we resumed our course, and as we pushed our battered nose along up the East River we were the object of general interest and remark. The accident was due to the carelessness of the captain of the other boat. The only regret expressed aboard our vessel was that we had no bowsprit. In that case we would hav "lifted the whole saloon off the Rhode Island."

The excitement caused by the collision had scarcely been got under control when the windiest shower I ever experienced came down out of the northeast. Chairs and stools moved hastily across the deck and brought up against the lee rail. The awning snapped and flapped, and broke a stanchion or two before the crew could take it in. A large number of the passengers soon sought their staterooms to be alone. I hung to the rail in a sheltered place on the lower deck, and watched the elements, and thought again of Somerby's prediction and of the luckless man who journeyed long ago from Joppa to Tarshish. I would not, like him, go to sleep in the stern of the vessel, for, by a strange coincidence, the stateroom assigned to me was farther aft than any of the others. The rain soon ceased, and off to leeward I noticed that a whale was blowing water up into the air. Occasionally he threw a portion of his black and shining carcass above the surface of the water, and fluked his tail in a vicious manner that I did not like. His eye, if my imagination caught its expression aright, had a wicked gleam and was turned toward me. The parallel between my case and Jonah's seemed to grow more striking. I looked into the mess room. The crew were talking about something, but the purport of their conversation I could not catch. I glanced at the interior of the cabin. An old Scotchman had brought the Bible up close to the window to catch the last light of the fading day, and at the head of the page where he had opened the book I beheld the word "JONAH." That appeared to settle it. Somerby's reputation as a prophet was vindicated, and I could only await the last act which should fulfil his dire prediction. Resolved to await it patiently, I entered the cabin, sat down at the table, and proposed a game of eucher to a man who, I afterwards found out, was a Methodist minister. The scheme did not work. He was engaged in committing to paper some illustrations which he had drawn from recent events, namely, that we should be constantly prepared to die, in anticipation of collisions and storms; but, in case we were suffered to survive such adversities, we should submit to the divine will and patiently and cheerfully continue to liv. Such resignation impressed me deeply, and, so impressed, I hunted up my berth and slept soundly until the breakfast bell rang. The storm had by that time abated, no leviathan was to be seen, the old Scotchman was seasick in his berth, and I had missed the chance to spend three days sitting on the back tooth of a whale, looking out for land. It doesn't follow because a man can buy paper close and work up the book trade, that he is necessarily a prophet.

Now that I hav demonstrated the truth that the language of prophecy must not be pressed too closely, I would like to go back and bring up another chapter in my experience. When I went aboard the Franconia, the first person to attract my attention was a rather short and rotund gentleman sitting in the after part of the boat. He was regaling his mind on a copy of Harper's Weekly, and extracting material encouragement from a lunch-bag which lay on the seat beside him. I took his dimensions mentally according to my best judgment, and catalogued him as either a dynamiter or a clergyman. I thought he might be the former because he had such a guileless and inoffensiv look about him. In that regard, as well as in general make-up, he strikingly resembled the Anarchist, Henry Appleton. He had also, as I learned when he inquired the time of day, the full voice and distinct articulation peculiar to men accustomed to public speaking. But added to all, he bore a look of sanctimony mingled with good nature that made me incline toward the ministerial theory. His mouth was alternately pursed in deep reflection or broadened in a smile. We made ourselvs neighbors without much formality, and maintained a conversation on casual topics until we began passing through the quick water of Hell-Gate, when my new acquaintance inquired if that was not "Hurl-Gate." After that I knew he was a preacher, and put the question to him direct. He acknowledged modestly that it was his blessed prerogativ to break the bread of everlasting existence to a congregation of Methodists in Blairstown, New Jersey. I gave him my name and occupation, together with a copy of the Christian Advocate and Boston Investigator, which I chanced to hav in my pocket. He read the Advocate attentivly, but handed the Investigator back to me with a thoughtful countenance and a sad shake of the head.

Another thing happened which would hav convinced me that this man was a clergyman, even if I had had no other source of information. When the shower came up of which I hav spoken, there were several young and interesting ladies occupying the upper deck. I gained the lower deck in advance of these, and was standing near the companion-way when they attempted to descend. The stairs were steep and narrow, and an ill-mannered and audacious wind blew the drapery of the ladies about in such a manner that both hands were needed to keep it properly adjusted. Their descent was therefore attended with some embarrassments. I was about to step forward with what grace I could command to help the girls down, when something swept past me with a rush as though borne on the wings of the blast. It was the minister; and in less time than it takes me to write these words, or you to read them, each individual female had slid through his hands and was in the cabin. I bear him no grudge, for my chagrin at being relieved of so pleasant a duty was altogether swallowed up in admiration of his monumental nerve.

Next day the parson and I met again upon deck. The sun was sparkling upon the water of the Atlantic, the breeze just fresh enough to cool the air, and the ship rolled easily with the slight swell. Under these softening influences I wondered how any man could keep his mind strung up to the rigidity of Methodism. I looked compassionately upon my reverend companion, and tried to think scarcely less of him because he believed in everlasting fire and worms. I argued with myself that I would avoid a discussion of religion with him, and would speak kindly to the erring. Perhaps unkindness made him so. But the conflict was inevitable, in spite of my endeavors to avert it. I don't know what opened the ball. I can only remember that before I was aware of it he was talking to me of the peace that passeth understanding, the glory of God, the truths of the gospel, and so forth, and I was firing back at him questions that he could not answer, with a directness that he could not ignore. I had not read Col. Kelso's "Bible Analyzed" for nothing. When he finally made the remark, "Great is the mystery of godliness," I concluded that I might rest the matter there. That is the dodge-corner of the believer. You cannot drive him out of it, and if you press him hard he loses his temper. So we drifted away to other topics; talked some of philosophy, of poetry, and of personal experience. In the first we were tyros, in the second both could quote the same passages, while in reminiscence and rare anecdote I readily yielded him the palm. He told me stories of temptation resisted and unresisted; how sometimes a brother clergyman fled from the Delilah, and how at other times he did not, until I began to believe that the life of a preacher held out some substantial allurements after all. Then he turned to the trials that beset the man of God—the difficulties, for instance, of writing a weekly sermon. Congregations, he said, were often cold and unsympathetic, and could not appreciate a good sermon if they were so fortunate as to hear one. Before such assemblages of people he had worked himself into a perspiration and shouted himself hoarse over the sins of the world. But no response came, and he would leave off where he began. With the remark from him that there wasn't difference enough between us to quarrel over, I bade the Rev. Mr. Conklin good-night.

I parted from this gentleman at Portland, Me., with considerable regret. He invited me to visit his town and attend his church, and I told him we would be glad to see him at THE TRUTH SEEKER office whenever he chanced to visit New York. He took a boat for Orr's Island, and I wandered about the depot waiting for the train which should carry me away to the Aroostook.

I hav spoken of an old Scotchman whom I saw reading the story of Jonah aboard the boat. At the depot in Portland I found him seated upon his valise with the book of Psalms in his hand. He recognized me, and placed himself under my guidance. He was bound for some point in the province of New Brunswick, and our route would be the same for a long distance. We took a short walk together through the elm-shaded streets of the city. Before we had proceeded a hundred rods he stopped short and inquired,

"Young man, may I ask what place of worhip you attend when at home?"

Now, I had had enough of religious discussion in the company of the Rev. Mr. Conklin. I was more interested in looking at Portland. I was willing the old gentleman should make use of me as a guide and interrogation point, but if I must purchase his society at the price of a theological debate, then I should hav to try and struggle through without it. So I told him that I didn't worship. I didn't like to break the Sabbath day by going to church. I further informed him that I was a member of the Freethinkers' Association, believed Ingersoll to be doing the greatest work of any man on earth, living or dead, and wound up by giving him a card bearing my name and calling. I thought perhaps that would paralyze him and he would go back to the depot and wait for the train alone while I explored the city. But it wasn't his day for going back. He made me his confidant right away, stated the condition of his soul toward God, and wanted to know if I thought he stood right with the master. I assured him that in my judgment he was solid with Saint Peter, and would undoubtedly be furnished with an expensiv harp. He drew considerable consolation from my assurance; but wished I could also be brought to enjoy the comforts of his religion. I could not see that he was any more comfortable than myself, and his soul worried him more in a minute than mine had troubled me all my life. On the cars this man talked me to sleep, still harping on the same old string. There ought to be some remedy for this sort of religious persecution. No person is safe from it. I could enjoy talking with the minister, because he was a man of intelligence and thought, but this Scotchman is dogma personified, and religion has only furnished him with the capacity to become a bore.

Portland is the first city I had ever seen flourishing under the prohibitory law. There has been so much discussion of prohibition in THE TRUTH SEEKER that I took great interest in it. The steamer Franconia I had found to be manned by men from Maine, and all were prohibitionists from the deck up. The steward regarded the liquor question as something slightly more important than that of human slavery, and rum-selling was in his judgment a capital offense. I tried to discuss the matter with him from that point of view, and inquired as to the workings of the prohibitory law in his nativ state. He acknowledged that it did not prevent the surreptitious, or even open, sale of ardent spirits, but jumped at me with the proposition that under the present law Maine has fewer lunatics in her asylums, according to her population, than New York, and demanded peremptorily that I should furnish an explanation for that alleged fact. Now, I hav no prejudice against the prohibition of liquor-selling; I believe it would be a good thing; but the man was so arrogant that I found he could not be reasoned with, and I closed the discussion with the remark that the emptiness of Maine's asylums might possibly be in some measure accounted for by the fact that all her lunatics were not shut up.

Near to the wharf where the boat landed its passengers is a place that looks like an express office. I entered it in search of a time-table. Back of a low partition was a room with a bar running across one side of it, behind which stood a man smoking a short clay pipe. In answer to the jocose inquiry if he sold whisky, to my astonishment he set a bottle and glass upon the counter. I tested the contents of the bottle by the sense of smell; it was whisky, but more abominable smelling stuff never saluted my nostrils. I told the man that was rotgut, and he laughed sardonically. Between that place and the Maine Central depot whisky shops are conspicuous; and, standing upon the steps of the station, one can count no less than half a dozen places where, unless they hav some innocuous liquid that much resembles whisky in smell and color, ardent spirits can be obtained. I learned that, as election time approaches, no officer of the law who hopes to be again called to serve the people will endanger his prospects by meddling with a saloon keeper. The sympathy of the mass of voters is not with him. The result is that drinkers can get all the liquor they want by paying for it; but the remark of Artemas Ward applies here, that "the liquor is not so good in temperance hotels as it is in other hotels." The modus operandi of drinking in a hotel is something like this: Two men approach a tavern-keeper, and one inquires if he sells liquor. The reply is in the negativ. He then leads the way to a private room, takes a jug out of a trunk, and pours some of its contents into a pitcher, which he sets before his guests. The men turn out their dose, the landlord places them back to back, and in that position they raise their glasses and empty them. Neither has seen the other drink, but each is pretty confident that the other has just turned into his interior a dose of something that he would be better off without. They tell of a man here who manufactured a barrel of liquor according to a recipe which he had read. Turpentine was among the ingredients. Fortunately he never sold it. He drank the first dram himself, and it killed him.

I spent five hours looking about Portland. It is mainly made up of dwelling-houses. What occupation the people follow as a general thing I could not determin; there certainly are not manufactories enough to keep them busy. Fishing, clam-digging, and carting about cedar shingles were the most prominent industries I observed. At Portland I bought a ticket for Houlton, Aroostook Co., Maine, concerning which place and vicinage I will discourse next week. Your affectionate brother,

GEORGE MACDONALD.

More Politics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am pleased to see that you are a good enough Liberal to giv your patrons a hearing on the seemingly complicated political situation. But for myself, speaking from a genuin Liberal standpoint, I assert that there is nothing "complicated" about it at all. But a majority of your correspondents on this question seem to be in great trouble as to what is best to do in the coming contest. Now, this is the biggest conundrum that I hav had to wrestle with in this year of grace, 1884; and why? Because, after a true Liberal, who knows anything about the history of the parties in the field, has read their platforms, I think there should be no cause for hesitation, as there is only one thing that he can consistently do, and that is to vote for Butler. "And why Butler?" methinks I hear some one say. Because his official record is clean, and the only one that challenges investigation of his official action, and he stands on and indorses the only platform that contains any progressiv principles. Such being the case, I pity any Liberal who cannot see his way clearly, for he is a blind adherent to partyism, and all that that implies. Every intelligent Liberal knows that the two old parties hav outlived their usefulness—one livs on tradition, the other on dead issues and pretense. They were called into existence to perform a certain work. That being accomplished, they obstinately refuse to recognize the demands of the present. While we do not claim that the National platform covers the whole demands of Liberalism, we do claim that, either directly or indirectly, it meets a very large portion of them, because its sole aim and object is to establish that equality between the people under this government designed by its founders, and upon which its permanency absolutely depends, or history is a gigantic lie. And this means a more just distribution of the products of labor, which means more home comforts and a higher culture and development of brains for the laborer and his children. And hence he becomes less and less the tool of politician and priest.

In conclusion, I would earnestly make two suggestions. One is that you, Mr. Editor (if you deem it compatible with the best interests of your paper), publish in THE TRUTH SEEKER the platforms of the four parties now in the field. The other is that not only should every Liberal procure and read Gen. Butler's ringing address which appears in this morning's papers, but that every Liberal League hav it read in their meetings and discussed. I believe in getting all we can and developing our forces to the end that we may obtain more. JOHN WARR.

Paterson, N. J., Aug. 19, 1884.

To the Liberals' and Freethinkers' Conventions of 1884.

Will these conventions please to widen their program and recognize that there is a landlord, monopolizing, and also an office-holding priesthood, as well as a religious one, that hav been and are still cursing mankind throughout all ages? The landlording priesthood has been and is still rapidly monopolizing nearly all the soil, and reducing the laboring masses to a helpless state of tenure, hireling slavery, and pauperism, by a rentage exceeding the power of the whole business of society to pay. Both the hereditary and the elected office-holding priesthood, headed by kings, presidents, governors, and legislativ oligarchies, believed by the ignorant to represent the liberty, interest, and happiness of the whole people, are taxing them to the amount of half their labor, while the landlords lay the whole tax upon their tenants and extort nearly all the other half of their labor for themselvs; while these so-called rulers appropriate to themselvs, unchecked, enormous salaries, with the expenses of wars made by themselvs, and which the destitute people hav to fight. And yet, there is still a masculin priesthood that has enslaved womankind equally long that must be reformed.

Now, it is only a narrowness of view that prevents the mind from grasping at the reforming of all these priesthoods at once. I make the same attempt to instruct these conventions that I did last year to instruct our so-called land-reformers in that body, that it is the great quantity of land and ruling power that the aristocracies of Europe hav entailed upon themselvs that hav produced such a hell there, and not the righteous and inalienable right and title of entailment. For if a separate, equal, and perpetual share of the soil were entailed upon every human being as their natural right, with the privilege only of each sex exchanging them with each other, but never to be alienated by sale or debt of any kind, none would ever be without a home, the power of employment, and the means of a living.

I endeavored to call the attention of the congress to the ease with which we could, as nearly all the land in the United States is now surveyed into townships and sections, locate homesteads by entailing a certain quantity of the lands of all the present and future owners, so that all could organize by townships and vote direct for law, instead of candidates, throughout every state; rule themselvs by townships, and thus begin in the United States the last form of society, that of an inalienable farmstead self-governing democracy, thus establishing the true system of the moral world, which has been delayed four centuries longer than the true system of the physical world, by Copernicus, in consequence of all its institutions becoming founded upon erroneous principles.

But congressmen can appreciate their salaries far more than these thorough principles of a true form of society. They cannot soar over an earth converted into a landscape of farmsteads and parks combined, surrounded with forest trees on their boundaries; with fruit trees next; with cereal and vegetable fields and lake in the center; and with barn, wind mill, and electric mill combined to grind fibrous plants, fruits, cereals, and the electric light and fire for the neighboring dwellings. LEWIS MASQUERIER.

Christ Not Crucified Under Pontius Pilate.

It is now easy to account for the bewilderment of all who hav undertaken to write the history of primitiv Christianity. From Eusebius down to Renan they hav been hoodwinked by the false accounts of Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate. The fact that a Jesus was stoned and hanged for sorcery in Judea about 75 B.C. was scarcely known even to learned Jews when gentile pens fabricated the gospels that now survive, describing the event as happening a hundred years later. It was an audacious and a clumsy fraud, but in an uncritical age it was successful. The contradictions of the gospel writers are fatal to the historical truth of the story; and in some of the narrativs that were extant in the time of Eusebius there was a fatal blunder in regard to the year of the crucifixion. Pilate was appointed procurator in the twelfth year of Tiberius, which was A.D. 25 or 26. This Eusebius proves by Josephus, and then remarks:

"Hence the fraud of those persons is plainly proved, who lately, and at other times, hav given currency to certain spurious acts against our savior, in which the very time of the date proves the falsehood of the inventors. For in the fourth consulship of Tiberius, which was the seventh year of his reign [A.D. 20-21] those things are said to hav occurred, which they hav dared to say respecting his salutary suffering [i. e. crucifixion]. At which time indeed it is plain that Pilate was not yet appointed over Judea, if Josephus is to be credited, who plainly says, in the work already cited [Ant. xviii, 2, §2, and 4, §2] that Pilate was appointed procurator of Judea by Tiberius, in the twelfth year of his reign" (Eus. i, 9).

Thus it appears that as late as the fourth century there were those who alleged that Christ was crucified A.D. 21.

Eusebius is very indignant at these propagators of falsehood, and finds it as easy to upset their chronology as the "Man of Sin" does to detect the false chronology of Luke, which the first church historian accepts without question. For example, take the very next chapter of Eusebius: Following the text of Luke, he says that in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, which was the fourth year of Pilate, Jesus Christ was in his thirtieth year. That is to say, he was twenty-nine years old A.D. 29. But what Christian authority now holds that Jesus was only twenty-nine in that year? They are all compelled to admit that he was born at least four if not seven years before the Christian era.

But not only was Eusebius hoodwinked by fabricated gospels; he was deceived by forgeries interpolated in Josephus. He devotes a chapter to "The Testimonies respecting John the Baptist and Christ," in which he quotes the spurious passages in Josephus concerning John and Jesus—passages which were admitted to be forgeries by David Blondel, a French Protestant divine who lived a hundred years before Dr. Lardner. Having adduced these forged testimonies, the pious historian waxes wroth again at the propagators of "spurious acts against our savior," denouncing them in this manner:

"When such testimony as this is transmitted to us by a historian who sprung from the Hebrews themselvs, both respecting John the Baptist and our savior, what subterfuge can be left to prevent those from being convicted destitute of all shame, who hav forged the acts against them?" (Eus. i, 11.)

Some hav suspected that Eusebius forged the passage in Josephus concerning Christ. But as the earlier interpolation about John the Baptist was quoted (though erroneously) by Origen a hundred years before, Eusebius, perhaps, was not cognizant of the later interpolation of the passage concerning Christ.

The attempt to fix either the year or the day of the alleged crucifixion has always failed; the problem remains unsolved. In the early part of 1882 a Mr. W. T. Lyman wrote as follows to the London Standard:

"The old idea that our Lord's passion and resurrection occurred A.D. 33 (given in most Bibles which hav dates in the margins), was founded on the traditional belief that he was about 33 years on earth. . . . The only real doubt about the date of the resurrection is whether it was A.D. 29 or 30. Now astronomy tells us that the full moon, which would be Paschal in the former year, fell on Saturday, April 16th, which is inconsistent with the circumstances narrated. But in A.D. 30 that full moon was on Thursday, April 6th, on which day the Passover meal was eaten [at evening], and our Lord suffered the next day (in our reckoning [but] the same day in the Jewish), on which other observances connected with the Passover were still to be kept. This, then, I hav little doubt, was the true year; and if so, of course the first Easter was on April 9th, on which day we shall this year celebrate its anniversary."

Another theologian, Justice Joseph P. Bradley, of the Supreme Court of the United States, has undertaken to solve the problem, and he figures out the same result as Mr. Lynn did before him. His honor says:

"There were only three years from A.D. 27 to A.D. 35 inclusiv in which the 1st of Nisan, and consequently the 15th of Nisan, happened on Friday, and these were A.D. 27, 30, and 33, the last of which is very doubtful. But the crucifixion could not hav happened before A.D. 28, and probably not later than A.D. 31. Therefore, the year 30 is the only one which satisfies all the conditions of the problem. It does satisfy them, because it givs opportunity for Jesus to teach publicly for about three years, and to attend three Passovers during his ministry; or four, according as it commenced before or after April 3, A.D. 27. Now, since in A.D. 30 the 1st of Nisan fell on Friday, the 24th of March, the 15th fell on Friday, the 7th of April, which was the day of the crucifixion."

We now quote McClintock and Strong's Cyclopedia on the same question:

"The results of strict lunar calculation indicate only one of the six years mentioned [form A.D. 28 to 33 inclusiv], viz, A.D. 29, in which the 14 Nisan was the 18th of March and Friday. If a certain laxity as to the rule be allowed, a 14th Nisan may possibly hav fallen on the 3d of April, Friday, in A.D. 33. But if in compliance with the apparent import of the first three gospels, without explanation from the fourth, it is contended that the crucifixion took place on the day after [!] the Passover, the year may hav been A.D. 30, in which the 15th Nisan fell on Friday, 7th April; or A.D. 33, in which it was (in strictness) Friday, 3d April" (Art. Chronology).

This writer differs from the other two when he says that the 14th of Nisan was the Passover day, unless he means by the 14th the beginning of the Jewish 15th at sunset. He also contradicts them in saying that the 15th of Nisan, A.D. 30, was the day after the Passover. The 14th was only the preparation. At sunset, when the 15th of Nisan began, the lamb was roasted and eaten; the next day, i. e. the 15th, was the holy convocation (see Smith's Bib. Dic). But the three calculators agree that the 15th of Nisan, A.D. 30, was Friday, April 7th, as it certainly was, for the full moon fell on that day. It is also true that March 18, A.D. 29, was Friday, but it could not hav been the 15th of Nisan, because the Jewish Passover never occurs before March 26th. Therefore Christ was not crucified on a Passover Friday A.D. 29.

Nevertheless, that was the year fixed by the early fathers. Clement of Alexandria positivly affirms that Jesus suffered in the fifteenth year of Tiberius (A.D. 29); and Tertullian fixes the day March 25th (Misc I. To the Jews, 8). The ancient Syriac documents discovered in 1841-7 place the crucifixion in the same year (Ante-Nicene Lib.). The early fathers were therefore consistent in limiting the ministry of Christ to one year. Irenæus, however, insisted that it must hav been at least twenty years, and that Jesus lived to be an old man (Heres. ii, 22, §4, 5). Hippolytus, a disciple of Irenæus, repeated substantially the same strange blunder (Refut. x, 29). Both accepted the four gospels as authority, and believed that Christ was crucified under Pontius Pilate, whose procuratorship ended A.D. 37. Irenæus also averred that Christ died on "the sixth day of the feast," instead of the first or great Passover day, and that it was "the day of the preparation," i. e., for the sabbath (Heres. v, 23, §2). And Tertullian made a similar mistake in saying that it was March 25th, which, though Friday, was a whole week after the full moon in March, A.D. 29.

But if the crucifixion was on the Passover day as described in the Synoptics, there seems to hav been no Passover Friday between A.D. 28 and 33 inclusiv, but April 7, A.D. 30; so that upon the evidence adduced, judgment must be rendered in favor of Messrs. Lynn & Bradley.

But, unfortunately for the cause of Christianity, every gentile theologian, from Clement of Alexandria down to Mr. Justice Bradley, has been misled into a fatal error by the forgers of the Synoptic gospels. Every learned Jew knows that the great Passover day was never allowed to fall on Friday; and that the Jews never tried or executed anybody on that holy day. And the forger of the fourth gospel knew this when he described the crucifixion as occurring the day before the Passover.

Excommunicated.

We learn by the Missoulian that at the celebration of high mass, Sunday, August 9th, Bishop Brondel formally excommunicated Manager John Maguire from the Catholic church. Mr. Maguire's sin was not that he had committed murder and buried the body of his victim in the sand; nor that he had been guilty of adultery in the sight of all Montana; nor even secretly betrayed the wife of one of his people; nor ruined his handmaiden and driven her forth into the wilderness with his child at her breast; neither had he borrowed jewelry and raiment and left the country between two days; nor was he a horse-thief or a robber of cornfields; his record for veracity was unimpeached; he did not get drunk on the fruit of the vine, and suffer disgrace through his daughters; he had done none of these things, but his crime was in arranging in the state a series of lectures for Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll.

We hav not seen the bull of excommunication, and therefore cannot tell if an anathema was included with it; nor whether it read like the pronunciamento against a heretic of Spain, issued last year, in which this cheerful language was used:

"In the name of the omnipotent God, of the father, of the son, of the holy canons, of the holy Virgin Mary, mother of God, and of all the celestial virtues; of the angels and archangels, of the thrones and the denominations, seraphim and cherubim, of the holy patriarchs and prophets, of all the apostles and evangelists, of the holy innocents, who only were declared worthy of singing the new psalm in the presence of the eternal, of the holy martyrs and holy confessors, of the holy virgins, and also of all the saints and elected of the Lord. We excommunicate and anathematize this heretic (or this impious), and we sequestrate him of the holy church of God, so that, condemned to the eternal penalty, he may fall into the abyss like Dathan and Abiram, and like all those who dared to say unto the Lord, 'Get away from us, for we don't want to know your way.' And as the fire is extinguished in water, so may his soul be extinguished in the eternity of the centuries, unless he should reform and admit his fault. Amen. Cursed be he of God the father, creator of men; cursed be he of God the son, who suffered for men; cursed be he of the Holy Ghost, who descended upon him in the baptism; cursed may he be by the holy cross on which Jesus suffered, triumphant for our salvation; may he be cursed by the mother of God, most holy Mary, always virgin; cursed may he be by Saint Michael, guardian of the sacred souls; cursed may he be also by all the angels and archangels, the princes and potentates, with all the militia of the celestial army; may he be cursed by the numerous patriarchs and prophets; cursed may he be by Saint John the precursor, who spilt the water of baptism over Jesus; may the malediction of Saint Peter, Saint Paul, Saint Andrew, and all the apostles, and of the rest of the disciples of Jesus Christ, and of the four evangelists, whose preaching converted the whole world, fall upon him; cursed may he be by the wonderful multitude of martyrs and professors who pleased God by their good works; cursed may he be by the chorus of sacred virgins who depreciated the riches of this world for their love to Jesus Christ; cursed may he be by all the saints who, from the beginning of the world until the end of the centuries, hav pleased and will please God. In conclusion, cursed may he be by the earth and all the holy things it contains; cursed be he wherever he may go, whether he be at his house, in the field, in the road, in a path, in the bush, in the water, or in the church; cursed be he living, dying, eating, drinking, quenching hunger, or quenching the thirst; when he may fast, when he may induce sleep, when he may sleep, when he may walk, when he may be standing, when he may sit down, when he may lie down, when he may work, when he may rest, mingendo, cacando et flebotomando. Cursed be all the strength of his body; cursed be he inside, outside, his hair, his brains; cursed be he in the head, in the temples, in the forehead, in the ears, in the eyebrows, in the eyes, in the cheeks, in the jaws, in the nose, in the incisors, in the molars, in the lips, in the throat, in the shoulders, in the arms, in the hands, in the fingers, in the chest, in the heart, in all the internal parts of the body, in the kidneys, in the groin, in the femur (sic original), in genitalibus, in the thighs, in the knees, in the legs, in the feet, in all the articulations, and in the nails; cursed be he in the juncture of all the parts of his members; may not a point of the body, from the top of the head to the soles of the feet, remain sane; cursed may he be by Jesus Christ, son of live God, with all the power of his majesty, and may there rise against him heaven, with all the virtues which it contains, so as to deliver him to the eternal punishment, if he does not repent and confess his fault. Amen. May it happen to him! may it happen to him! Amen."

It is well for Mr. Maguire that this is the nineteenth and not the sixteenth century. As it is, he can afford to smile at his bishop, and ask him what he is going to do about it. Excommunication in Montana cannot be a very heavy punishment.

Polygamy on Trial.

The joys of the Mormon priesthood do not always, it seems, take the form of unalloyed happiness. Last week we had to chronicle a meeting between three Mormon elders and several other Christians in Tennessee, in which the arguments used assumed the shape of bullets, and the Mormons were killed. Incidentally, some women and children lost their lives. The elders believed in and inculcated polygamy as taught by the Bible; their opponents did not; and that constituted the difference which led to the above fatal results. So much for the defense of the plural wife system.

News now comes from Salt Lake City that two priests in high standing are in a fair way to lose all their emoluments because they refuse to add to their stock of better half by taking a polygamous wife. The first instance is that of Bishop Cluff, president of the Summit County Stake of Zion, and presiding bishop of Coalville. For some years Mr. Cluff has been living in more or less happiness with one wife. His official position in state and church is a sinecure. He has, as we understand the working of the Mormon hierarchy, the appointment of all civil offices in his diocese, and the tithings pass through his hands, which he has, undoubtedly, kept waxed sufficiently to hold the wherewithal to supply his material wants. A notice from the "First Presidency" has been received by him to the effect that unless he should consent to obey the prophet and take a second wife while his first wife continued to liv and was undivorced, all these perquisits should be taken from him. In case he obeyed, more should be added. Mr. Cluff has decided to obey the law of the land instead of the prophet, and declines to re-marry. This may be the promptings of his own private and personal virtue, but there is reason to believe that Mrs. Cluff encouraged him materially in arriving at his decision. He therefore tenders his resignation from all the church offices which he holds, and at last accounts was awaiting its acceptance. The further action of the "First Presidency" in the matter is yet to be made public. It is but proper to add that in this contest Mr. Cluff sinks into comparativ obscurity, and Mrs. Cluff and the "First Presidency" stand forth as the principal combatants. If the "First Presidency" withdraws its motion, the result will be a victory for woman and a vindication of her right to an undivided husband.

The second recusant is Mr. Abraham Hatch, of Heber City, also president of a stake of Zion. The Salt Lake Daily Tribune thus describes the temporal circumstances of Mr. Hatch:

"He has one of the softest snaps in Zion. His flock is remarkably well trained. Every one knows and obeys the sound of his horn. Not a trade is made without his sanction; scarcely a dollar finds its way into circulation in Heber City until it has passed through his waxed hands, and he picks his tithing steers, and wheat, and poultry. Everybody trades at Abe's Co-op. store, and pay Abe's Co-op. prices. He looks after the small offices and the taxes, and generally he is king."

Mr. Hatch is at present living with a second wife, the first Mrs. Hatch having died. Mrs. Hatch II. is described as young, buxom, and red-haired. Her predecessor had sufficient influence over her husband to prevent his contracting polygamous relations with other women, but the persuasiv or coerciv power, as the case may be, of the present incumbent of the elder's affections, remains to be tested. The "First Presidency" has not as yet received intimation of what course Bishop Hatch intends to take, but in the opinion of the journal from which we hav already quoted he "will prove equal to the great trial, and will come out in a manner which Abraham will construe to be on top."

From this narration it will be seen that at least a third of that sentiment dear to every American heart, of "One country, one flag, and one wife," is rife in Utah as well as in Tennessee.

A Mystery Adequately Accounted For.

We are in receipt of the following letter from an esteemed correspondent in Red Rock, Montana:

"To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In your paper you say that according to the Rev. Dr. Eddy, Martin Harris denied that he ever saw the plates of the Mormon Bible or made a certificate to that effect. Now, I hav had a son of Martin Harris in my employ for some time, and I hav every reason to believe he is a truthful man. He says that he had heard his father say that he saw the plates and also saw the angel appear to Joe Smith. He says his father died a Mormon and always believed in the Book of Mormon, but rejected the polygamy part of the religion. How do you account for it? I tried to get him to describe the angel, but was unsuccessful, or I would giv you a description of the fellow.

"W. R. McIntosh."

The only information we hav upon the subject is that which was quoted from the Rev. Dr. Eddy, and we can add nothing further; but it is related of a certain boy (we do not know that his name was Martin Harris, or Rev. Dr. Eddy) that he stated that his father and mother had a daughter who was in no wise related to himself. The mystery was accounted for on the theory that the boy lied.

Editorial Notes.

One Dr. Fisher recently labored for two mortal hours and more in a hall at Livington, Montana, over an attempt to answer Col. Ingersoll. The editor of the Livingston Tribune, after a survey of the field of battle, finds the prevailing opinion to be that the doctor "did neither logically nor scientifically answer Col. Ingersoll, which fact is altogether against the doctor and in favor of Ingersoll."

The World's Convention of "Young Men's" Christian Associations now in session at Berlin apparently consists in part of persons whose claim to juvenility must be youthfulness in wisdom rather than in wickedness and in years. We learn that among the prominent delegates from America, Major-Gen. O. O. Howard and others whose age is between fifty and seventy are activly interested.

The Rev. T. K. Cheyne has produced a new translation of the so-called Psalms of David. Those who are competent to judge of such things do not consider it an eminent success. Part of the twenty-third Psalm, for instance, varies from the accepted version so as to read, "Thy club and thy staff they comfort me." This is no improvement. Except when used in self-defense, it is difficult to understand how a great amount of comfort can be extracted from a club.

The religious press has to admit that many failures of faith homes and faith cures hav been chronicled of late. The reason for the failure of this school of healers is that they make the mistake sometimes of attempting to cure those in whose physical organism disease really exists. When people are affected only with imaginary ailments, it is comparativly easy to make them imagin they are cured. So-called "faith" cures undoubtedly owe their efficacy, if they hav any, to this fact, Zion's Herald publishes an extensiv article on the dangers of reading Liberal literature, into the habit of which it fears many of its constituents hav fallen. This illustrates the difference between Liberalism and Christianity. Who ever heard of a Freethought paper warning its readers against a perusal of Christian literature, including the Bible, except such portions of it as are not fit for anybody to read on account of their immorality? The reason there are so many Christians is that they hav not made themselvs familiar with their own literature in the light of rational criticism.

Our Butler contemporary on Broadway has discovered the religious aspects of some of the different presidential candidates and publishes them thus:

"The godly are trying by certificate of clergy to make out Blaine a good Presbyterian. Logan is a swearing Methodist. Cleveland comes of a clerical family, chiefly Presbyterian, but is said not to enjoy much religion himself. Hendricks and West unknown to Man. Butler, Liberal Episcopal. but secular in politics. St. John and all the rest of them, God-in-the-Constitution till the last Infidel is hung."

The prospect of voting for one of these men is not a very cheering prospect for Liberals whose central object is the secularization of the state.

The Advocate announces that the first Sunday in September will see many aberrant pastors back in their pulpits, and wonders what the harvest will be, and how the ministers hav employed their time, whether in this-worldliness or other-worldliness. As to what one distinguished clergyman was doing part of the time we are prepared to furnish satisfactory information. A lady at Long Branch, through the Philadelphia Times, givs her experience with a member of the cloth whom she was so unfortunate as to meet. She says: "He approached me under the pretense of tender solicitude for what he termed my peculiarly trying position. He offered to be of service to me in any way I might see fit to command. He soon drifted into flattery of my personal charms and in an insidious voice talked of the magnetic influence I had exercised over him through the distance of the vast dining-room. He evidently regretted the practices of Freelove were not laws of our civilization and is firm in the belief that they will be in heaven. I suppose anywhere they were not a code would not be a heaven to him. He took the usual course which every man and woman understands. He asked to be received in my private apartments, desired me to meet him in the summer-house at 9 P.M., and invited me to drive. As his carriage only seated two and I never drive alone, I was obliged to offer my regrets. I was ill with the humiliation of a first bold offense. He is the father of a family of daughters as old as myself; the immaculate shepherd of a spotless fold; a shining-robed prophet guiding the footsteps of the children of Israel; an eminent Fifth avenue clergyman!"

THE reported going over of Mr. George Chainey from Materialism to Spiritualism is not received on every hand without protest. The Investigator observes:

"When a man is fully convinced that Spiritualism is true, he no doubt acts conscientiously or justly in accepting it. There can be no mistake about this, for we are all in search of truth, no matter where it comes from or where it leads. But Mr. Chainey, according to his reported remarks in the Banner, says or implies that Liberalism is nothing but a 'mere negation' or 'a system of denial,' made so by its 'Agnosticism.' We were not before aware that Liberalism was such a peculiar system, and we shall be obliged to Mr. Chainey if he will please inform us what demonstrated truth it denies, or wherein it is a negation of any fact; and in regard to Agnosticism, what more does he know of God, now that he is a Spiritualist, than he did when, as a professed Liberal, he denounced him as 'the tyrant of the sky?'"

The Investigator's remarks are certainly both sensible and pertinent, provided the speaker was correctly reported. This is a matter, however, concerning which we should prefer to hold our judgment in suspense until Mr. Chainey chooses to let himself be heard from in regard to it, and even then we do not know that we should be specially called upon to offer remarks. This is the age of bolts.

As we took the liberty of saying last week, the insinuation of the Rev. Martin Kellogg that deception was practiced to obtain the use of the Congregational church in Sound Beach, Conn., for a non-religious funeral service, is without foundation in fact. Mr. Putnam has published the following letter in the New York Sun:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN, Sir: I wish to offer a few words in explanation of the funeral services in memory of Mrs. Charles E. Palmer, lately held at Sound Beach, in the Congregational church. I conducted the services with the full understanding that I was the representativ of the Freethinkers. The original condition was not that the services should be conducted by some evangelical minister. The only condition insisted upon was that nothing antagonistic to Christianity should be said, and this was agreed to by myself—and need not indeed hav been made, for I should not, as a gentleman, in such circumstances attack the religious creed of anybody. I simply gave utterance to my own belief and hope in the sad presence of death. I said nothing about the belief of others. Mrs. Palmer herself was a Freethinker; her husband and near relativs and most cherished friends were Freethinkers. They did not want the consolations of Christianity, but the consolations of Freethought. It was my right and my duty in an hour of such supreme sorrow to express that faith which was dearest to them and to me—faith in nature, humanity, and the infinit life of all. This I did with the kindest feeling and reverence for the faith of others, and I challenge anyone to find a word in my discourse that showed the least disrespect for the hope of those who differ from myself. The Freethinkers of Sound Beach were perfectly honorable in all that they did in this matter. If Christianity is love, then certainly it should open its door to every burial service, and the church being untaxed on the ground of its public use, the Freethinkers of Sound Beach, who form a large part of the community and hav paid taxes for years, were entitled to its use. If there is any scandal, therefore, it is with the uncharitableness of the Christians, not with the open avowal of the Freethinkers' belief.

"SAMUEL P. PUTNAM."

The Rev. Mr. Kellogg has started a discussion which can only present himself and his religion in a very unattractiv light.

LIBERALS hav, perhaps, no especial reason for entertaining a profound respect for the man Bowen, owner of the orthodox Independent. It is true that that paper is the fairest of the religious journals that hav come to our notice, but that is not saying a great deal in its praise, and may be due to the fact that, while Mr. Bowen owns the paper, he does not edit it. We supposed, however, that the outside world regarded so eminently pious a publisher as but little lower than the average angel; but such, it seems, is not the case. "Gath," writing to the Cincinnati Enquirer, has this to say of him, together with some reminiscences of Theodore Tilton and what has passed into history as the "Brooklyn" scandal:

"With a fondness for mixing into affairs, Bowen has all his life had something to do between religion and printing. He was one of the men who brought Henry Ward Beecher from Indianapolis to Brooklyn city and set him up in Plymouth church. In the course of time they had a deadly quarrel, which has probably never been settled. All sorts of reasons were given for this fight, but men of experience merely thought it might be the selfishness of two men, each ambitious to get the most praise and the most pay out of mingled piety and printing. Beecher, though a minister of the gospel, was an industrious merchant, making books, figuring for high prices in the newspapers, lecturing; and there has hardly been an exhibition of more thorough money-getting ability than his in any upright branch. Bowen saw Brooklyn grow up from a mere ferry village beside New York to be a growing city with many churches and a certain home sentiment. He got hold of the Independent newspaper and put Theodore Tilton in control of it. Tilton was a man of the writing ability, much tickled with his own importance, and entirely incapable of modifying an opinion expressed in the face of the public. If there is any hell a good many people will go to it from mere consistency's sake and that self-love which comes from an ostensible moral boldness and radicalism. We are living to find out all this kind of people. Tilton abandoned his boyhood after he got his name in print. He flung away his childhood for the sweet satisfaction of reading his own articles. He thought that if he was only uncompromising enough people would take him after awhile for Wendell Phillips or some natural crank of sincerity. When William M. Evarts undertook to defend Andrew Johnson, Tilton denounced him in the Independent for standing by such a client. You can see how uninhabitable this continent would hav been after awhile if such newspapers—or papers, for they did not contain much news—permanently got control of it. The people need to look out for all the forms of tyranny, which grows like a jimson weed. The Independent finally made almost as much money as Bowen's dry-goods store had done. He began to giv prizes and secure great writers, and the sheet was an object of envy to the more evangelical sheets. All these evangels were flying around like a newsboy on wings selling papers in the name of heaven. Some of the evangelists were pro-slavery angels, some of them were dough-faced angels, some were radical angels, but nobody, as far as known, refused the ten cents for the paper. Bowen found an uncompromising sheet of mingled arrogance and piety so profitable that he concluded to hav a daily paper in Brooklyn and let nobody in that town take a contrary position from him. So he started a concern called the Union, and had Theodore Tilton take charge of it. At this period of his life Tilton seemed about to become a national nuisance. With one daily paper and one religious paper, and his audacity and superficiality, there was no knowing what would become of this country and the comforts of life. But it pleased the Lord to send confusion among those saints in the shape of a woman. The little, unforeseen, unknown, spare Elizabeth Tilton was presently to become a bigger man than old Beecher. Theodore Tilton graduated as a writer in the letters he wrote to Beecher—letters which seemed to contain such a precious secret that he almost hated to giv it away."

THE National Reformer, Mr. Bradlaugh's paper, is following up the story of a modern miracle with a mercilessness that bids fair to fasten a lie upon some imaginativ Christian person. In the issue of the paper named, of August 24th, Mr. Bradlaugh says:

"In the National Reformer for May 25th, we quoted from the Christian a story about an Infidel young man alleged to hav been struck dead while delivering a blasphemous prayer, which professed to be taken from a paper called The Truth. This we again referred to in National Reformer, August 3rd. The original story as given in the Christian was alleged to hav been related by a minister, as having 'occurred under his personal observation.' Challenged upon the truth of the story, the editor of the Christian referred an inquirer to the Rev. Dr. Brookes, of St. Louis. editor of the paper called The Truth. Dr. Brookes, who on June 20th happened to be in this country [England] at Hadley House, Barnet, writes that the story was related to him in March last, in the presence of two friends, by the Rev. Mr. Slaymaker, of Pass Christian, Mississippi, who 'with great solemnity assured me that the narrativ was strictly true.' Mr. Chas. B. Cox, editor of The Truth, St. Louis, in July, furnishes a later statement by the Rev. W. A. Slaymaker, saying that the account originally published in The Truth was correct, but that 'the occurrence did not take place under my observation,' and alleging as his authority an unnamed gentleman described as 'an elder of the church.' On July 12th, in answer to another querist, the Rev. W. A. Slaymaker admits that there are several inaccuracies in the story, and says that the unnamed gentlemen was Dr. T. N. Anglin. It is not pretended that Dr. Anglin was present when the death took place, but that he had 'talked with persons who were present.' We are pressing our inquiries, and up to the present we hav a very strong impression that the Rev. W. A. Slaymaker has a vivid imagination. He now says that the young man lived at Jonesboro', Jefferson county, Alabama, where his father, E. A. Jones, still resides, and that he made a mistake in saying that the death was at Gainsville. The Rev. W. A. Slaymaker pretends now that the death took place in September or October, 1842, and that some telegram detailing the occurrence appeared at the time in the Daily Age, Birmingham, Alabama. We had already applied to the authorities at Gainsville, that being the place formally given by Dr Slaymaker when his truthfulness was first challenged. We hav now transferred our researches to Jonesboro', and we hav applied to the editor of the Christian to join us in a formal investigation, he to pay the expenses if the story is a falsehood, we to bear the cost if the story is 'strictly true.' We should be glad if the Boston Investigator and THE TRUTH SEEKER would help us."

In our opinion Mr. Bradlaugh is following an ignis-fatuus, but his endeavors to prove it such deserve to be encouraged. If, therefore, any person whose eye may fall upon this is able to furnish reliable information on the subject, such information will be thankfully received at this office. In all probability a lie is out; let it be traced to its source, which is without doubt the place where most of the current falsehoods of past and present hav originated.

Lectures and Meetings,

MR. JAMIESON is expected to deliver a series of five lectures in Currie, Minn., in the course of a few weeks. He is engaged to giv three lectures in Sanborn on: 1. "Is the Bible divine?" 2. "The Jehovah of the Jews." 3. "Hell closed for Repairs."

THE secretary of the Manhattan Liberal Club of this city has issued the following notice:

"NEW YORK, Sept. 1, 1884.

"The 343d Regular Meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club will be held at German Masonic Temple, 220 East 15th street, on Friday evening, Sept. 5th. A special meeting is called on the same date for the purpose of electing Delegates to the Cassadaga Congress of the National Liberal League, of which organization this club is an auxiliary.

"A. C. MACDONALD, Sec."

So shall the parted meet once more, and pay the treasurer at the door the nickel customary; and he'll be promptly there on time—the youth who writes this humble rhyme—the Assistant Secretary.—Com.

Previous Nominations Heartily Indorsed.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav read with considerable interest the views expressed by that unflinching and uncompromising Liberal, Samuel P. Putnam, regarding the new departure of the League, proposing and heartily urging the nomination of George Chainey—who, I am sure, if elected to the highest office within the gift of the National Liberal League, would put a new impetus to the great movement. It is high time that we select young blood to infuse increased life and vigor in the ranks of the growing army of Liberals. While I entertain the most exalted opinion regarding the ability of Mr. Wakeman, and fully appreciate the good he has done the cause, I cannot help but feel that much more could be accomplished under the leadership of one whose undivided attention is given to the demands of Liberalism at the present day. The Newark Liberal League, I believe, is one of the most prosperous and therefore important branches of the National organization. We hav a splendidly furnished meeting-place of our own, and command a large weekly attendance. The past season has been the most gratifying in every particular in the history of our League, and George Chainey's lectures hav in no small measure contributed to our success. Friend Putnam has also aided us in many ways, and we therefore feel under obligations to both. With George Chainey as president and Samuel P. Putnam as secretary of the National Liberal League we could inaugurate an era that would bring thousands of the younger element into our ranks. There are many of our own acquaintances who would gladly manifest a greater interest in the movement if assured of more activity. Something should be done to secure the co-operation of young men and women, and I firmly believe that the election of George Chainey would result in that direction. We must make our cause as interesting and entertaining as possible. The church depends entirely upon music and other attractiv features, and we must therefore fight it largely upon the same grounds. I am a young man myself, and had the honor of calling the first meeting of the Newark Liberal League to order nearly seven years ago. Since then I hav labored hard and continuously to make our meetings equally interesting to young and old. Day by day I grow stronger in the religion of humanity, and am willing to make great sacrifices for the benefit of the Liberal cause. I sincerely hope the convention which is about to be held will recognize how essential it is to grant us young folks a few favors. I should like nothing better than the election of George Chainey for president and Samuel P. Putnam for secretary, and know that I merely echo the sentiments of all our members.

Yours with heart and soul for humanity,

JOSEPH W. FRANKEL.

Newark, N. J., Aug. 28, 1884.

The Choice of the Pittsburgh League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The silence of the Pittsburgh Liberal League in reference to the nomination of officers of the National Liberal League should not be construed into indifference, or as indicating a lack of interest in the success of that organization. We regret that any necessity should hav arisen for the election of new officers, and while we are sorry to part with Messrs. Wakeman and Leland, we appreciate their reasons for wishing to retire, and hereby extend to them our sympathy and thanks for their services. We hav noted the various nominations for their successors, sometimes with amusement and sometimes with anxiety, and as it appears to be a "free for all" contest, we hav concluded to enter the lists.

Last night, at a special meeting of the Pittsburgh League, the following nominations for officers of the National League were made:

For president,	S. P. Putnam,	of	N. Y.
" vice-pres't	J. E. Remsburg,	"	Kan.
" secretary,	C. B. Reynolds,	"	N. Y.
" treasurer,	Courtlandt Palmer,	"	N. Y.
" ch. ex. com.,	J. H. Burnham,	"	Mich.
" ch. fin. com.,	Mrs. H. S. Lake,	"	Cal.

Now, without intending any disparagement to the worthy gentlemen already nominated, and with due respect to the opinions of those nominating them, we offer our ticket in the interests of the national organization. It is not recommended as particularly ornamental, but it is emphatically intended for use.

We trust we shall not appear unduly egotistical if we state that our choice is based upon an acquaintance with most of the candidates proposed, and the preference given to those named because of our faith in their ability and willingness to do the work required.

As a scholar and philosopher Mr. Putnam has few superiors. Besides being right theoretically, he is thoroughly alive to the practical necessities of League work, and has the generalship to plan a successful campaign.

Mr. Reynolds is but a recent acquisition to the secular ranks, and while, like most young converts, he is brimful of enthusiasm, it is not the kind that evaporates. He is a regular Boanerges, and contains more work than a ten-pound can of dynamite.

Being both of the Empire state, Messrs. Putnam and Reynolds could the more easily confer and travel together.

I might giv cogent reasons for the selection of the other names on the ticket, but the parties are so well known that the reasons will readily suggest themselvs.

On the question of a change of name, Pittsburgh votes No! The National Liberal League has never done anything of which it might be ashamed, and does not find it necssary to go West and change its name.

We hereby desire to express our wish that wisdom may guide the deliberations at Cassadaga, harmony prevail, and the best men win.

HARRY HOOVER, Sec. Pittsburgh (Pa.) L. L.

MR. WALSER has published in book form, bound in blue boards, the "Little Lessons for Little Folks" which Mrs. Slenker has contributed to the columns of his paper, the Liberal, during the past few months. They are easy and familiar explanations of things met every day in child life, and about which childish curiosity is soon aroused. Moral instruction is conveyed without reference to mythological authority. For children from six to twelve years of age the book will be a great aid.

Letters from Friends.

ITHACA, N. Y., Aug. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It always givs me pleasure to hear from T. Winter, the straightforward Materialist, who always writes the plain matter of fact, as seen everywhere in nature, and no mystery; that life begins and ends here, in her order, by conception, expansion, birth, growth, maturity, decay, and dissolution. Thus generation has always succeeded generation, in this manner, and always will. The idea of any other manner of life, to succeed death, is erroneous, far-fetched by heredity, and is not fundamental. ZENAS KENT.

LEHIGH, IOWA, Aug. 22, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed five dollars—three dollars for my subscription to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, and the balance for books. I am a little behind time in sending in my renewal, as my subscription expired June 1st. But for all, THE TRUTH SEEKER never made a visit the less. Its handsome appearance, loaded down with interesting reading matter, was greeted and appreciated with much pleasure. And many thanks to you for letting me read on credit so long. Times are hard, and hav been this summer, but they will hav to be ten-fold worse when I cannot scrape up enough to pay for such a noble and necessary journal as our grand TRUTH SEEKER. Wishing much success and progress to you and your cause, and also tendering my condolence in your late bereavement, I remain Yours truly, ROBT. FLEMING.

OAK POINT, WASH. TER., Aug. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith forward you a few names to the petition for state secularization. They are but few, but will help swell the sum total. I believe Liberals are generally too negligent in circulating this petition. They seem to overlook the great necessity of securing equality for all the citizens. I hav no doubt if there was an organized effort conducted in a proper manner that more than one-half the voters of the country would sign this petition, and thus forever settle the question of church and state. The Liberal sentiment in this country is strong. It only lacks organization and consequent cooperation. As for myself, I cannot possibly devote more time with the petition, as I am only a poor fisherman, encumbered with the cares of a family. I hav contributed in proportion to my ability. Let others do likewise. D. F. HOWARD.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Aug. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $1.50—$1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and fifty cents for Mrs. Slenker's book, "The Darwins."

Allow me through the mediumship of THE TRUTH SEEKER to extend my hand to that stanch old Liberal, Thos. Winter, Materialist. I used to laugh at his idea that freedom of thought was impossible so long as the theory of God and a future state existed. I laugh no more. Thought has confirmed its truth. It is interesting to watch our Eastern reformers struggling against all human authority, yet yielding themselvs willing slaves to the spirits of the dead. Is a slave any the less a slave because his master is a "citizen of the air?" They seem to think a man has no business to govern his fellow-men until after he is dead. Away with all gods, ghosts, and their obsession or possession of men. As Ingersoll says, "Let them cover their eyeless sockets with their fleshless hands, and fade forever from the imagination of men." A. L. BALLOU.

MONTROSE, IOWA, Aug. 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find twenty-five cents, for which please send me the Freethinkers' Almanac for 1884. THE TRUTH SEEKER has not failed to put in appearance at this office since it became a weekly. They tarry but a short time with me, then go their way rejoicing, blessing the homes of many until worn out in the cause of humanity, liberty, justice, charity, and truth. Her track with other Liberal publications is as visible as that of a cyclone. We hav a very beautiful site in the southern part of this town which the Methodists hav secured and are fitting up for a camp-ground. They hav been holding a ten days' meeting on these grounds. On Sunday, the 11th of August, there were about 6,000 people present. At the winding up, when the fog of Methodism passed away, they found three or four ignorant souls standing around the altar waiting for a harp. A. CRANDALL.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Aug. 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 9th, page 498, the writer is "anxious and determined to be convinced" of immortality. He says "it is utterly inconceivable to me how a person can liv when he is dead." It appears by this acknowledgement the writer has yet to learn that the real person never dies. This has been the testimony of all ages, and this fact has never yet been confuted. If it ever can be, yet it never has been demonstrated that immortality is impossible.

Does our dear brother know that the possibilities of matter, of nature, of the universe, are not absolutely confined to Materialism? What wonderful knowledge he seems to possess, to be sure! Is Atheism then the end of investigation of mind and of reason? During the past century, how many seeming impossibilities hav proved to be true; and during the next century and eternity how many seeming impossibilities may occur, will our learned brother kindly inform us? Further "meditation" may produce different conclusions.

If the infinit universe has produced mind, intelligence, and reason here, may the same not be continued indefinitly hereafter? Is it less than presumption to limit the possibilities of the grand infinit universe? Is our brother so profound that he can say of matter, Thus far shalt thou go, but no farther; and here shall all of thy proud triumphs end? Our dear brother has said many fine things in that communication which may or may not be very true; but has he perceived all the possibilities of existence in the universe? Has he truly demonstrated the impossibility of immortality? If this is true, has he not destroyed all the highest hopes and aspirations of mankind, for cold, gloomy, dark, and lifeless Materialism, with its "death ends all."

We are very anxious to understand and know the pro and con of this, the most important subject that can engage and occupy the mind of man; therefore, should this great champion, this learned advocate, this wonderful prodigy and expounder of Atheism, be fallible, we hope mankind will condemn his opponent (man or woman) who first cries out "enuf!"

E. N. KINGSLEY.

AYER, MASS., Aug. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Every fair-minded person, every lover of truth, justice, and freedom still owes a debt of gratitude to our martyr-hero and statesman, Thomas Paine. And the noble efforts of J. E. Remsburg to exhume from the theological sands of hate, born of fear, this apostle of freedom and benefactor of mankind, can but draw upon the grateful appreciation of all the recipients of the benefits and blessings of one who "laid down his life for his friends."

A man must be wilfully blind, lacking the courage of an honest doubt and candid investigation, after reading such an array of well-authenticated, historic facts, to longer stigmatize him as an Infidel, except in the sense in which he was—Infidel to despotism, to bloodthirsty church intolerance. Paine's unselfish devotion to human welfare, to the breaking of every yoke of kingcraft and priestcraft, constitutes him both hero and living martyr. Read J. E. Remsburg's "Thomas Paine, the Apostle of Religious and Political Liberty," "Image Breaker," and "False Claims," and then fall back on religious dogmas if you can. One who believes that truth shall come uppermost, and justice shall be done, ELIJAH MYRICK.

PILOT, ILL., Aug. 22, 284.

MR. EDITOR: J. E. Remsburg delivered a lecture here Aug. 19th, entitled, "Bible Morals." The lecture was a polished effort, full of logic and unanswerable truth—the equal, if not superior, of anything we hav read or heard, and was so pronounced by one of our ablest thinkers. In the course of the lecture he showed that the Bible approved and taught twenty of the worst crimes known in the catalog of crimes. No wonder our Christians are so often guilty of the most heinous offenses when they find them justified by their sacred book. No wonder the ministers are so fond of crime when they learn it from that inspired volume. No wonder you witness so many of our Christians a dangling from a beam with a hangman's rope about their neck, going home to their "Lordy," when they find in their sacred volume those crimes not only taught, but their perpetrators lionized and held up to our gaze by the clergy. For sound logic and unanswerable truths, giv us Remsburg every time. He depends more on these than on oratory or a display of eloquence, of which also he has no small share. Liberals, whether organized or not, should secure Remsburg if they wish to see orthodoxy squirm, as he will giv them something to squirm about. J. M. MCKINNEY.

CORTLAND, O., July 24, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: More of trade circulars from Livezey. I do not bother him, and I hope the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will not trouble the poor fellow, to take advantage of his weakness or deprive him of what little sense he has left. I sincerely wish him no harm. Livezey, adieu!

Hurrah for the Cassadaga Convention! I think our candidates for president and secretary of the Liberal League, as stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 19th, will be a good election—notwithstanding there are other just as good men in the field who would just as unflinchingly stand by their colors; but the sooner we get our standard-bearers the sooner we will realize the benefits of our work.

Inclosed please find $5 for Ingersoll's Complete Works, per TRUTH SEEKER advertisment.

The following I sketched from Warren's Address:

"Stand! the ground's our own, my braves.
Will ye giv it up to slaves?
Will ye look for greener graves?
Hope ye mercy still?
What's the mercy despots feel?
Hear it in the battle peal,
Read it on yon bristling steel—
Ask it ye who will!"

Very respectfully yours, J. D. WHEELER.

LAKE CITY, IOWA, Aug. 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: It has been a long time since I hav written anything for THE TRUTH SEEKER; in fact, I feel almost like one out of your fold; but now, with your kind permission, I will say a few words to our friends. And first of all, I wish to thank the many kind friends that hav sent me so many papers, pamphlets, and books, and only wish I were able to take, pay for, and read them all, which, unluckily, I am not. Next in order I wish again to tender to that good, noble friend of humanity, Elliott Preston, my thanks and well wishes in the cause in which he is engaged. His arguments are yet unanswered. Dr. Foote's arguments hav appeared to me extremely weak; in fact, they put me in mind of a little grand-child of mine—I never tell him of a wrong but he can tell me of some one doing a good deal worse, just as though two wrongs made one right. I think it is a very poor argument, and the doctor well knows better. He knows that of all the withering, blasting crimes that hav ever cursed the world, vivisection is the worst. But I am glad to learn from the doctor that even his class of criminals are reforming. It proves the old hymn true, "The vilest sinner may return." I can well say with the old Methodist class leader, Thank God. Now a few words to Brother Collier. I am glad he has advanced enough so he does not think slavery was a divine institution; but he still has room for improvement. I hope he will yet see that the black people ought to own, by rights, every foot of the slave states. They made it all it is, and it should hav been confiscated for their use. There would be as much justice in paying a man for a horse he bought, knowing him stolen, as paying the South for their negroes. No, Mr. Collier, you hav great reason to thank your stars that it is as well with you as it is. And as for the better class of whites in the South having nothing to do with the negro, all I hav to say is, times hav changed very much indeed. From fifty to twenty years years ago, I could find you plenty of slaves resembling their master enough for him to hav been the husband of their mother. And such things were happening among the upper ten, even among your statesmen. How is it they hav grown so odious all at once? I hav always thought a white man as good as a negro as long as he behaved himself as well; and when he did not, the black man was the best fellow. Remember the negroes, enslaved, abused, and degraded for hundreds of years, had but a poor chance to become noble men and women. Now do as much to educate and elevate the black race, to make them noble men and women, as you hav to pull them down and degrade them, and they will do for the whites to associate with.

With best regards to all THE TRUTH SEEKER family and its friends, I am truly yours, J. L. TOMPKINS.

GARFIELD, COL., Aug. 22, 284.

MR. EDITOR: It is possible that I hav to present to you another petition for state secularization with thirty signers, which will make me in all one hundred and eleven. In this petition I hav been aided by Messrs. Chapel and Movat. These two gentlemen I can assure you are not tongue-tied in regard to our cause. I hav inquired as to their character and I am told it is good. It does me good to see good men help to fight the battle.

Mr. Editor, it is astonishing to me to see you spread yourself as editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and still a-spreading. It is sometimes said, What is in a name? I believe there is a great deal in it. A short time ago, a gentleman told me that he once went into a news depot to look for something to read, and the newsdealer handed him THE TRUTH SEEKER and said, "There is something you should read." He then looked at it and saw the name TRUTH SEEKER; he threw it down and remarked, "I hav no use for a religious paper," and the newsdealer replied by saying, "You mistook the paper by its name." He then took a second look at it and saw that it was his kind of a paper and he became a subscriber to it. I would now make the remark that if all subscribers that are in arrears for THE TRUTH SEEKER would pay up and put a shoulder to a wheel, the proprietors could change the name to The Scientific Examiner and Evoluted Truth Seeker, with illustrations of books and some of our noblest and best men, such as D. M. Bennett.

HENRY BEICHLING.

BURTON, TEXAS, Aug. 16, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I agree in part with Dr. Chapman in what he says concerning illiberal Liberals; too many of those professing to be good Liberals are imitating too closely the Christian principle of selfishness. But there are very many, too, that are not deserving the strictures he passes upon all Liberals. There are objects of charity in every part of our land, and I notice the fact that Liberals are nearly always the first and last to respond to aiding the needy, and Christians claim the credit by howling around what "we" hav done. They are very willing to be classed with these unholy heathens in this, as well as receiving their money to help support their giant humbug that is the sole cause of the poverty and want that exists at present in these United States. The many millions that lie untaxed in church property are small compared to the amounts paid priests and preachers to make more dupes to sink the country still deeper in degradation. It is entirely unfair that we, whose vision is not so befuddled with superstition as to be blind to those facts, should be compelled to help support such an obnoxious, useless system as this superstition of the imagination and species-of-insanity business is. There are many millions placed on the church books, valuable property, in St. Louis and other large cities for the purpose of evading taxation, and not many years will elapse before the Catholic church will be financially able to wield the power in this country she desires.

Many of our brethren seem to underestimate the real importance of the work that is before them. Let us pray that they may become more earnest, more devout, and open their hearts to the cause, and to those old veterans like Brother Hacker, and their purses also. I hav a large family depending on me for support, yet if I was worth the tenth of what I know many Liberals are, Brother Hacker wouldn't hav to wait long for the small sum asked. Hoping man will grant our prayers, I am, as ever, Yours, H. B. JONES.

EAU GALLE, WIS., July 17, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Your weekly edition of THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches me in due season. I am much pleased with its contents and the variety thereof.

I hav written my intended funeral discourse, and two capable persons, one a lawyer, hav volunteered their services to deliver it.

When I giv the date of my birth, March 12, 1797, you may be somewhat surprised that an old farmer should still be able to write a somewhat legible hand.

My belief is that nature and its operations include all the whole organized and unorganized matter existing in limitless space. The word boundless is a word our most far-seeing astronomers cannot grasp. Nature produces the most formidable organisms, and also the most minute, which require the aid of high magnifying power to be seen. We are ever in the midst of life—it is even asserted the air inhaled is replete with life. The wonders wrought by matter in motion are incomprehensible, accomplishing prodigies without the help of a God man-made in the image of himself, fancying he controls the winds and waves and rides among the clouds, when nothing of the kind occurs.

Deluded mortals believe when dead they will defy the strength of gravitation, leave this earth, and ascend in chariots of fire—not knowing where, but hoping to be lucky in finding the new Jerusalem, with its paved streets of gold, the luster thereof profusely lighting the city—no night there; each having a harp previously constructed of fine gold on which to play the everlasting tune, for mere diversion, with angel fingers. Exhilarating anticipation! It takes no account of the partiality of predestinating the elect or favorit few to felicity, the great majority to despair. A portion of rational humanity said to hav existed in apostolic days denied the doctrin of the resurrection, angel, spirit, etc. I like to be known by the appellation of those hailed as Sadducean Atheists, in which I delight.

MILTON JOHNSON.

CARTHAGE, Mo., Aug. 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3.00 as dues to the good old TRUTH SEEKER, to January 1, 1885. I hope that thousands more will answer your appeal for money. It requires no more to pay at the first end of the year than at the last. A subscriber ought to love to read a paper that is paid for better than one he owes for.

This town of Carthage has about 8,000 population, and is a magnificent place for beauty and wealth. We hav an unusually large number of Liberal people, but at present we are unorganized. We once had a League here, but the Spiritualists figured so largely in it, and became so unpopular by going crazy, committing suicide, etc., etc., that it broke up the entire League by its influence. I shall not speak unfairly of Spiritualists, but it is a positiv, stuborn fact that where I hav known them they are a wonderful people to run into extremes, and sooner or later, like all orthodox, are inclined to become exceedingly cranky, or go entirely crazy over their so-called spirit phenomena. This fact alone ought to teach rational people to shun alike the spiritual seance and the Christian revival. The one is brother to the other, though it may be entirely disowned. Some of them talk very prettily at times, but finally all fail utterly to know anything about their twaddle clothed in mystery's laws. Who can "sense it" rationally? Who should try to sense a thing so much calculated to rob one of his sense? Answer who will, but first visit some of our thronged lunatic asylums, and view the horrible results of thirty years of Spiritualism in America.

We should by all means hav Geo. Chainey here in Missouri, but I fear that no effort will be made to get him. Should he come this way I am confident he would do well, and be well treated. In 1877 W. F. Jamieson vanquished a few of our Christian heroes, and made nearly all of the solid Freethinkers that we hav here to-day.

J. T. KENNEDY.

SEATTLE, WASH. TER., Aug. 18, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to explain that the letter written by myself and published in THE TRUTH SEEKER August 9th, is not written from Wyoming, but from Washington Territory. I hav already had several letters and papers sent me on account of the letter, and all directed to Wyoming. The above letters and papers hav come directly to me, because, without doubt, ours is the only city in the world by the name of Seattle (pronounced Se-at-tle). About thirty years ago, a little party of pioneers settled on the shores of the magnificent inland sea, Puget Sound, and laid the foundation of a future city. Before the little village had many inhabitants, the Indians, who were here in great numbers, determined to drive the white men away from their hunting-grounds, or destroy them. And had it not been for the timely aid of an old chief and his braves, and the warning brought by the chief's daughter, there is no doubt they would hav accomplished their terrible purpose. And, to do the old chief honor, the inhabitants of the little town named it Seattle, the name of the chief. Old Seattle is dead, but his daughter, now old Angeline, still survives, and is provided for by the families of the old pioneers of the place—which place is now a city of twelve thousand inhabitants, not the official, but the real terminus of the Northern Pacific Railroad, trains of cars arriving here every day freighted with goods direct from St. Paul.

I hav written more than I ought, perhaps, but I am anxious that the people of the United States shall know that Washington Territory has given her women the right of franchise, and that already good results hav followed. I could make a long letter about how better men are elected to office; how orderly and quietly elections are carried on; how, in great part, only sober men attend the caucuses; what change for the better is manifested in the courts where women sit as jurors, etc., but will not ask for more of your valuable space, but sign myself, Yours for Freethought and equality before the law,

LAURA E. HALL.

LOUDONVILLE, N. Y., Aug, 13, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: The most enjoyable reading in THE TRUTH SEEKER is the "Letters from Friends." There all the readers "meet and mingle," exchanging ideas, and chatting sociably; and now I want to step in for a few words.

The most important subject now in hand seems to be the League and matters pertaining to it. Now, I sincerely second Ella E. Gibson's motion to elect H. L. Green president of the League. Who has done better or more real service for the cause than he has? He is my nominee; and next is Lucy Colman. No one ever speaks of a woman for the presidency, and yet we hav some in our ranks who are quite competent to hold the position.

I see there is a proposal to change the name of the League, which I heartily indorse. Never was there a more inappropriate name; it smacks too much of "I am holier than thou." Some of the so-called Liberals are illiberal, bigoted, and narrow, and the name is not at all suitable. Why not "Freethinkers' League," or "National Freethought Association?" There is, after all, no name so broad and comprehensiv as "Freethinker." It takes in all the Infidels, Liberals, Spiritualists, Atheists, Materialists, etc.

Mr. Watson Heston, of Carthage, Mo., should not hav said it was his "misfortune" to hav spent last summer in St. Johns, Ohio. Possibly it was unpleasant for him, but if he succeeded in causing even one person to see the truth of his reasoning, the hollowness and errors of that book of antiquated Jewish lies, then he should say "fortune."

So Mr. Fred. Cooke feels sorry for Elliott Preston and Mrs. Mitchell. That is like some of the Christians who are sorry for the poor Infidels, while the Infidels are smiling at their ignorance and vanity. If Mr. Cooke does not believe the doctors use unnecessary cruelty, let him send to Mr. Preston, 6 Park Square, Boston, Mass., to send him a copy of "Light in Dark Places," by Frances Power Cobbe; also, "The Torture Chamber of Science," by Baron Ernest von Weber; and "The Uselessness of Vivisection," by Lawson Taib, F.R.C.S.

And, by the way, Mr. Cooke, why not recommend more cold water in the saloons when you are recommending "cold language" to the Prohibitionists? Now, suppose you follow some of those poor men who, in winter, get their "warmth, light, and reading for nothing" in the saloons—follow them home and see for yourself the harm the saloon works. First the lonely wife who has toiled all day and does so at night with little light or warmth, the children who need their father's love and presence to assist the mother to educate and raise them. Ten or fifteen cents, and perhaps twenty-five, he has spent for drinks (inflammatory at that), tobacco, etc., which would hav bought a bit of flannel for the baby, or even a larger child, that would save its little life, or little body from cold and suffering. It would buy a good lamp, and oil to put in it, for the wife to work by, or—well, a dozen things much needed could be named. Very few men can spend an evening in a saloon and not be tempted to "take something."

I thank Mr. Beeson heartily for his words for the poor Indians, whose treatment at the hands of this nation is a national shame and disgrace. With what pride, and justly, the English compare the Canadian Indians and their management to those of the United States!

WINEFORD V. ASPINWALL.

GIV HIM A HARP!

NEW YORK, Aug. 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: With your permission I would like to say a few words about the much abused and persecuted Salvation Army. Your columns hav always found ready space to quote what are reported as misdeeds of some who, passing as members of the said Army, are really vile Infidels, pretending to be converted so that they might use the cloak of religion to accomplish their wicked aims.

I, for one, consider the Salvation Army the best and most consistent set of Christians in this or any other country. They certainly hav accomplished more good during the last five years than your cold Infidelity ever has or ever will. Look at the enormous number of drunkards, thieves, blasphemers, and other sinners of all kinds that they hav reformed and snatched from a terrible doom—an everlasting hell. And they hav not only prepared them for a future life of bliss, but hav made honorable and respectable citizens of them, and fit members of society in this life. I know of dozens right here in this vicinity who hav been reformed through the instrumentality of the Salvation Army. It certainly does me good to attend their meetings in this city, and hear young men, who only a short time before spent all their time and money in the grog-shop, get up and giv their experience, depicting the horrors of their former life of debauchery and crime in the hope that it may be a warning to others, and be the means of leading them in the right path.

I frequently visit the small city of Freehold, N. J., where there is a branch of the Army, led by two estimable young ladies, and the work they accomplish is something wonderful. I am personally acquainted with some of the young men who hav joined the Army there, and the change that has come over them is something that both themselvs and their friends may well be proud of. One young man, who was formerly a very hard character, and who could be seen almost any time in a drunken condition, is now a member of the Army, and is respected and admired by those who heretofore thought him fit company only for convicts. Instead of passing his time, as formerly, in saloons and in the company of drinkers, he now passes it in the meetings of the Salvation Army, entreating others, in his humble way, to come down to the foot of the cross and be saved, and become good citizens of this world, and fit subjects for the world to come. People who knew him a year ago would hardly know him now, for then he had a hard, dissipated appearance, whereas to-day he has the look of a refined, intelligent person. And he is only one of the many who hav been saved through the efforts of the Salvation Army at Freehold. There are dozens whose names and addresses I can furnish any time, who I am sure would willingly respond to any inquiries and inform you of the peace and comfort they hav received through the means of the Army. And they are not done in Freehold yet, but, as the captain of that outpost says, they "will never rest until they save every soul in the place." And there are hundreds of towns in the United States and Canada where the same state of affairs exists.

Can your useless Infidelity boast of ever having reformed a drunkard, a thief, or a criminal of any kind? If such has been done, it is yet to be recorded.

I hav often heard it stated by Infidels that the members of the Salvation Army are a weak-minded set. It is a startling piece of information to learn that when a man concludes to giv up getting drunk, and resolves to properly provide for himself and family, instead of helping the saloon-keeper to lead a life of luxury and ease; become a good citizen, and serve God, he at once becomes "weak-minded." If that is so, then the sooner the American people become "weak-minded," through the efforts of the Salvation Army, the better it will be for them.

At almost any time in any of our cities drunken men may be seen staggering along our streets yelling and cursing, entirely unmolested by the police authorities. A rum-soaked politician may get up on a platform erected on our public streets, protected by as many policemen as he desires, at the city's expense, and shout and yell politics for hours to, as is generally the case, the hardest and roughest set of men that could be gathered together, calling one candidate a liar, another a thief, and so on. But as soon as the Salvation Army appears in the street and commences to sing hymns calculated to do good, and implore poor deluded drunkards to forsake their evil ways, they are, in a great many places, dragged off to jail on the charge of being a "public nuisance." But the time is not far distant when the real worth of these good people will be appreciated. The Salvation Army will continue "marching on to war" when Infidelity and aristocratic Christianity are numbered with the things of the past. Infidels may call them "cranks," persecute them, shut them up in prison as "public nuisances," but God is on their side, and they are bound to prosper. And at that last great day there will be countless numbers who will then wish they had become "weak-minded" when they hear the final sentence, "Depart from me, ye cursed!"

I write the above to giv your readers a true statement of the facts, and in the hope that it may be the means of reforming some poor miserable wretch whom you Infidels make no effort to reach.

J. H. P.

TO MRS. J. H. SEVERANCE.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Aug. 24, 1884.

DEAR FRIEND: In reply to thine in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July the 26th, I do not ask if thee is "sincere" in what thee says, for I take that for granted, even while I feel the least tiny bit hurt that any one who has ever read what I write could doubt that I mean it all.

You may doubt my knowledge, my powers of reasoning, my ability to tell in the best way what I believe; but my sincerity ought to be beyond question. Still, as there is so much sham in the world; so much that is said and done simply for effect, regardless of real truth so long as certain ends and aims are accomplished, I do not wonder that thee feels doubtful of my sincerity when thee sees all that is from the standpoint of thy belief in spirit existence.

Please bear patiently with me, then, if I speak plain words, and remember I mean no shadow of disrespect to thee or any one who sees not as I see in regard to a continued existence.

Now while I do not deny that the sick are healed, the lame made to walk, and other seeming miracles accomplished, yet I deny these things are done by spirits, just as I deny that a God made the world in six days, or that all the water in the land of Egypt was ever changed to blood, or that little images of the Virgin (?) Mary ever spoke or healed the sick, or did the other wonders our Catholic friends tell us of.

While I rejoice over every pain that is relieved, and every care that is removed, and every good work that is done, I do not thank any God, angel, or spirit for the blessings, for I believe the work is purely of human origin; that it is the result of some power, force, or quality in humanity, that is becoming more and more known, developed, and reliable. I myself used often to cure my son's headaches by laying my hand on his forehead and making passes over it. And I hav relieved some women by rubbing their bodies with my hands.

But as well say that spirits pump the blood through our veins and arteries, as to say they thus heal with our hands.

If there are spirits, why do they not do more? Why do they not tell what became of Charlie Ross? Why do they not tell the whole true tale of Jennie Cramer? Why did they let the Greely party suffer all those long weary months, and leave them to die one after another when they could hav notified some of their friends of the failure of the relief ships to reach them? Why—but there are ten millions of whys that might, right here, be asked.

Just as many as we might ask pious believers in the omnipresent power of an omnipotent deity, who sees, sanctions (?), smiles upon all these same woes, miseries, and sufferings.

No, no, my friend, there are no gods who could see the drowning child, the uplifted dagger, the starving widow, and the cholera-stricken victim, and yet not lift a finger to rescue and save.

Neither are there millions of spirits flitting hither and thither, seeing all the woes of humanity, and yet only here and there lifting a finger to help one or two, out of a hundred millions.

"Facts are stubborn things." We can't account for many, many things. We cannot tell the why—we only know they are. But we should not be too ready to jump to conclusions—to say "God did it"—"the devil did it"—"spirits did it," or "fairies did it."

What court in all the land would take any of these spiritual facts (?) as evidence? If spirits can cure, they can kill. Yet who would dream of calling a murderer guiltless who should plead that a spirit did the deed through his mediumship?

I would like to believe in continued life. I love to liv. The world is very fair and full of friends, and it is sad to feel that we must soon sleep and wake no more. But it is also sad to think so many misuse and abuse their lives; make war on their kind; monopolize one another's inheritance to fresh air, good food, and all the comforts of life.

It is sad to see murder, theft, and depravity ride rampant over the land. But we cannot deny that they are facts.

Nature is a stern and relentless mother. Her laws are inflexible, and all we can do is to make the best of our opportunities.

I hope to see something of these wonderful spirit manifestations in September.

I am willing to be convinced. I want truth. I desire knowledge. But I cannot accept what to me seems unreasonable.

Friends, if any of you hav any special medium in New York, whom you think more honest and more reliable than others, you will confer a favor on me by writing to me.

All advice will be gratefully received—practical advice kindly meant and truly given. My means are so small, and I want to make them go as far as I can, so I may see all I can. It may be my last work, for, like dear old Bennett, I am growing old, and my hold on life is weak—for three days I've been unable to even write a line—a malarial congestiv chill laid me up. My lot and Bennett's were similar in many ways. We both had one birthday, one aim, and one work. His was all concentrated on one paper; mine, scattered broadcast. He was a man and a financier; I, a woman, caring more for minds than money, but we were friends true and tried, and friends of humanity. We never met. He is gone, and yet a little while and they who now know me will know me no more forever. But while I liv I will work, ever remembering Bennett as my model guide and friend. He too studied this ism of spiritual belief, and was nearly if not quite convinced that the dead liv on—at least for a little while.

I may find my quest ending in the same way. If so, I'll gladly accept the outcome.

Or whether life shall gently flow
Through flowery meads, or gloomy fields
Whose harvest only sorrow yields?
Nine little girls.

Like visitors from Aldenn land,
Angelic vision sweet;
Their loving words, their tender smiles
Make happiness complete.
In purity and innocence,
Guileless and true—without pretense;
Shielded well and tenderly,
By purest love and sympathy,
Nine little girls.

As opening flowers in morning light,
So shall their minds unfold;
Enriched with love and knowledge true,
More than hath been foretold.
No superstitions, gray and stark,
Shall change their joy to midnight dark;
But truth shall make them brave and free
As sunbeams sparkling on the sea—
Nine little girls.

May all their days go brightly on,
Each hour some new truth learned;
And thus shall blessings, rich and deep,
By them be rightly earned.
And, by-and-by, these girls shall be
Nine splendid women, fair to see;
Thus, loving hands shall train them well,
That peace may ever with them dwell,
Nine little girls.

My Cat Boundy.

I once had a cat called Boundy, that lived to the age of twenty years.

Few cats liv to this age, and not many deserve to, perhaps, but Boundy was an exception to all cats in many ways besides his age.

When living some ten miles from Virginia City, Nevada, in 1860, one morning this cat came into the kitchen, and being very tame and of singular beauty I claimed it as my pet.

Several times he was stolen from me, but from his peculiar markings and color, and the assistance of the daily milkman, he was soon found and brought back again.

A miner living near by once took Boundy to his cabin, as the mice and rats troubled him badly, and he said the next morning the cabin floor was literally covered with dead rats and mice, some of them of the kangaroo species. He seldom ate this kind of game, and when he caught birds he would bring them in and lay them down for me to pick the feathers off before eating them.

Boundy possessed more than the ordinary degree of affection and intelligence belonging to the feline race, and would show great sympathy if I were sick or in distress.

Once, in order to show these traits to others, I feigned weeping, when he got upon my lap, tried to rub my hands from my face, mewing in a sad tone. On removing my hands and laughing, he hissed at the evident discovery of my deception. What was this, if not a moral sense of wrong?

One day I let my canary birds out of the cage to fly around in the room. An hour or two after I happened to recollect that the cat was in the same room. Rushing in, expecting to find only the feathers of my birds, I saw they were unharmed, one of them perched upon the back of the chair where Boundy lay quietly watching it pluming its feathers. And often he protected the birds from being killed by strange cats by driving them away.

His greatest prowess was in being the central figure of every dog-fight in the yard. From the first yell of the set-to, he would be seen in full feather, his tail like a large ostrich plume, curled aloft, as he would jump on the back of the topmost dog, with firm grip of teeth and claws, and the victory would turn in favor of the under dog in less than a minute.

Strange, he never got hurt in these desperate encounters, and I often tried to prevent his joining in the fight, but was not quick enough. But in later years he left off these fierce contests, and only used his teeth and claws on mice or tender steaks.

I indulged Boundy in lying on the bed, but when I would be absent the house-maid objected to this, and he found out that there were other uses for brooms and dusters than sweeping floors or cleaning furniture.

One day, on my returning home from several weeks' absence, the maid being present, Boundy came into the room, jumped into the middle of the bed, laid down, shut one eye, and looked out of the other at the house-maid, as much as to say, "Touch me if you dare!" At her wordy protest he only yawned, turned from side to side, scratched the coverlid with an air of defiance, curled up for a quiet nap, as if he knew it would not now be disturbed.

Finally, after seventeen years, allowing two or three before I came into possession of him, old age began to show upon him, and a tumor grew on one side of his neck, that soon killed him. He left the house and went out by a rivulet, and lay down there to die, refusing to stay in the house when carried in. I was advised to giv him chloroform, but could not yield my consent, as he tenderly licked the hand that held the fatal drug.

I went out one morning and found Boundy dead, and we buried him under an apple-tree in the garden, with several of my canary birds—pets I hope to meet again in another life.

This little sketch is every word true, and much more that I could write of Boundy. I hope it may hav a tendency to make some children kinder to cats than many often are.

Few can know who are blessed with children's pattering feet how some life less human may be made to take a place in a heart otherwise left still more vacant.

LUNA HUTCHINSON.

True Politeness.

It seems to be expected by some that boys and girls of a certain age must be rough, brusque, hoydenish, and awkward in their manners. And we often hear the excuse made by their elders, "Oh, boys will be boys, girls will be girls," as though the circumstance was sufficient apology for rude, coarse, boorish actions, or rough and clumsy speech. Now, it is just as well for boys and girls to be easy and polite in their bearing, and better, than it is to be the opposit. One who respects himself will respect others. He who is gentle and considerate toward animals will be the same toward humankind. The boy who worries a cat, or torments a dog, is a source of trouble and annoyance to his playmates and family. The girl who does not treat her doll well, who pinches and kicks it, is the girl who snaps and snarls at her father and mother, and says, "I won't," "I will," and talks back when advised as to her conduct.

But how to be polite—how is it? There is no great art in it. A child reared in poverty and toil may possess the spirit of politeness, while the son of a millionaire may be, and sometimes is, entirely devoid of it. This reminds me of a case in point. A poor colored man was walking along the street, and in passing the residence of a senator, a son of that dignitary screamed out, "Nigger, nigger! you're a nigger!" Passing on without noticing the insult, he met a little girl, a washerwoman's daughter, who said kindly, "Good morning, Mr.———." It is plain to be seen which child was the polite and courteous one.

I hav been in families where children would break in rudely upon the conversation with their remarks, and at table were clamorous to be helped first, and to the best; who scattered crumbs all around their plates and upon the carpet; whose greasy finger-prints were left upon the table-cloth; and who slid under the table when they left it, like some four-footed animals, instead of decent, well-behaved children.

To be tidy, considerate, careful of the feelings of others, to modulate the voice to a low and gentle tone; to be modest and respectful to all, high or low, rich or poor—these are the principal essentials of polite behavior. The boy who left his play to assist an aged woman over the muddy crossing was truly polite, and carried the elements of the perfect gentleman. Thus there are no arbitrary rules of polite conduct; no stringent codes of etiquet to be learned by heart, but simply the obeying of the dictates of kindness and self-denial. As one has expressed it,

"Politeness is to do and say
The kindest things in the kindest way."

"Only a Dog."

My dear young friends, one reason that cruel (and, at the same time, religious) people giv to excuse their brutal treatment of animals is that, according to their miserable creed called Christianity, they (the lower animals, as we contemptuously style them) hav no souls, and therefore are of no importance whatever to a good Christian, who expects to liv forever in a delightful country, with nothing to do all day long but to sing praises to the "Lamb" (Jesus Christ), and play upon a golden harp, occasionally peering complacently over the brink of heaven at the ninety-nine out of every hundred who are writhing in hell, and seeing there, without a tear, the agonized upturned faces of father, mother, sister, brother, wife, and friend.

Is it to be wondered at that such a wicked religion should make people selfish and cruel? None of you, at least, my little readers, will grow up to believe such base and degrading falsehoods, for the good TRUTH SEEKER is clearing away all such mists from before your eyes, and no Christian minister or priest will ever be able to count you among his dupes.

But I did not take up my pen to write an article for THE TRUTH SEEKER to-day, but to beg Miss Wixon's permission to print for you in the Children's Corner the following beautiful poem, which I would feel very proud to call my own. It was written by Pearl Rivers, and I found it in the New Orleans Picayune. After you hav read it, you will agree with me that any God who would let a Christian into his heaven, and forbid that little dog, "Mat," to enter it, ought to hav a first-class hell made especially for himself, where he would be punished as he so justly deserved.

I can only add that if these inhuman monsters, the vivisectors, who torture defenseless animals under the false plea of benefiting humanity, could be sent to keep his Godship (or devilship) company, it would be a universal blessing, and "a consummation devoutly to be wished."

ONLY A DOG.

"Only a dog." You wonder why
I grieve so much to see him die.
Ah, if you knew
How true a friend a dog can be,
And what a friend he was to me,
When friends were few!

"Only a dog—a beast," you sneer,
"Not worthy of a sigh or tear."
Speak not to me
Such falsehood of my poor dumb friend,
While I hav language to defend
His memory.

Through ups and downs, through thick and thin,
My boon companion he has been
For years and years.
He journeyed with me many miles;
I gave him frowns, he gave me smiles;
And now, sad tears.

Before my children came, his white
Soft head was pillowed every night
Upon my breast.
So let him lie just one time more
Upon my bosom as before,
And take his rest.

And when a tenderer love awoke,
The first sweet word my baby spoke
Was "M-a-t." Poor Mat,
Could I no other reason tell,
My mother heart would love you well
For only that.

Together boy and dog hav laid
Upon my lap; together played
Around my feet,
Till laugh and bark together grew
So much alike, I scarcely knew
Which was most sweet.

Ah, go away and let me cry,
For now you know the reason why
I loved him so.
Leave me alone to close his eyes,
That looked so wistful and so wise,
Trying to know.

At garden gate, or open door
You'll run to welcome me no more,
Dear little friend.
You were so good, so kind, so true,
I question, looking down at you,
Is this the end?

Is there for you no "other side?"
No home beyond death's chilly tide
And heavy fog,
Where meekness and fidelity
Will meet reward, although you be
Only a dog?

"He had no soul?" How know you that?
What hav we now, that had not Mat,
Save idle speech?
If from the Bible you can read
Him soulless, then I own no creed
The preachers preach.

My dog had love, and faith, and joy,
As much as had my baby boy—
Intelligence;
Could smell, see, hear, and suffer pain.
What makes a soul, if these are vain?
When I go hence,

'Tis my belief my dog will be
Among the first to welcome me.
Believing that,
I keep my collar and his bell,
And do not say to him farewell,
But, good-bye, Mat,
Dear, faithful Mat.

EASY RIDDLE—FOR YOUTHS.

How many letters, can you tell?
Does it take my name to spell?
'Twixt my first and last, is one—
So 'tis ended, so begun.
For love of me some people sin;
For lack of me sad woes begin.
All try for me,
Some die for me,
Some fight for me,
Some write for me;
Some gamble for me,
Some ramble for me,
Some tarry for me,
Some marry for me;
But, when 'tis done,
And I am won,
I'm either locked within a cell,
Or sent with some one else to dwell.

AN INFERNAL PUZZLE.

This puzzle will tell
Of the author of "hell,"
The author of "heaven" as well.
Reversed, his name
Will then proclaim
A mount of flame
On Sicily's shore—
And five hundred more—
Near which did this author dwell;
While near at hand
In all his land,
Volcanoes grand
Still breed, and feed
With cruel creed,
Her children from their natal morn;
Yea, it is even in their blood.
As from the Nile
The crocodile
Is meetly born,
Or frogs infest its mud.

Correspondence.

LIBERAL, Mo., Aug. 18, 1884.

MISS WIXON, Esteemed Friend: There are times in our lives when words fail to comfort us. I know it from past experience, for I too hav parted with loved ones.

If I could only impart to you the hope I hav of the bright beyond—and I can say knowledge, too, for I know whereof I speak—yet it would not satisfy your mind. But do not think of "Little Susie" as dead,

"But just gone before;
She is living, loving just the same
On the evergreen shore."

My dear, suppose you should go a long journey, and when you returned (with good news, too,) you found doors fastened, and your friends going about crying, and you could not make them understand that you were present, how would you feel? Thus it is. Place yourself where your little niece can come to you, and you will be more than repaid. Yes, let the good angel come in. It seems to me everything about us speaks of immortality. It is that blessed hope that buoys me up in this life.

You hav my deepest sympathy. I read your paper to the Instruction School and read it to my class of nine little girls.

If you could hav seen the tears trickling down their cheeks, you would hav felt that there was comfort in a sympathizing tear.

When I read the poem in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I felt that it came from your aching heart; but your dear niece loves you just the same.

Oh, such beautiful messages I hav had from the spirit world! One dear lady that I idolized in early life, I heard from after waiting fifteen years, but the message was of such a character it removed the last doubt. And now I can see my way clear. Dear sister, go on with the good work you hav espoused—the children's cause. The harvest is great, but the laborers few. Their bright eyes and sweet caresses make heaven for me. Our children hav advantages over many little Freethought children in the land. It is such pleasure to see them rise in our Instruction classes and public meetings, and giv their recitations like little men and women, and not be ostracized for it.

Yours for truth, L. H. G.

THE VIVISECTOR'S DEATH-BED.*

"Similar were the reflections of that distinguished vivisector, the late John Reid, when stretched upon his couch, and writhing in the agonies of dissolution, superadded by the torments of the mind. As death came nearer and nearer during the silent hours of the night, the screams of agony inflicted by him on helpless animals were repeated, and amid the terrors of a remorse which all the honors in the world could not alleviate in the least, he exclaimed: 'I thought it no harm at that time, but I see it different now'" (Henry Bergh's lecture on Vivisection, delivered before the New York legislature at Albany, Feb. 19, 1880).

Upon the couch of death he lies
  Who soon must breathe his last,
While, through his wildly-throbbing brain,
  Dread, awesome shapes flit fast.

And, ever and anon, he starts
  As some wronged wraith of worth
Were there to blast with baleful curse
  His latest hour of earth.

And, ever and anon, he waves
  Some viewless thing away,
That glides in pale, reproachful guise
  Betwixt him and the day.

Fast! fast they come! grim, gory shapes!
  They swarm about his bed,
Beseamed by many a ghastly wound
  Through which their dumb souls fled.

Nearer, and nearer yet they press!
  They peer into his face
With eyes his own roll mad to meet,
  Like molten suns in space.

And many a deed of horror foul,
  Committed years agone,
In bloody cerements bursts its shroud,
  Like soul 'pon judgment morn.

But hark! from out the ambient air
  Break moans of direful pain—
Shrill, awful cries that rend like steel
  His conscience-stricken brain.

Was this a dog this mangled thing
  Stretched stark, along the floor,
It lank jaws bathed with bloody foam,
  And bare its true heart's core?

Poor, piteous beast! thine end was swift,
  But here another lies,
From which yon wolfish miscreant's hand
  Once plucked the kind, brown eyes.

And now a fiercer tremor shakes
  The vivisector's frame!
Mayhap he views (oh, meet reward!)
  Hell's never-dying flame.

Oh, horrible! yon eyeless hound
  Crawls to the monster's side,
And rears to lick that awful hand
  By which it, guiltless, died.

But when the vivisector's gaze
  Fell 'pon that poor, blind face,
With one mad shriek his guilty soul
  Forsook her dwelling-place!

*Vivisection is the dissecting of animals alive, and generally entirely without the use of anesthetics, especially in the more acutely painful operations (including, necessarily, all the vast multitude of horrible ones yearly performed upon the nervous system, in which the evidences of agony, particularly the reflex action of the nerves, form the only guides to the operator). The use of anesthetics would render impossible all the above class of experiments, remember. Vivisection is a practice now widely prevalent both in Europe and America, and is the legitimate outcome of a false science, barren of all useful results, coupled with the innate thirst for blood and cruelty in man, and the most monstrous abuse of the power possessed by the strong to oppress the weak, recorded in the annals of time. Look into it, friends. I sound no sensational, false note of alarm when I say deliberately that the horrors of vivisection as practiced to-day here and elsewhere, absolutely dwarf into insignificance all other crimes in this cruel world. Unite with me, all you men and women of noble soul, and enact laws which shall make it impossible, in free America at least, that these demons of cruelty, the vivisectors, shall create a hell on earth for our faithful, defenseless friends, the brutes, whom we are bound to protect by every law of justice and humanity. Write to me, you who wish, and I will mail you printed information which will fill your hearts with sentiments of righteous indignation. ELLIOTT PRESTON.

From Mr. Putnam.

"I thank you for your poem ['The Vivisector's Death-Bed'], and return. It is a powerful production, and moves the feeling deeply. You hav my best wishes for your success in your effort, for I am a thorough-going democrat, and admit the worm has as good a right to vote as I, and his happiness is as sacred as mine. With regards,
"Yours, SAMUEL P. PUTNAM."

From Miss Gibson.

"I did not write you how I felt when I got your poetry and illustration ['The Vivisector's Death-Bed']. I could not read it nor look at the illustration for several hours! Every time I attempted it I would feel so sick that I would hav to throw it down, and the shivers would run over me with a shudder I cannot describe. I can personate almost anything, and the sensation was more than frightful—perfectly appalling! Your friend, ELLA E. GIBSON."

D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, anthor of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances nnder which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. Mr. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

TESTIMONIALS:

Read the following testimonials, and be convinced that our claims are correct in every particular, and that your ailments can be eradicated without the aid of MEDICIN. THESE APPLIANCES ARE THE ACME OF PERFECTION:

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

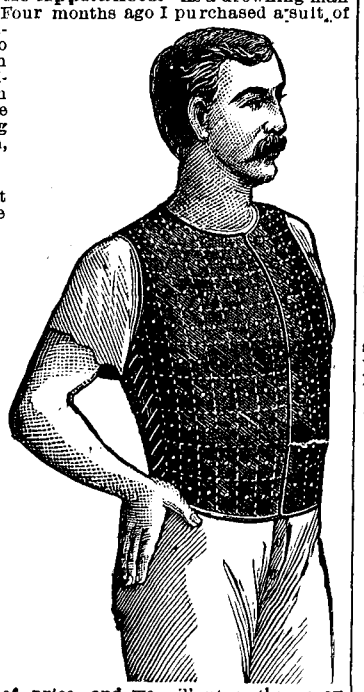
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Remember that these appliances are not worn next the skin, but over the under-garment, and, unlike all other appliances in the market, they impart no shocks and leaves no sores.

Gems of Thought.

To overcome the selfish propensity, to not be always eager to secure his own pleasure and profit, to not be willing to injure the interests of others that his own may be promoted, is the grandest work to which man can devote himself. Our tastes, our incentivs, our desires and objects are all susceptible of modification and improvement. We can make of ourselvs almost anything we please. Self-control and a constant watch over ourselvs will accomplish it.—D. M. Bennett.

WE often hear of the return of the "prodigal son," of the finest veal being served up to him, and of his entire forgivness. How often, though, do we hear of the "prodigal daughter?" Seldom, very seldom, is the poor misguided girl allowed to return home. Why this discrimination? "To err is human, to forgiv divine," but parents seem never to think of this when the daughter—more sinning—returns to the parental roof and prays for forgivness. Is she not as deserving of forgivness as the son who has run his course, and returns when he has become tired of the world? A woman will more fully realize the folly of her ways, and be more ready to reform if the opportunity is given her, but what is she to do? Her parents, the very ones whose arms should always be ready to receive her, cast her away with the command never to darken their door again. Her own sex refuse to recognize her, employment she cannot secure; so there is nothing left for her to do but to continue in her evil course until death claims her as his own, and thus brings the long wished for relief.—Anon.

BELIEF is an effect produced by a cause. It is a condition of the mind induced by the operation of evidence presented. Being, therefore, an effect and not an act, it cannot be, or hav, a merit. The moment it becomes a distinctly voluntary act (and therefore, a thing of which merit can be predicated) it ceases to be genuin; it is then brought about (if it be not an abuse of language to name this state "belief") by the will of the individual, not by the bona fide operation of evidence upon his mind. which brings us to reductio ad absurdum (the ridiculous conclusion), that belief can only become meritorious by ceasing to be honest.—Greg.

SINCE from my youth I was devoted to the pursuits of literature, and my mind has always been stronger than my body, I did not court the labors of a camp, in which any common person would hav been of more service than myself, but resorted to that employment in which my exertions were likely to be of most avail. Thus, with the better part of my power, I contributed as much as possible to the good of my country, and to the success of the glorious cause in which we were engaged; and I thought that if God willed the success of such glorious achievements, it was equally agreeable to his will that there should be others by whom these achievements should be recorded with dignity and elegance; and that the truth, which had been defended by arms, should also be defended by reason; which is the best and only legitimate means of defending it—Milton's Defense.

ISOLATION tends always to enfeeble the powers and impoverish the spirit, whether it be the hermit's cell, or the superb palace which sets one apart from his fellows in the world. Life in large communities is more attractiv and rewarding than in the smaller—in the village more so than in the hamlet; in the city more so than in the village. The energetic and sympathetic feel this most surely, and their scheme of life is modified by it.—Dr. R. S. Storrs.

TOWERED cities please us then,
And the busy hum of men;
When throngs of knights and barons bold
In weeds of peace, high triumphs hold.
With stare of ladies, whose bright eyes
Rain influence and judge the prize,
Of wit or arms, while both contend
To win her grace whom all commend.
—Milton's L'Allegro.

MAN was not sent upon the earth to prepare himself for existence in another world; he was sent upon the earth that he might beautify it as a dwelling, and subdue it to his use; that he might exalt his intellectual and moral powers until he had attained perfection, and had raised himself to that ideal which he now expresses by the name of God, but which, however sublime it may appear to our weak and imperfect minds, is far below the splendor and majesty of that power by whom the universe was made.—Winwood Reade.

BE ye therefore perfect, even as your father which is in heaven is perfect.—Jesus.

To catch Dame Fortune's golden smile,
Assiduous wait upon her;
And gather gear by every wile
That's justified by honor;
Not for to hide it in a hedge,
Nor for a train attendant;
But for the glorious privilege
Of being independent. —Burns.

A PERSON whom I knew had dined with a millionaire, tete-a-tete, with six flunkeys standing round the table. I suppose that a man of Mr. Greg's (the author of "The Creed of Christendom") intellect and character, in spite of his half ascetic hatred of plush, would rather hav been one of the six than one of the two.—Goldwin Smith.

FEW can seriously think it possible to reimpose upon the modern world the Lent of the Middle Ages, with its irrational disregard of latitude, climate, employment, physical constitution, and everything else of which medical science takes account in regulating diet. The number is always growing smaller of those who believe that the narrativ to which Lent has reference is itself to be taken literally, and that all the kingdoms of the world were actually shown by the tempter to the tempted from the pinnacle of the temple.—Toronto Bystander (April).

RIGHT thinking involves free thinking. If to know truth makes us free, freedom, again, is the condition of knowing the truth.—Dr. J. F. Clarke.

N. Y. State Freethinkers' Association.

Where Held—The Speakers Engaged—The Hotels, Railroads, etc.

THE NEW YORK STATE FREETHINKERS' ASSOCIATION, in accordance with its established custom, has invited the Freethinkers of all the other states, and also of Canada, to meet them in annual Convention, at Cassadaga Lake, N. Y., on the 3d, 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th days of September next.

Reynolds, of Rochester, N. Y.; Samuel P. Putnam, of New York; Dr. William F. McCormick, of Franklin, Pa.; and Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., orthodox, of Philadelphia, Pa. And the following hav also been invited, the most of whom are expected to be present: Hon. Elizur Wright, of Boston; F. E. F. Underwood, editor of the Index, Boston, Mass. It is possible that Col. Ingersoll will be present and address the Convention.

THE SINGING.

Professor A. D. Lane, of Olean, N. Y., one of the most popular professional singers in the state, accompanied by as good a quartet of voices as can be found in Western New York, has been engaged to provide the musical entertainment for the occasion. Professor H. H. Hall, who sang for the Rochester Convention, has also been engaged.

THE PLACE OF MEETING.

The location where the Convention is to meet is one of the most pleasant and picturesque in the state. It is described as follows in a circular issued by the Association: "The Cassadaga Lake Camp-meeting Grounds are eight miles from Lake Erie, and seven hundred feet above it; situated midway between New York and Chicago, one and a half hours by rail from Buffalo, five from Cleveland, nine from Pittsburgh, fourteen hours from Cincinnati, sixteen from Philadelphia, eighteen hours from New York, twenty hours from Boston and Washington, and twenty-one from Chicago. It lies on the shore of a beautiful chain of lakes, three in number, and at an elevation of nearly fourteen hundred feet above the level of the sea." The Association last year erected on the grounds an amphitheater, with a seating capacity of twenty-five hundred people, with the seats in a semi-circle, which givs every one present an opportunity to hear all that is said from the speaker's platform.

ROUTES OF TRAVEL AND RAILROAD RATES.

Eastern and western passengers over the Nickel Plate, Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad, and eastern passengers over the New York, Lake Erie & Western (formerly Erie) railroad, change cars at Dunkirk, N. Y., and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to the "Cassadaga Camp-meeting Grounds."

Eastern and western passengers over the New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio railroad (formerly Atlantic & Great Western), and eastern passengers over the Buffalo & Jamestown railroad, change cars at the Atlantic & Great Western Crossing, and take the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad to Lily Dale Station.

To be more definit, persons coming to the Convention from most of the cities and large towns in the United States will find it the cheaper to purchase excursion tickets to Chautauqua Lake. These can be obtained very cheap; and then leave the cars at the crossing of the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad near Jamestown, and then take the last mentioned road to Lily Dale Station, near the camping grounds. Persons coming from any station on the New York, Lake Erie & Western railroad, or any of its branches west of Binghampton, will pay full fare to Dunkirk, and then be returned at one-third fare home. The Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh railroad will sell excursion tickets at two cents a mile from any station on that road.

NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE

WILL HOLD ITS

EIGHTH ANNUAL CONGRESS

At the same place.

In his call for the Congress the President of the League invites "all citizens of the United States, whether they hav acted with this League or not, who believe in a secular republic, separation of church and state; the equality of all citizens before the law, without distinction of creed or race or sex; justice for all, and privileges and monopolies for none; the need of universal secular education, free speech, and a free press as the basis of universal suffrage."

All Charter and Life Members of the League, and all delegates from local Auxiliary Leagues, will hav votes in the Congress. Each Auxiliary is entitled to send five delegates—its president, secretary, and three other members—to the Congress. Odds and Ends.

NOT even a sparrow falls to the ground without being seen, and generally the cat gets it.

WHEN a small boy gets spanked it may be truly said that there is a woman at the bottom of it.

INSTEAD of gambling at the rural church strawberry festivals, the girls guess how many hairs are in the dude's mustaches, and the one who comes the nearest rakes the pot.

"AH, Mr. Hebbleton, I hear that you hav been called to the ministry." "Well, I can hardly term it a call. They only offer me five hundred a year. Sort of a whisper, you understand."

MISS EVA MACKAY, daughter of the California millionare, is betrothed to Mr. Colonna, representativ of the well-known family of Colonna. It will now be in order for her friends to Colonna and present their congratulations.

"How in the world can you content yourself to liv in this dead-and-alive place?" asked the city visitor of her country cousin. "I know I should die if I had to stay here." "Well," replied the rustic relativ, "I suppose I should, too; but then the city folks ain't here only a few weeks in the year, you know."

"CLARA, what makes you sit so close to George when he calls? I hope you will not forget the proprieties, my child." "Oh, but, ma, George is dreadful deaf." "Yes, I remember, your father was troubled with the same complaint before we were married, but now I cannot go through his pantaloons pockets in the morning without waking him up."

"YES, sir," he said fiercely, as he stood up to the bar, "the ins hav got to go out, and the outs hav got to go in." Just then his wife entered the saloon, and seizing him by the collar said, in low, determined tones, "There's one out got to be in—in his own house in ten minutes, or there's going to be music somewhere." He smiled a sickly smile as he said, "My wife's a great joker," but he followed meekly in her wake, nevertheless, as she left the place.

IN Missouri hugging parties hav been introduced to swell the church treasuries, and a paper givs the following scale of prices: Girls under sixteen, 25 cents for each hug of two minutes; from sixteen to twenty-five years of age, 50 cents; from twenty to twenty-five, 75 cents; schoolma'ams, 40 cents; widows, according to looks, from 10 cents to $1; old maids, 3 cents apiece, or two for a nickel, and not any limit of time. Ministers are not charged. Editors pay in advertisments, but are not allowed to participate until everybody else is through.

AT a camp-meeting way down in Maine many of the campers inhabited temporary abiding places made of canvas, stretched upon a frame-work of joists. To dwell in such a place in proper privacy requires some caution. It won't do to place a light in the middle of the tent and then proceed to make preparations for retiring, for the shadows are cast with a deadly accuracy and are not spread out as they are on the slanting walls of an ordinary tent. This fact being noticed by certain young persons who perambulated the groves by night, a scheme against the peace of mind of the persons inhabiting such dwellings was formed and carried out. The young villains secured a plenteous supply of charcoal, and as the shades of evening advanced they noiselessly went about tracing out upon the outside walls of the tents the shadows thrown from the inside. The light of morning broke—was broken all up, in fact—upon a decorated camp. Many of the sketches were distinctly recognizable and intensely amusing. The expression that stole over the face of Deacon —— when he emerged from his tent and found a curious and amused crowd gazing at an excellent likeness of his more than portly form arrayed in exceedingly scanty attire, was a sight for the gods.

LITTLE AH SID, AND HOW HE BACKSLID.

Little Ah Sid
Was a Christian kid—
A cute little cuss, you'd declare—
With eyes full of fun,
With a nose that begun
Right up at the roots of his hair.

Jolly and fat
Was this frolicsome brat,
As he played through the long summer day,
And braided his cue
As his father used to,
In Chinaland, far, far away.

Once o'er a lawn
That Ah Sid played upon,
A bumble-bee flew in the spring;
"Melican buttlefly!"
Said he winking his eye,
"Me catch um and pull off um wing."

Then with his cap
He struck it a rap—
This innocent bumble-bee—
And put its remains
In the seat of his jeans,
For a pocket there had the Chinee.

Down on the green
Sat the little sardine
In a style that was strangely demure,
And said with a grin
That was brimful of sin,
"Me mash um buttlefly, sure."

Little Ah Sid
Was only a kid,
Nor could you expect him to guess
What kind of a bug
He was holding so snug
In the folds of his loose-fitting dress.

"Ki-ya! Ki-yip-ye!"
Ah Sid cried, as he
Rose hurriedly up from that spot.
"Ki-ya! Yuk-a-kan!
Dam un Melican man—
Um buttlefly belly much hot!"

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Entered at the Post-Office at New York, N. Y., as Second-class Matter.

Notes and Clippings.

THE latest illustration of the advantages of heredity in England is evidenced in the £100 a year pension granted to the Rev. Charles Southey, who is nobody, for being the son of Robert Southey, who was somebody.

MR. EVARTS'S committee needs contributions to finish the pedestal of the statue of Liberty. The statue is ready to be shipped, and $125,000 is needed to complete the work on Bedloe's Island, in New York Harbor, by November.

To help on the work of Christianizing the Chinese in Philadelphia, the committee has issued a neat prayer-book, with the prayers both in English and Chinese. A prayer in Chinese must strike the recording angel as something of a curiosity.

THE pope is about to issue a bull against France for legislating on the rights of her citzens relating to free marriage, and also free divorce for cause. The encyclical letter will declare marriage a sacrament. That will, of course, make it so!

THE various missionary societies should turn their attention to some church communities instead of the heathen. At a meeting in a Paterson, N. J., church last week, the members jumped around and on the seats, and called each other liars and hypocrits. It was found necessary to call in the police. There is a rich field for missionary duty among some of the churches, says the Telegram.

THE circle of a child's acquaintances cannot be expected to be as large as that of its parents. A little Chicago girl went to Sunday-school and was placed in a class. The teacher sweetly asked her if she knew who Jesus was. "Well, ma'am, we've just gone to board at the Palmer House, an' ain't very well acquainted, but I 'spect ma knows him." The mother says she don't know what the neighbors think about the way she brings up her children.

"CHICAGO must be a pretty large and flourishing place," said an Austin man to a gentleman from the Lake City, who had come to Texas for his health. "Yes, we must hav almost ten thousand saloons." "How many clerical scandals?" "I've only heard of three lately." "How is that?" "The reason there are so many more saloons than clerical scandals is because you know where to lay your hands on the saloons when you want to count them."

THE ghost of Abraham will not down. Andrew O. Taylor, of this city, was charged with assaulting his mother-in-law. When asked whether he had knocked her down, Taylor said: "No, sir; I feel confident that it was the supreme power that knocked her down, cut her face, and blackened her eye." "Through the instrumentality of your fist," said the district attorney. "But she was banging me over the head with a big dipper," said the prisoner. "Another supreme power," said the court, facetiously. The inspired gentleman was discharged.

THE British Association of Scientists hav just closed a convention at Montreal, Can. Jo Cook was in town seeking a recognition, which he did not gain. A Sun correspondent says of him: "The Rev. J. Cook, who has bobbed up serenely here, lectured to-night in a Methodist church on the subject, 'Does death end all?' with physiological illustrations. He wanted to hav a tilt with the Materialists. His posters were extensivly distributed around where the scientific men could see them, and, as a well-known New York man of science said, 'He told all about what happens after death for only twenty-five cents.'"

THE details of the attempted shooting last month of Col. Katansky, chief of the gendarmes, of Odessa, Russia, which hav hitherto been suppressed, hav now become public. The motiv leading the young woman, Maria Kalisnaja, to attempt the deed was the desire for revenge. Col. Katansky had sentenced her brother, who was a member of a revolutionary society, to penal servitude for life. The girl entered Col. Katansky's private room, and twenty minutes later drew a revolver from her pocket and fired point blank at the officer. The bullet grazed his ear, and before she could fire again Col. Katansky seized the weapon and immediately placed the young woman under arrest.

SOME of the students at Racine College, Wis., are liable to be proceeded against for neglecting the means of grace. The late Dr. Koven of that college was in the habit of giving his classes a weekly lecture upon religious subjects, questioning them beforehand in order to find out what they already knew. On one of these occasions the topic was the angels. "Now," said the doctor, "before I begin, let some one of you giv me his notion of an angel." A profound silence followed. "Did none of you, for instance, ever hear of Lucifer?" Thereupon a hand was lifted to reply. "Well, said the doctor, "what hav you to say of him?" "Why," replied the student, wasn't it he that started the German Reformation, as they say?"

How much do children usually understand of the theological distinctions taught them at Sunday-school? This conversation will illustrate: "My dear boy," said an earnest Sunday-school teacher at the North End Mission to a frowsy urchin, "do you know we are all sinners?" "Yes, marm." "Do you know that you are a sinner?" "Yes, marm." A long and earnest talk followed, in which the claims of the gospel were fully set forth; but the teacher was only rewarded by an unintelligible stare. Finally, it occurred to the teacher that perhaps she had taken the boy beyond his depth, and she inquired, "John, you know what a sinner is, don't you?" "Sinners, marm? Oh, yes; sinners is strings in turkey's legs."

THE writer of "Undertones" in the San Francisco Chronicle takes a rational view of the so-called phenomena of Spiritualism. He says: "I am not a Spiritualist, but there is far too much evidence of 'psychic force,' as it has been called, to leave any reasonable doubt of the existence of some form of magnetism which is one of the most marvelous of natural phenomena. Its various demonstrations are called phenomena. In the dictionary meaning of the word they are phenomena, but in the accepted meaning they are not. Scientists hav passed over all those subjects as curious freaks of nature. Nature has no freaks. Everything has a deliberate and intelligible cause, and it is the business of science not to disbelieve until it has proved imposture."

MR. RUSKIN, who never says anything unless he knows all about it, says: "In all rational and authoritativ sense the word saint can only be applied to a person in perfect health of body, heart, and mind." This knocks the saintly handle off the name of a person of the name of Paul, who, although otherwise approximating Mr. Ruskin's standard of saintship, suffered a grievous physical imperfection that tormented him not a little, and "his bodily presence was weak, and his speech contemptible." Good-bye, Saint Paul. Still, there is honor in store for the apostle to the gentiles. While we drop the "saint," we will call him "Mister Paul," just the same as we say "Mister Ruskin," which ought to be gratefully appreciated by Paul's large circle of admirers.—Exchange.

MR. BURDETTE, of the Burlington Hawkeye, drops into parable and discourses as follows: "You ought to be able to overhear all that goes on," remarked the dominie, gazing derisivly at the long ears of the patient ass. "I do," replied the patient ass. "Get on." The dominie climbed upon the patient back, and when his long legs were adjusted he smote the patient ass with his umbrella and said: "Get up!" "I will," replied the patient ass, "since you insist upon it." And then he "got up" his back in a sharp hump, and bucked the dominie over the long gray ears, clear through the osage orange hedge into the guinea hen's nest on the other side. The patient animal reached for a thistle and laughed a low, mournful laugh. "You bet your cassock," he murmured, "I over ear everything that goes on my back. Little pitchers hav great ears, but their best holt lies in the projectil tissue of the backbone." And in all the pleasant meadow there came no sound save the soft sighing of the summer wind, toying with the bending grasses, and the hushed breathing of a holy man, scraping from his somber garments the debris of the long, too long, hoarded wealth of the guinea hen's hidden nest.

DEACON WARD, so the Boston Globe asserts, is a Christian farmer who works fifty-one weeks in the year, and on the fifty-second he brushes up his old broadcloth coat with a high, quilted collar, covers his bald head with a napless silk hat, stores his old wagon full of bed-quilts and provisions, hitches in his sorrel bobtail mare, and strikes out for the camp-meeting. Arrived there, he started out in a search for milk for his coffee. On account of liquor being a forbidden luxury inside the grounds, the Yankee vendors hav been compelled to mix their whisky with milk and sell the savory combination under the name of "Jersey cream," which commands a good price among those who hav a fondness for such fluids. After a large amount of growling about the exorbitant rates, the deacon bought a quart of the patent milk and took it to his tent, when all the family was so delighted with its flavor that they sent out and procured some more. About bedtime the deacon was feeling sort of happy and determined to go over and get another glass just before retiring. "How many cows hav ye that gin that sort o' milk?" asked he, going up to the stand. "Four; they are all there are of the kind in the country." "You say they are Jerseys. What sort o' fodder do you gin 'em that makes it so rich?" "I don't giv them anything but grass. I lay the richness to the powerful amount of thunder showers we've hed o' late." "What hav they got to do with it?" "Everything in the world. You see, it thunders and lightens all the time up there where I livs, an' I reckon that somehow 'twixt the milkin' an' the cannin' my milk gets struck, an' that fixes it." "What on airth is it struck with?" "Jersey lightning."

THE Edinburgh Review recurs to the subject of lightning rods, and points out that the new doctrin of Franklin and his allies was not received without considerable opposition. A sharp shock of an earthquake having been experienced in Massachusetts in 1755, this was forthwith attributed to the evil influences of Franklin's lightning rods. A Boston clergyman preached against them in 1770 as "impious contrivances to prevent the execution of the wrath of heaven." Even as late as 1826 an engineer in the employment of the British government recommended that all lightning rods should be removed from public buildings as dangerous expedients, and in 1838 the governor-general and council of the East India Company ordered that all lightning rods should be removed from public buildings, arsenals, and powder magazines throughout India, and only became reconciled to their restoration after a large magazine and corning house, not furnished with a conductor, had been blown up during a storm. Franklin was so much in earnest in reference to his invention that he sent a friend at his own charge through the principal towns of the New England states to make known the powers and virtues of the lightning rod. In the "Poor Richard" for 1758, a kind of almanac or manual which he was at that time publishing, he gave specific instructions for the erection of his rods. The second conductor which he himself constructed was placed upon the house of Mr. West, a wealthy merchant of Philadelphia. A few months after this had been erected a storm burst over the town and a flash of lightning was seen to strike the point of the conductor and to spread itself out as a sheet of flame at its base. It was afterward found that about two inches and a half of the brass point had been dissipated into the air, and that immediately beneath the metal was melted into the form of an irregular, blunt cap. The house, nevertheless, was quite uninjured. The sheet of flame seen at the base of the conductor Franklin correctly ascribed to the ground having been very dry, and to there not having been a sufficiently capacious earth contact under those circumstances. He nevertheless shrewdly, and quite justifiably, assumed that in this case nature had itself pronounced an unmistakable verdict in favor of his invention.

CASHIER HILL of the New Brunswick, N. J., bank, having embezzled $200,000, committed suicide last week. President Runyon, also implicated, followed Hill's example and sev ered his jugular vein with a penknife last Monday.

MRS. WASHINGTON KELLER, of Reading, Pa., fasted forty-eight days and then died. She was inspired to take this long fast by reading of Christ's forty days' fast in the wilderness. It is fair to suppose that this folly will not be laid to the teachings of Infidelity.

ADDITIONAL returns from the Vermont elections show a decrease in the Republican majority as compared with the last election. This is claimed to be accounted for by Republicans on the theory that all the voters of the state were not represented at the polls.

THE Rev. Arthur Sloan's faith cure at Stratford, Conn., has closed its doors. The affair has not proved a financial success. Grocer Lemuel I. Beardsley, of the same place, whose magnetic treatment is not founded on faith, will continue business at the old stand.

MR. GLADSTONE has assured the ministers of the Free Church of Scotland that if a distinct majority of the Scotch members returned to the House of Commons at the next election were pledged to disestablish the Church of Scotland, the government would carry out the popular will.

A DEGREE of lassitude is observable in the political world. Little is accomplished, from day to day, more than a rehashing of old charges against party candidates. This may be called a summer of discontent among politicians. The winter of it will set in for some of them about Nov. 4th.

JUDGE C. J. FOLGER, secretary of the United States treasury, died at his home in Geneva, N. Y., on the 4th, aged 66 years. His death is attributed to overwork and disappointment arising from the loss of the governorship of New York, for which he was the Republican candidate and ran against Cleveland in 1882.

THE New York board of aldermen hav given away a million-dollar franchise, over the mayor's veto, to a stock company to build a surface railroad on Broadway. An investigation of the aldermen's conduct is going on. It is charged that each member of the board was promised $15,000 in cash and $10,000 worth of stock in the proposed road.

Questions for Mr. Perry to Answer.

J. R. PERRY, Sir: I, like yourself, "seldom dabble in politics," but when I see such articles as yours in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 26th on "Tariff," I cannot refrain from asking a few questions that I shall be pleased to hav you rise and explain. Who pays the tariff on imports—the home consumer or the foreign manufacturer? How are the consumer and laboring man benefited by tariff? How does it affect the price of wheat or other farm products? Being a laboring man, if high tariff will in any way benefit me, I would like to know it, so I could the better appreciate my friend, if such it be; for under my present convictions there are few things I appreciate less. The argument of high wages, about the only one I hav ever heard in its favor, is too vapid, and has gulled the unthinking laborer too long already. The wonder is, in the long, dull winter of idleness, as he sits shivering over his cold black stove, hungry and ragged, that he doesn't find out that tariff doesn't protect him nor his children's bare feet from the frost and snow, nor put food in their empty stomachs. The only reason that I can giv for his not thinking of such things, and resenting the insult of the high tariff advocate when he prates of protection and high wages at election times, and downing the fraud with his ballot, is that he has no time to think of anything but how to procure the necessities of life, luxuries and tariff being out of the question. For it is a lamentable fact that the laboring man's high wages boasted of will not support a family in Leavenworth, Kansas. What it will do elsewhere I cannot say; but, having been a laborer of Leavenworth for several years past, I know whereof I speak and can prove what I say. The (so-called) high wages of shop, and all indoor and outdoor laborers, where they can hav constant employment, is $1.25 per day. This, in a year of 313 working days, amounts to $391.25. The workingman's expenses for a family of six—himself, wife, and four children—at poor-house rates will be about as follows:

Rent of house for one year at $10 per month,	$120.00
Groceries at $6 per week,	312.00
Six tons of coal at $4,	24.00
Clothes for man,	25.00
" " woman,	25.00
" " each child $10,	40.00
Poll tax and other expenses,	20.00
Total,	566.00
Wages,	391.25
Leaving him behind,	174.75

This, it will be noticed, allows nothing for lost time, doctors' bills, and numerous other expenses that cannot be avoided. The question may be asked, How do they liv? By the wife and mother neglecting her own work and her children, going on short rations and half clad, and taking in washing or sewing, and sitting up nights to work when she should be in bed taking her needed rest. Those that think the expenses too high can find out by experiment. Perhaps it will be claimed that "a laborer that can't liv on bread and water has no right to liv;" or that a laboring man has no business with a wife and four children; and under our high tariff class-legislation this may be true. Surely the laboring man who assumes the responsibility of supporting a family under the present condition of things is making a rash venture, to say the least.

But if nativ-born citizens are as good as foreigners, the home and family should be encouraged and protected; and your argument in favor of "tariff affording inducements for emigration and an increase of population" falls flat.

The idea of an additional wealth tax is good, but, we fear, as impracticable as limitation in ownership of land, or government controling railroads. And to legislate so as to make millionaires at the expense of labor, in the hope that our grandchildren may get some of the money after the millionaires and their heirs are dead, we think a poor investment. Another unfair argument in favor of tariff is contrasting the condition of the laborers in England with those of the United States—unfair, because circumstances are different. England's population per square mile is 291, while that of the United States is only 14. Kansas has an area of 81,318 square miles, with a population of less than a million. Make her proportionately populous with England and Ireland, and she would hav over 24,000,000 inhabitants. Giv her 23,000,000 more people, with half of England's army to support, and is it reasonable to suppose they could liv as easily or well as under present conditions? If not, about how much tariff would it be necessary to add to their expenses to bring them up to the present living standard?

We think the object of legislation should be "the greatest good to the greatest number of people," without interfering with the rights of any. Just how tariff can benefit the consumer, agriculturist, or laborer is more than I can understand with present information. But that it prevents them from buying where they can buy cheapest, and enables the home manufacturer to sell at his own price regardless of cost, is certain. The idea of our suffering by overproduction is absurd and needs no comment; and if England can manufacture and ship her wares to us cheaper than we can produce them, let us buy of her and do something else that will pay better.

Here is where the high-wages hobby comes in, but as American manufacturers giv their employees only barely enough to subsist on under high tariff, England or the United States can do no less under free trade. If all the people of Pennsylvania were engaged in the manufacture of iron, and all other states were obliged to buy of them or of England, it would be good for them to hav a tariff sufficient to keep English iron out of the market; but how the tariff would benefit the other states is what I fail to see.

Will Mr. Perry please explain this, and why there are so many strikes? What is the use of the education and labor committee? If high tariff will adjust matters, let us hav more of it. But if it is the cause of the trouble and murmurings, and only serves to make millionaires at the expense of the laborer whom it claims to protect, the less we hav of it the better.

Leavenworth, Kan. H. H. HUTCHESON.

Organization in Canada.

Heretofore Canada has been behind the age in organized Secularism (Liberalism). There are encouraging signs that she will not long remain behind. The Freethought Association of Canada, incorporated in 1877, held no meetings for five years until last March, when it was reorganized for the purpose of doing activ work in Canada for the propagandism of Secularism; since when there hav been six branch societies, known as Secular societies, organized in places where there were no societies before.

But probably the most encouraging sign of the times, which also marks an era in Canadian Secularism, is the building of the first Secular Hall in Canada owned exclusivly by a Secular society. This has been brought about chiefly through the energy, enterprise, and liberality of Wm. Algie, of Alton, ably and warmly seconded by the efforts of his brother Freethinkers. Alton is a village on the Credit River, forty-five miles from Toronto. Its population is supported mainly by the water-power drawn from the river, that runs a number of mills, of which the woolen mills of Mr. Wm. Algie are the most valuable.

It was about three months ago that Mr. Algie conceived the scheme, and after talking the matter over with other members of his family and his mill hands, who, by the way, are all Secularists, he generously offered to giv the land, lay the foundation, and also giv a liberal sum toward building the superstructure, the remainder to be raised by subscription. This offer was enthusiastically accepted, and the building is now in process of construction.

About the middle of July invitations were sent to all well-known Canadian Freethinkers, and a few living abroad, to take part in the ceremony of laying the corner-stone on Saturday, August 16th. In response to the invitation, a large number of Secularists assembled at Alton on that date from different parts of Canada. In the mean time, the work had progressed much more rapidly than was anticipated, and as the contractor wished to take advantage of the pleasant weather to push it forward, he was allowed to proceed, and not wait for the ceremony of laying the corner-stone. This part of the program was therefore omitted. But it did not detract from the interest of the celebration.

A picnic was held in a grove on the outskirts of the village, and refreshments were provided in abundance by the members of the local society. The Orangeville Brass Band enlivened the exercises with music, and the Alton String Band, composed entirely of Secularists, played for the dancers.

Mr. Wm. Algie, in his opening speech, very briefly and very modestly explained the circumstances that resulted in the building of the hall and in this celebration. He then read letters of congratulation from Allen Pringle, Selby; Charles Watts, and W. Stewart Ross (Saladin), London, Eng.; W. McDonnell, Lindsay; F. Boas, G. S. Wilson, C. C. Stevens, and A. A. Murphy, Montreal, and others. At the solicitation of the writer, he secured the loan of the correspondence from Mr. Algie, and made copies of the same, which appear below:

FROM ALLEN PRINGLE.

To the Alton Secular Society, Greeting.

DEAR MR. ALGIE AND FRIENDS: I thank you for your very kind invitation to me to be present with you to celebrate the laying of the corner-stone of your projected Secular Hall, and I regret that pressing and imperativ duties at home prevent me from attending. But though I cannot be there personally, I send my hearty greetings, and am with you in thought, sympathy, and that genuin brotherhood of humanity which is a natural corollary of our creed, and which ought therefore to specially characterize Secularists.

That I am more than glad to hear of your initial undertaking goes without saying. Your project to erect a Secular Hall, if successful, is, so far as I know, the first in Canada; and you deserve great credit and substantial assistance in so noble a pioneer work. As we here in Lennox county took the initial step twelve years ago in commencing the activ and public propagandism of Secularism in the Dominion of Canada, and now look back with satisfaction, and even pride, upon our humble efforts, so you are now inaugurating the building of Secular halls in Canada, and will, I trust, in the future also hav good reason to look back upon your work with pride, pleasure, and satisfaction. As our initial step was a link in the chain of that grand evolution of thought and mental progress now so manifest everywhere, so is your significant work, commenced this day, another link in the golden chain. As our work was, so is yours—a sign of the times; and both are evidences of the march of humanity to a higher plane. Nor is this march a discouragingly slow one. By no means! Just think, my friends, for a moment, of the almost marvelous change in public sentiment in Canada in the last decade, in its animus and attitude toward Secularism and Secularists. If the community here in which I liv is any fair criterion of this province, or even a goodly portion of it, the change is almost incredible—entirely beyond what I anticipated twelve years ago when we commenced open discussion in the public press, and soon thereafter public Freethought lectures in the town of Napanee. Why, my friends, the feeling at that time against us, especially myself, was so bitter and vindictiv that nothing saved us from personal violence but a certain degree of esteem which we fortunately commanded in consequence of an otherwise unassailable character. But in the space of a decade this has all changed. The hostil animus has disappeared, and the bitterness has given place to bantering, itself good-natured and half-doubting. The hostil prejudice we hav mostly lived down; and we hav evidence that our work has not been in vain, for every church in this community is leavened more or less with rationalism.

Members of churches who nominally are Christians are doubters and heretics. Business, family, society, and other considerations keep them within the pale of the church, but upon their intellect and conscience the church has no hold. Out of their own mouths I will prove this. The lord bishop of Ontario, in a lecture on "Agnosticism," given here a few months ago, and since published, used this language:

"Religion is at the present time confronted with a very real as well as a very subtle danger. It is not Christianity or any particular system of religion that is attacked, but religion itself at its very root. This danger arises from the prevalence of Agnosticism, which is so subtly diffused that its influence is felt, not only in the writings of Agnostics, but in conversation, magazines, and newspapers. It occupies the attention and affects the minds of multitudes who dare not avow it. It has crept into our churches, and heads of families who are church-goers, and outwardly believers, are at heart Agnostics."

I hav ample personal knowledge that this testimony from the bishop is quite true—at any rate, true of all the churches in this community, Roman Catholic as well as Protestant; all of which is, of course, very encouraging.

The first public discussion in Canada of theological questions, involving a denial of the inspiration of the scriptures, and the fundamental tenets of Christianity, and setting forth Constructiv Rationalism or Secularism, was held in the columns of a Napanee paper twelve years ago, commencing in December, and ending the following March. This paper, fortunately, at that time happened to be in the hands of rather Liberal-minded young men as editor and proprietors. The editor especially was a young man of considerable culture and Liberal views, and it was through his influence with the proprietors that I obtained a hearing through their columns. The local clergy had commenced the attack from their pulpits, and as that medium (sometimes called the "Coward's Castle") was of course shut against reply, I sought the press, and fortunately the Napanee paper alluded to opened its columns to me. I flung the gauntlet down to the clergy. I denied their assertions, refuted their misrepresentations, and challenged the very fundamentals of their religion, offering them a new philosophy of life and a better religion—the religion of Secularism and Humanity. In default of any reply from the clergy, a Scotch Presbyterian layman took up the cudgels for them. Then another layman came to his relief, and finally one of the clergy in desperation came to the relief of both (anonymously, however); but all finally left the field. This being the first public attack upon the popular religion, the first public presentation of Rationalism, the whole community was terribly shocked. But the shock was succeeded by that infallible sedativ, thought, sober thought. In the country house, no less than the town, the papers containing the controversy were put away on the traditional "shelf" for future reference, instead of in the waste-basket. And the Christian, on the wet day or dull Sunday, would take down his file of papers and again go over the dull points, and reflect and cogitate to himself. This I know to be a fact.

The ball being thus started so auspiciously to roll—though not without an ominous and threatening sound—we determined to keep it in motion. We accordingly invited Mr. B. F. Underwood to come here and giv a course of lectures on the questions in issue between us and the clergy. This was in the fall of 1874—ten years ago this fall, and about two years after I had first flung the gauntlet to the clergy in the public press. The struggle which then commenced—hostil and bitter on the part of our opponents, and determined and uncompromising on our part—ending in the long course of litigation known as the "Napanee Town Hall Case"—I need not enter into here, as the particulars of the struggle are known to most Canadian Freethinkers. Suffice it to briefly say that after I had leased the hall from the mayor of the town for the lectures, taking the precaution to hav a written contract, the bigoted town-council ignored the mayor's contract and trampled upon our rights by locking the hall against us. Determined not to be foiled, we hired another hall at an expense of $125.00 for three nights, and triumphantly had our lectures with crowded houses in spite of the bigots. I then brought an action at law against the town for damages, which, after dragging its slow length along through the courts for years, with varying verdicts and reversals, was ultimately decided against us. But though we suffered a technical and legal defeat at heavy expense, our moral victory was complete. Opponents who at that time were most bitter—apparently thirsting for my life-blood—are now excellent friends, with no trace of ill-will.

The various judgments of the courts also, though legally against us, were morally in our favor. At the final hearing of the case before the late Chief Justice Harrison and Justice Armour in Toronto, the latter said, "If Christianity were true, there could be no possible harm done by discussing its doctrins; and in this age we were standing on the threshold of great discoveries in nature, and that it would never do to muzzle those people who were engaged in those investigations because their discoveries did not agree exactly with the preconceived notions of some so-called religionists." Judge Moss, also, who tried the case at the Assizes in Napanee, said, in his judgment, "I find that the plaintiff acted reasonably and fairly."

The progress of Freethought in Canada generally, but more especially in this province, during the past few years has been all that any of us could reasonably expect considering the strength of the inborn tendencies and ingrained prejudices we hav to contend against. The press, and even the pulpit, are rapidly becoming Liberalized and secularized. Secularists are rightly entering upon constructiv work. Our philosophy or creed, which is wholly affirmativ and utilitarian, instead of negativ and destructiv, as charged by our opponents, is crystallizing itself into the fruits of good living, right teaching to our children, and the building of Secular halls for useful, educational, and social purposes, of which latter good work this one is the auspicious beginning.

The endeavor now being made to get Mr. Charles Watts, of England, and Mr. George Chainey, of the United States, both able and eloquent exponents of our principles, to come amongst us as worthy exemplars and teachers of constructiv Secularism, and effectiv iconoclasts in the controversial arena when necessary, augurs well for our cause in Canada, and has my warmest sympathy and support. Meanwhile, let every Secularist prove the superiority of his creed by his exemplary life—by moral conduct, by temperance in all things, and, above all, by so training and instructing his children physically and mentally that they may in their turn benefit their posterity and the world. Yours in fraternal bonds, ALLEN PRINGLE.

FROM CHARLES WATTS.

74 HERNE HILL ROAD, LONDON, S. E., ENG., July 27, 1884.

DEAR SIR: Your very pleasing and interesting letter to hand, and I need hardly say that its contents afford me inexpressible pleasure. Your act in the cause of Freethought is a generous one, and will no doubt meet with its just reward in the two-fold sense of the satisfaction you will yourself experience, and in the good which must in the end result from a true and generous altruism, which ever arises above the mere pleasure of the individual. The movement of the race is ever onward, and they who lend a helping hand to push on the car of progress are the real benefactors of humanity. The courser will rush forward, whoever drives, but wisdom in holding the reins is all-important, notwithstanding. The step you hav taken deserves to be held in remembrance by all the friends of freedom, and its enemies are not likely to forget it. Would that I could be with you on the occasion of the inauguration of your new venture. But although that is not possible, I hav the gratification of knowing that, all being well, I shall be present on the spot of your noble efforts soon afterwards, and hope then to witness this new triumph of the cause we both hav so much at heart. Great movements hav ever been the result of growth, and experience proves that nothing adds more to the development and to a fair prospect of the ultimate triumph of our enterprise than a sound organization having for its center a hall independent of orthodox caprice and beyond the control of theological prejudice. The building now erected through your generosity, aided by the liberal support of the Canadian Freethinkers generally, is to be dedicated to the promulgation of Secular principles, which, when consistently adhered to, supply a practical science of life, based on ethical culture and mental disciplin. The light is dawning on all peoples, and he who removes any obstacle, however small, to its rays, rises in that ratio above the defenders of darkness and those who are indifferent whether it is noonday or night. I sincerely hope that the effort put forth by the Freethinkers of Canada may be the beginning of a movement which, like the incoming tide, shall carry all before it, and sweep away every obstacle to the advancement of man. The progress that has already been made, both in your country and mine, is satisfactory; but a glance at the prospects of the future is still more gratifying. Old errors which hav been firmly rooted for centuries are tottering and falling; and the ground is being swept clear for new truths. As Secularists, we aim not simply to destroy, but we endeavor also to replace. To pull down may be good work, but far greater is the erection of the new fabric. The latter is the principal aim of Secularism, which is something more than mere Freethought. It is a system of positiv moral duties, apart altogether from the theological teachings of the world. Freethought is a necessary "John the Baptist" preparing the way for the Secular savior whose mission it is to redeem the race from the threefold curse of ignorance, credulity, and priestcraft, and to inspire within man self-confidence, self-respect, and self-reliance. Sincerely hoping that your very laudable efforts to extend the knowledge of such a savior will be crowned with every success, and that ere long I shall be in your midst to contribute my humble services in the great and noble work, believe me

Yours very faithfully, CHARLES WATTS.

MR. W. ALGIE.

FROM W. STEWART ROSS (SALADIN).

118 LOUGHBORO ROAD, LONDON, S. W., ENG., July 30, 1884.

DEAR SIR: It is with unfeigned pleasure I hav to congratulate you upon your generous and well-directed liberality as regards the new Freethought Hall to be opened under the auspices of yourself and your friends in Ontario. May your example inspire others to follow in your steps, and thereby contribute to break down the theological superstitions which mar the glorious political freedom of the Western world. I congratulate you upon the beacon tower you hav raised, and through the Christian darkness of Ontario I trust its light may flash till the shadow of the cross darkens the land no more. Depend upon it, sir, that in the part you hav borne in opening this hall to the Freethinkers of Canada you hav done a deed important and momentous possibly far beyond what your own modesty will at present permit you to think you hav done. It is the man who dares to stand up for the truth when all men are against him who is the hero. With you there, as with us here, the Freethought cause is still an unpopular one. The intellectually indolent cannot submit themselvs to the mental effort it entails.

The man who cares for triumph more than truth can find triumph only on the side of popular error; and he who steps forward as the champion of a principle for the acceptance of which the world is ripening—but not yet ripe—instead of winning triumph, usually entails upon himself obloquy, poverty, slander, misrepresentation, and neglect. And yet there is the glorious fact that on your side of the Atlantic, as on mine, there are men of heroic mold and moral daring who will strike for truth though no one applaud; who will stand up for principle, be the personal consequences what they may. Among these, sir, I am proud to rank yourself. In fidelity to principle you hav given your lands and your dollars; but if you, sir, had been mean enough to care for praise more than principle, for popularity more than truth, you would hav made your gift to some howling Methodists or raving ranters, and thereby hav obtained the favor of Grundy and the prayers of the saints. You hav not, sir, that favor and those prayers, but you hav the consciousness of having done your duty; and I doubt not you hav the manhood to estimate at their true value whatever social paltriness and Christian spite may say and do against you. Depend upon it, a not very remote posterity shall yet bless your name, for the sun of our morning is already breaking through the clouds on the horizon, and ours is the coming cause. The cause is already championed by the large-hearted humanitarianism of Robert Ingersoll, with his electric eloquence and powerful individuality towering into the higher mountain ranges of literary genius. And now (I almost grudge you the boon) you hav on your continent my friend and late editorial colleague, Charles Watts, who, through good report and evil, has devoted his life to hacking and hewing at the theological fetters and shackles which cling to the limbs of such vast numbers of his brothers of mankind. Popular platform Freethought has no abler advocate; human liberty no more unflinching champion; ignorance and tyranny no more determined foe. What England loses, America gains; and in the breaking down of the Christian superstition, we must rise above the narrow prejudices of country and geographical barrier, to the country of the world and the federation of mankind: Sir, I may never see your face, I may never hear your voice, but your thought is mine, your aspiration is mine; and as men, as Freethinkers, as antichristians, as brothers, we shake hands to-day over the roar of the Atlantic.

Yours fraternally, W. STEWART ROSS (SALADIN),
Editor Secular Review.

FROM WM. M'DONNELL.

LINDSAY, ONT., July 31, 1884.

DEAR SIR: One of the most assuring marks of the progress of the time is the evidence contained in your kind letter of the 25th inst. The fact of the Secular Society of Alton sending an invitation to Freethinking brethren to celebrate the event of laying the corner-stone of a building to be dedicated to the service of Freethought in Canada, and as a check to the dominant superstition, is most gratifying. The Christian creed, as candor must admit, is, at present, in its decadence. Like ancient religions, it has already become to many but a legend or romance. The most thoughtful men and women of our country, as well as those of the world over, are becoming ashamed of the pueril myths that, like other inspired myths of old, tell of a future heaven and hell, of angels and fiends, of eternal happiness and eternal misery, and of absurd tales and stories, which even some thoughtful ministers hav already rejected. Those who were once conscientious worshipers of a so-called omnipotent being refuse to bow any longer to a deity who can, at the same time, be merciful and benevolent, ferocious and insatiable. Man, trained in the false ideas of Christian theology, has too often followed the character of his god, and has been cruel and persecuting to those who differed from him; but even man, with all his failings, has still been more pitiful and forgiving than the imagined ruler at whose power he trembled. He required much courage to be an avowed Freethinker or Secularist. Persecution, at the present day, may not be able to destroy the body, but intolerance exists to destroy reputation; and the priests who preach will continue to malign and misrepresent as usual.

In partial dread of this intolerance, there are hundreds throughout the land who, while nominally assenting to church doctrins, hav virtually rejected them. But true men and women will be consistent, and by their example show to all that they are not ashamed or afraid to avow their principles. Secularists, or Infidels, or Atheists, are already classed by the best judges of human nature, even by their candid opponents, as the most honorable, and intellectually superior to most others. Among such, I am confident, are the Secularists of Alton. They occupy a proud position in Canada as being the first, I believe, about to erect a temple in Ontario to Reason and Truth. I hope their noble example may be followed by others in this dominion. Hamilton, Toronto, Montreal, and every town in the province should hav its own Secular hall, and I trust many years will not elapse until such will be the case.

I thank you most sincerely for your kind invitation to myself; nothing would giv me more satisfaction than to be with you. I hav shown your letter to some friends here, who, as well as I, would like to attend your celebration, but as circumstances will prevent this, I, for one, shall try to be with you at the dedication of the hall of the Alton Secular Society. All honor to that society, and to you and others for your example and liberality. I remain

Very truly yours, W. MCDONNELL.

[The letters from Geo. S. Wilson, president, and C. Stevens, secretary of the Montreal Pioneer Freethought Club, sending congratulations in behalf of the officers and members; from F. Boas, late president of the same club, and from A. A. Murphy, are well worthy of publication, but for want of space we are compelled to omit.]

Ex-Rev. George Chainey, of Boston, in response to a call from the chairman, made a brief speech of congratulation, as a preliminary to the delivery of his lecture, "Leaves of Grass," which was closely listened to and well appreciated. It would be out of place to giv a synopsis of his lecture here, as many hav either read it or listened to it.

J. Ick. Evans, president of the Toronto Secular Society, and also of the Freethought Association of Canada, was then called upon to address the meeting. He said it was difficult for him to express his feelings upon the occasion of the building of the first Freethought hall in Canada, as he may be charged with insincerity, which, in his opinion, was a crime in a Freethinker the most despicable. In referring to the letter read to the meeting from Mr. Allen Pringle, of Selby, Mr. Evans said he was glad to be able, as others then around him on the present happy occasion, to bear witness to the entire truthfulness of Mr. Pringle's communication; and he, for one, was prepared to concede that Mr. Pringle was without doubt the father of Freethought propagandism in Canada. He (Mr. Evans) had himself, with many then present, been activ in Freethought propagandism in this country for ten years, and he felt proud of the act of the Freethinkers of Alton, headed as they were by the Algie family, whose influence and activity had brought about results in that part of Canada that would be remembered in the long ages to come. Mr. Evans then referred to the social and other inequalities before the law, at present endured by the Freethinkers of all countries. He strongly counseled the sinking of all party politics, as he, for one, was prepared to stand by the glorious principles of intellectual liberty and freedom of speech before those of political partyism. In these organizations the Freethinkers of Canada would possess the power of union, and this would ultimately compel that justice so long withheld by Christian intolerance and dogmatic theology. Mr. Evans spoke of the great advance made by Freethought everywhere, and especially in Canada, and strongly condemned the moral cowardice that made many suppress their opinions out of fear of religious persecution, by social proscription, etc. His own experience had been most favorable to honest expression of opinion, as he flattered himself he enjoyed the esteem and confidence of many of his fellow-citizens who were amongst the most ardent supporters of the church. Mr. Evans also referred to the opinion of Mr. Charles Watts, of England, that "Freethought in Canada occupied a higher plane of intelligence than in many other countries." After returning thanks for the splendid reception accorded himself and Toronto friends, he concluded his remarks amidst loud applause.

After a song by Charles Hicks, of Toronto, the dancing and other festivities were continued till eight o'clock, when the majority of the party were driven to the station to take the cars for home. A large number from Toronto and other places were persuaded to remain till the following Monday and Tuesday, and were right royally entertained. Among those present were the venerable John Groom, of Meaford; R. W. King, Georgetown; George S. Coldbeck, Owen Sound, and others, besides a large delegation from the Toronto Secular Society. RISSER.

Toronto, August, 1884.

The Lithograph.

DEAR MACDONALD: Here come my thanks for that splendid lithograph. "A thing of beauty is a joy forever!" Humanity is an endless success, for which its apostle, Bennett, so successfully labored—more successfully, even, than some of his worthy compeers, and hence more generally esteemed and highly honored. As an editor, he was a model of independence and freedom. As an author, he was scientific and instructiv. He had, long before, emerged from all the fogs of mysticism. As a traveler around our globe, he excelled all that went before in the versatility of his talents as a writer and a historian. He was antiquarian, ethnological, and truthful. And his four volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" are enough to immortalize the name of D M. Bennett, and to multiply his friends from pole to pole. I know what Christianity, bigotry, and superstition are, and if I had the funds I would put those four volumes in every library on the face of the globe. No candid mind can read them without benefit. And then they hav all the charms of romance, besides an intrinsic value for their truthfulness, that givs them a vast advantage over purely theological works; and they are truthful and good enough to be popular and read in all the coming ages of time.

Yours truly, LAROY SUNDERLAND.

Scraps and Comments.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I never read a TRUTH SEEKER but I feel like reviewing it, there is so much I want to comment upon. It is all interesting, from "Notes and Clippings" to the last of "Odds and Ends." Even the long talks of Spencer and Stephen Pearl Andrews are full of meat. Putnam is always splendid.

Reynolds's League article would be almost perfect if he had not totally ignored woman, and woman's works and books—thus following Christian lead, for the church always kept woman in the background till she proved her help was absolutely needed to keep it alive.

Two or three women hav kept a reading club alive here for years. Two or three Liberal women who would set about it zealously could resurrect every one of the dying and dead Leagues. Two good live women could keep a League in full vigor and vim.

I don't say it to boast, but I'll wager I've circulated more Liberal books, tracts, and papers during the past ten years than any Liberal woman in Virginia, and mostly at my own private expense.

Weybright is correct in appreciation of the burial services of Mrs. Macdonald. I hav ordered some copies of it for distribution among the inquiring pious here in old Virginia.

A lady was asking the other day if Infidels didn't bury people like brutes—if they had any services at all—if they cared if their children were bad and wicked. Strange how ignorant some are of real Infidels. And she is an intelligent preacher's wife, and a reader, but never before saw a live Infidel, and wonders why they don't all lie, steal, swear, and murder. I hope when she reads some of our burial ceremonies she will be wiser. I've given her Bennett's "Book of Forms," etc. Dear old Bennett—what a grand work he did do!

I see the Popular Science Monthly notices Kelso's "Bible Analyzed." I consider that a compliment, though of course it does not indorse the manner or style of the book. But it is much to win recognition of any sort from such a monthly.

What a grand lecture might be made from the item on the parade of the Brooklyn liquor-dealers! Should freedom be allowed to celebrate such monstrous evils and ridicule the acknowledged virtues and goods? Liquor drinking is an acklowledged evil. Not one fact can be adduced in its favor. It is wholly bad. But money is power, and even such monsters are allowed to receive honor and respect.

Agnosticism.

There is one remarkable thing about the criticisms of the Agnostic philosophy as enunciated by Herbert Spencer, and that is the stubborn persistency with which the critics continue to assert that Agnosticism is a wholly negativ philosophy in spite of Mr. Spencer's repeated denials and proofs to the contrary. Some one said it was a "mere negation," and "mere negation" was caught up and shouted from Dan to Beersheba. Perhaps Mr. Spencer's critics know what he means better than he does, but there is no evidence at present that they are likely to succeed in making him think so. This persistent endeavor to place him in a false position, if not a positivly unfair course, is at least a strange one. When Mr. Spencer says positivly that Agnosticism, as he understands it, is not a wholly negativ system, instead of persistently declaring that it is, the proper course is to search for the reason why it appears to be so. In their search for this reason, Mr. Andrews givs the critics a hint of where it must be sought. He says: "I am not now commenting upon Mr. Spencer's idea, as covered by the term Unknowable, but upon the appropriateness or inappropriateness of the term to express any true idea whatsoever." He also says: "It can hardly be imputed to Mr. Spencer, or any other thinker, as a marked personal defect, that he has not been able to transcend the limits imposed on him by the imperfection of our extant languages." A system or theory should not be inverted nor repudiated because of a deficiency in its verbal presentation, in consequence of the inadequateness of language. Mr. Andrews further states that "Atheism, Theism, Panthism, and Agnosticism will be reconciled as merely different aspectual statements of a truth which is too immense and too various to be formulated by any single utterance," etc. If Agnosticism is a "merely different aspectual statement" of systems which are regarded as very positiv, it is surely time that the mere negation cry was hushed forever. It seems to me that the importance of Mr. Harrison's critical question, "Why an Energy?" has been much magnified. So far as the effect upon man's conduct is concerned, it would be difficult to show that it would make any difference whether we regard the Unknowable as a single power, or as a grand aggregation of cosmic forces whose ceaseless activities are so harmoniously blended that their manifestations which come within the reach of human perception, create the impression of a unity of power. If we conceive a plurality of forces, and trace them backward, they will either assume converging lines somewhere, and end in a mysterious fountain-head, or stretch out to a formless, measureless gulf. The idea of unity will always remain at the farthest limit.

Notwithstanding the immense Pantheons of Greece and Rome, those hosts of deities, with all their complex variety of functions and varying degrees of power, were traced back to the primitiv chaos, whence all life and power sprang, and the deities of India and Egypt were but the personifications of phenomena whose origin was a mysterious, omnipresent power. The chief charge against Agnosticism is that it fails to satisfy the mind in regard to the future, and does not promote morality. I do not assert that it does fully satisfy the mind, or that it will ever do so, but I do assert that wherever it fails in this respect, the reason of the failure must not be sought in the theory itself. It must be sought chiefly in man's nature. I once heard an old man say, "Some folks wouldn't be satisfied if they were right in the kingdom of heaven, at the right hand of Jesus Christ." He said this as a rude, jesting protest against the habit of grumbling, but he touched upon a great, far-reaching truth. With all the religions, and isms, and theories of the past and present, man never has been satisfied, and he who cannot find contentment in Agnosticism will stand a very poor chance to find it elsewhere. The Jews, the chosen people, who were in direct communication with Jehovah, frequently forgot him, and doubted, and got into all sorts of trouble. Christianity, with all its magnificent claims; with its redeemer who died for all mankind, and its promis of an everlasting home in a gold-paved city, fails to meet the demand. Grim Materialism, though not unworthy of respect, stifles the last hope. Positivism can never hope to obtain wide acceptance. The worthiness of its aims is freely acknowledged; but in this age, when the mind of man is constantly expanding and casting off restraints, it is vain to suppose that it will submit to any such Procrustean contrivance. The mind of man will go back beyond the realm of the known in spite of him, and the return vibration will carry it forward beyond the known. Notwithstanding Mr. Harrison's ridicule of the Unknowable, if man can find no consolation therein in the hour of death, it is growing less likely every day that he will ever turn to his fellow-man for it, even the collectiv "Great Being." Man can and will sympathize with his brother till the grave is reached, but there his power ends. In this late day, when the sentiment of worship is fading from the minds of men; when the evolution of ethics is admitted to be going on side by side with the evolution of organism; when the struggle for the separation of morality and religion is going on side by side with the struggle for the separation of church and state, it is a poor time to preach any dogmatic religion, however mild or modified, or wherever its deity may be placed. It is a poor time to preach any system which holds that any sort of religion is necessary to make good men and women, or to make them happy.

Spiritualism offers too few attractions to ever become the universal religion. It will never be a religion at all, and, so far as I know, it does not pretend to be. As a subject of scientific research, it will excite some interest, but there is nothing in it to rouse lasting enthusiasm. Even if our departed friends do liv and send us messages assuring us that they are happy, and telling us to liv good lives, what of it? Men hav already learned that hope and happiness are increased by the cultivation and extension of virtue, justice, and brotherly love, and no voice from beyond the grave can tell them anything better, whether it comes from a ghost or a god. No prayers are needed, no worship is required. I would not go across the street to receive the most wonderful mediumistic communication ever sent. I hav no desire to receive positiv knowledge at present, whether I shall hav a continued existence or sink to eternal unconsciousness at death. Possibly neither fate is in store. This is the reason I am not anxious to pierce the veil. Sleep and the struggle for existence take so much of the time, and there are so many mines of knowledge to explore, so many acts of love to do for my neighbor, I know that "this little ray called life" will be darkened long before my work is done; then if there is a continued life, I shall know it without the aid of a medium. It would take something more than "written communications" on slates, and caresses of "childish fingers" in "dark circles," to convince me that the "loved ones" were really present. It is not exceedingly improbable that a man who has reached Spiritualism by way of several other isms, may yet come to accept the teachings of "Oahspe." Mr. Harrison assures us with great emphasis that Agnosticism is not a religion, and he is right, though he was doubtless disappointed to find that he was not disputed on this point. In his imaginary dialog, his characters say: "You men of science hav routed our priests and hav silenced our old teachers. What religious faith do you giv us in its place?" This is the same question that Christians ask, and is founded on the same erroneous assumption, viz., that whenever a God is dethroned, some thing, person, or ghost must be taken up and apotheosized. Man is daily becoming more fully aware that he needs no God, no religion. Men hav lived without religion in the past, and they will again. The Chinese, a large and populous nation, with a civilization and literature, existed contentedly for centuries and prospered in a marked degree, without a religion. Confucianism was not a religion. The Chinese people honored and venerated Confucius as an extraordinary man for his great services to his country, but they never deified him. There was never anything mythical or miraculous about him or his works, and he was never worshiped in anything like the Theistic or Positivistic sense; neither did he ever teach any religion. It may be objected here that a condition of things which would well serve a stolid, conservativ people like the Chinese, would not do for the activ, speculativ, investigating descendants of the Aryan race; but I think the case may be fitly stated by saying that the former had not yet reached the religious stage of thought, except in a low, primitiv form, and the latter are now emerging from it. Mr. Spencer speaks of religious sentiment in connection with the "Infinit and Eternal Energy," but of course no one will suppose he uses the word religious in anything like the theological sense, as he explains that he simply means that whatever components of religious sentiment survive (and some will survive) will "appropriate to the consciousness of a mystery that cannot be fathomed, and a power that is omnipresent."

Mr. Andrews says: "It is the flower of the old theology that it givs to man the high dignity of being a co-worker together with God, a partner in the concern, instead of a mere lackey." That may be a flower, but if so, it is a very dingy and malodorous one. Let those who will, wear it in their buttonhole, but I would rather be a lackey in the service of "that great stream of creativ power, unlimited in space or in time, of which humanity is a transitory product," than a partner with any one of the multitude of vicious, revengeful, fickle-minded gods of the past or present.

Mr. Andrews says that Mr. Spencer has nothing "very specific to suggest for men to do." That is true, and doubtless the reason is that he considered it would be useless to do so. It is rather late for either man or God to suggest anything "very specific" for men to do. Men neglected the commands of Jehovah; they only nominally practice the teachings of Christ and his apostles, past and present, and they will not follow the canons of Comte. Theology givs man something to do. He is to work out his salvation, but he is to do it with "fear and trembling." I despise laziness, but I would rather sit in everlasting idleness than accept employment on those terms. If evolution has raised mankind to its present condition without conscious concert of action, I see no reason why it should cease to raise it, in like manner, still higher in the future. Under all systems, the narrow grave has always been the gloomy portal to a world of mystery, and there is no indication that it will ever be otherwise. There may be something better than Agnosticism, but it seems to me that, aside from direct, present joys, I can derive as much pleasure and contentment from the contemplation of future, exalted humanity, when the last bond of superstition shall hav been broken, when vice and crime and sorrow shall hav passed away, when governments shall cease to be, because they are unnecessary, and love, virtue, and justice shall cover the earth, as I can from any other system of faith or philosophy. In the mean time let us hav more light, if it is to be had. It will be seen that I restrict the word, "religion," to its proper sphere. It has done much illegitimate duty of late, with an effect the reverse of beneficial. As long as we use the word with the looseness of application now prevalent, so long will the church hold that morality is dependent on theology; and this doctrin, continuously dinned into the wavering minds of the masses, will hold thousands in the thrall of the church who would otherwise come out into the light of Freethought.

An Evil Under the Sun.

Wherever three or more American citizens are gathered together, there is a demand for more statute-making in the midst of them. Statute, I say, not law. For it is a grand truth that ought to be burnt upon every heart and brain that "Man cannot make a law. All he can do is to ascertain what the law of the subject really is;" and then by his little statutes and devices smooth the way for its exercise. A vast amount of crime, bloodshed, and ruin, with confusion and vexation infinit, could be avoided if mankind knew this for the truth and would observe it. The man who first uttered that grand discovery deserves immortality in the memory of our race. Like the Sermon on the Mount, like when "he wrote in sand," like Paul's sermon on charity, and Jefferson's declaration, it has been proclaimed; like them it will take ages of bloodshed and blind groping ere it shall win universal consent. It is Buckle who says (I believe), "About ninety-nine per cent of the time of modern legislators has been consumed in undoing the evils of their predecessors." The other, the one per cent, is used in doing more mischief for futurity to reform. He could not hav regarded our American Congress, for almost all its time has been occupied in passing laws, or disputing about the interests of a very small number of American citizens, slave-holders, monopolists, or manufacturers. It was Calhoun, the greatest statesman and purest character of any age, the most misunderstood of his own, who rebuked the Senate, telling them "all their time and care and talk was employed for banks, bankers, manufacturers. Session after session was for Wall street; not one hour for the people."

Much has been said by correspondents about prohibition. I object to all such statute-making as contrary to law—to the nature of things. Your statutes never yet made men sober or moral. "Prohibition by law," as it is called, stops temperance agitation; meanwhile a new generation grows up "who knew not Joseph;" a generation of tipplers or beer-guzzlers, and you hav the experience of Maine or Ohio repeated.

So with statutes about gaming, lotteries, etc. Gambling suppressed here breaks out there. By the lawless meddling of Congress to suppress lotteries, the evil is acquiring so much skill to its conductors that it bids fair to become a grand institution. Gaming is not a vice in itself any more than tasting liquor is, but becomes so by indulgence. When legislatures begin brutally to treat these dispositions as crimes, the only effect is to drive to secret and low-down practices, or to ingenious evasions. Wisdom, then, would seek to regulate and prevent all evil so far as possible. There is much silly talk about "games of chance," "the evil of risking," etc.; but every man that plants a tree, sows a rood of ground, buys a lot or bit of land, starts a business, or makes any movement towards bettering his condition, is running a chance or risk. We are gamblers by our very natures. Let, then, our legislatures regulate the lottery system by stringent law, just as they do banking, etc. Let officers be appointed, examiners, etc., and arrange it so that it shall be as fair as any business. Gaming is driven to low-down hells, and to some remarkable evasions. One evasion has just begun its career that bids fair to defraud the people out of thousands of dollars where an honest, regulated lottery took one dollar. Never can it be suppressed or meddled with so long as the little freedom left us remains. Fanatics and tyrants must put the nation under a kind of martial law to stop it. They would do it, but will we submit? See what disgraceful deeds are done about obscene literature, what tyranny, what outrages, all to try to suppress what our enlightened public opinion, aided by village and city police and refusal by government to carry, would hav effectually extirpated. And the agitation would hav been wholesome. We must save ourselvs. Nor Christ, nor Comstock, nor law can do it. Freethinkers know this; men of principles, grounded on a solid faith in them, cannot doubt where to stand in such a case. Society becomes utterly effete where all is done for it. We cannot be perfect, but the trial to become better brings us toward perfection. Who does not see that the world becomes better in profession, but worse in secret practice? No visible wrong is tolerated, but a world of secret iniquity is done. There is a cause for this, and that is because virtue, honor, and truth are left to the statute. Society is too refined and good for a fair, stand-up fight or boxing, therefore assassination, murder, are common; it is too holy to tolerate lawful gaming, therefore the lowest hells overflow, or human genius devises frauds most stupendous. We are far too nice to regulate that bane of humanity, strong drink, by licensing keepers under heavy bonds and penalties for order, sobriety, care; therefore the miserable drunkard buys whiskey by the gallon, and little children stagger through the alleys with bottles in pockets. Fools advise and knaves legislate. Than one single legislativ enactment nothing on earth should be more solemn. Think of it—"law!" It sounds of the infinit. Millions of suppliants in vain extend their arms. In vain, "for the law hath said it." As a prelude to its enactment there should be long discussions and solemn assemblages. And yet Congress or a state legislature shall not hav sat a week ere several thousand acts are proposed and possibly hundreds passed. It is a fearful thing to see a people thus utterly abandon themselvs to evil.

Read the old constitutions framed by the very men who founded these states. See what they say of crimes and statutes. Ah! they were statesmen versed in history, human nature, and legal learning. Either so, or they were ignorant and we are wise.

Oregon, Mo. HOLT.

The Liberal Club.

It was a warm night. Anything short of the strongest theological term would fail to express the fervency of the heat. The Liberal Club audience, which gathered for the 343d time, came in slowly and wearily until it numbered about one hundred persons. It was the first meeting of the season. Mr. Wakeman, who appeared in less robust health than usual, called the assembly to order, and the assistant secretary perspired the minutes of the previous meeting. A delegate from the club (which is the Sixth New York Liberal League) to the Liberal League Congress was next appointed, and Mr. Wakeman was authorized to select more. Mr Cohn was appointed a committee of one to see that the meetings of the club were appropriately advertised. Mr. Wakeman and the delegate, W. T. Doty ("W. T. D." of Man), then took their departure for Cassadaga. The question of raising money to pay the delegate's expenses afforded an opportunity for Dr. Foote, Jr. to suggest a collection to get the cents of the meeting, but it was not improved, and Mr. Andrews took the chair.

Louis F. Post had been put down on the card for the lecture of the evening, the subject to be Ben Butler; but Mr. Post had been rushed around so by other business that he had had no time to prepare his lecture, and as the weather was too hot for him to think on his feet, he wished to be excused from saying anything. A motion was put and carried that his lecture be deferred until the first of October, and that he now proceed with his remarks. Anything to start a discussion would be acceptable. Mr. Post thereupon took up the tariff question as dealt with by the Republican and Democratic platforms. The Republicans, he said, came out squarely and demanded protection. The Democrats toyed with the question like the farmer who saw something in the bushes, and could not tell what it was. He thought he would fire at it so as to hit it if it was a deer, and miss it if it was a calf. The tariff plank in the Democratic platform means free trade if you are a free trader, and protection if you are not. Mr. Post held that protectiv tariff benefited the capitalist instead of the laboring man, and that the Republican party was hypocritical and dishonest in claiming to hav at heart the interests of the workingmen whose votes it solicited. The protectiv tariff should be abolished.

Robert Blissert, the Broadway tailor, having previously announced his intention of confuting Mr. Post altogether, took the platform with alacrity when that gentleman left it. He said he was sorry to see an American citizen "make himself so absurd" as Mr. Post had done in advocating free trade. It filled him with such astonishment as words were totally unable to express. They had free trade in England, and workmen there did not earn half as much as American laborers. Landlords, Mr. Blissert contended, were responsible for the tribulations of mankind, and, as he formulated the sentence, "they should be made to disgorge the robbery they hav perpetrated upon the people." The speaker added that better cloth was manufactured in Massachusetts than could be made in any other part of the world. In America he could hav meat three times a day; in England he had it set before him but one time per diem, and was damned glad to get that.

Mrs Leonard spoke next and showed considerable familiarity with the subject. She could remember when the question of high tariff was first brought up. Sugar could then be bought for three cents per pound; now it cost eleven The benefit to the consumer was not apparent. Better dress goods were manufactured in America than in England. Therefore, if American and English goods were put upon the market cn the same terms, we should soon clothe England as well as feed her.

Mr. Cohen held that the tariff question alone would not affect the prosperity of a people. Hard times had visited countries under both policies. Wages are higher here than in Europe, but more people are out of work. It did not benefit a man any to hav sugar selling at four cents a pound if he couldn't get the four cents. A dollar would do him no good if he had no way of possessing himself of the dollar. Woman suffragists ought to vote for Butler. Mr. Cohen speaks vigorously. His gesticulations represent a large expenditure of physical force. He did not spare himself on account of the heat, and at the end of fifteen minutes the perspiration ran down his glistening countenance like condensed steam on a pane of glass, and dropped industriously from his chin.

Mr. King was loudly called for. This gentleman is becoming a favorit orator with the workingmen, and is generally secured as the leading speaker at their mass meetings. He has a voice like a trumpet, and there is hardly a place in the city where a crowd can be collected so large that people on its outskirts cannot hear him when he is delivering a speech. In a quiet locality he could, in fact, be heard much further than he could be seen. He is also a thinker as well as an agitator, taking his Socialistic theories more from John Stuart Mill than from the hotter-headed and less deliberativ political economists. When it shall please the workingmen to put one of their own number into the halls of Congress, they will perhaps find no one who can better voice their rights and wrongs than Mr. King. This is said because Mr. King has a great head, and talents that would win him distinction in a larger sphere than any in which they hav as yet been displayed. He took a broad and philosophical view of the tariff question, and argued that logical protection should protect the laborer as well as the capitalist. This achieved, both would then be ready for free trade. He adduced statistics gathered by the Central Labor Union showing that on account of the enforced idleness of many American workingmen, wages averaged lower in this country than in England.

Mrs. S. Myra Hall thought that the question of the tariff should not be considered wholly as to its effect on the American people. Other hearts might suffer.

Young Dr. Foote, between whose personal hight and that of Mr. King there is great disparity, argued the around-the-world view. When he came to the meeting he was inclined to be a protectionist. The question as presented by the previous speakers had given him an inclination in the opposit direction. Free trade in America, though it might for a time affect us injuriously, must hav a correspondingly beneficial effect on European labor. The doctor's speech was unsullied by a pun.

Mr. Andrews said he was glad to hear the question of free trade and protection argued from a planetary point of view. He adverted to the restriction of Chinese immigration. Could we afford to allow ourselvs to be overrun by the hordes of celestials which an open port would invite? Mrs. Hall here introduced the brilliant suggestion that we might swarm to China as fast as the Chinamen would swarm here. Mr. Andrews did not think the rush from America to China would take the form of a stampede. The question to be settled was whether, having made this a desirable country to liv in, we should throw it open to let the "rats" of the Eastern Hemisphere come here, or whether by protecting ourselvs we shall continue to improve and let the beneficent effects of our influence go abroad. As for the differences between labor and capital, there is no attempt being made to settle the question scientifically by finding out what is in truth and right the price to be paid for a day's work. Josiah Warren and a few followers had been the only men to approach the subject. Their works were out of print. Mr. Andrews thought he should from time to time publish something bearing on the labor question in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Mr. Albright, a stranger, from England, twelve weeks in this country, made a speech in favor of free trade. The workingmen of England favored free trade in that country, and the capitalists of England favored protection. Laboring men here might draw some inferences from these facts. Many of Mr. Blissert's statements, the speaker said, were erroneous. Whisky was neitner so good nor so cheap here as in the mother country. Sugar was three cents per pound there, and eight or ten cents here. Other things, barring meat, tobacco, and a few other luxuries, were correspondingly low-priced. Mr. Albright was catechized freely by Messrs. King, Blissert, and Post, but their questions seemed to please rather than disconcert him, and served only to furnish him an opportunity to make his points clearer. This gentleman speaks United States with an English accent, and is somewhat discursiv in style. He makes a very acceptable speech, however, and as a representativ of English labor and Freethought is a valuable correctiv to those who are inclined to compare America with Europe on a basis of ignorance as to what the condition of the Eastern laborer really is.

Mr. Post closed the debate with a short speech. The discussion, he said, had taken a direction different from what he had anticipated. He merely wished to present the tariff question to the Liberal Club as the Republican and Democratic platforms had placed it before the people. He was glad, however, that China had been mentioned. That country had a wall around it, and admitted neither labor nor the product of labor. That was "logical" protection. The whole thing was artificial and an evil. Mr. Post will present the claims of Mr. Butler further on.

So ended the first fall meeting of the Liberal Club. If the hot weather had gone with the summer, the gathering would hav been larger. The next meeting cannot fail to be an attractiv one, as Mr. Shook has promised to advocate the claims of Mr. Cleveland to the suffrages of the members of the Liberal Club, and Mr. Shook is a most interesting person.

Notes.

AT least one hundred American newspapers, says the New York World, hav published that Professor Tyndall, one of the most noted of scientists, does not know the year of his birth. If Professor Tyndall really is in this state of ignorance as to the day of his nativity, he will find by reference to THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 1884 that the exact date is August 21, 1820.

MR. POTTER, of the Index, finds it impossible for him to cast his vote for either of the party candidates. The public record of Blaine frightens him, and the private character of Cleveland shocks him. This calls to mind again the remark of the darkey who, when told that there were two roads, one leading to destruction and the other to everlasting perdition, said, "If dat is de case, dis nigger takes to de woods."

THE statements of the Christian Advocate are sometimes pervaded with error. For instance, the editor says: "No new arguments against Christianity hav been formulated. Ingersoll, and Paine, his prototype, were answered when Christianity was only a young giant of two centuries of growth." This is not true. New arguments against Christianity are found in nearly every new fact discovered, and the old ones hav never been explained away. They hav been replied to, and the Bible apologized for, but they hav not been answered. If any refutation either of Paine or Ingersoll is extant, the Advocate will save the clergy a good deal of labor and embarrassment by reproducing it.

THE superstitions of Christianity (if we may adapt an expression from a religious paper) hav not been able to take the place of a belief in witchcraft. Sorcery has been charged against people of this country even recently; and in the island of Mauritius in the Indian Ocean within a year, young children hav been kidnapped and tortured, and in some cases killed, that their blood might be used in sorcerous incantations. The London Times tells of a man "named Picot, who was tried by the British authorities of that island, and condemned to death. He told his judges that they could never hang him, so great were his magical powers. And his word has come true. The house of the chief judge has been haunted by spirits. Stones were mysteriously thrown in all directions; no watchers could discover the human allies; the judge's lady was almost frightened to death; and so great was the strain upon the magistrate himself that he pleaded with the executiv council for the murderer's life."

GEORGE CHAINEY'S lecture, "My Religious Experience," delivered before the Spiritualists at Cassadaga Lake recently, is published in full by the Banner of Light. In his prefatory remarks Mr. Chainey said:

"The last time I lectured on this subject I thought I should never do so again. It seems to be presenting myself to your attention as the subject of a personal interest which I by no means feel. Still, having already given it to the world at that stage of my life when I had no certain hope, nor faith, nor knowledge that life continues beyond the grave, under fairer and better conditions than here, I find myself compelled, by what I hav learned and felt here on this beautiful campground, to recall it for revision. The time has come for another chapter, and this time I hav no idea it will be the last. I am like one who has written a letter to a friend and signed it 'Yours till death,' and then reopens it and signs it, 'Yours always and forever.'"

This lecture will prove interesting reading to those who hav undergone, or expect to undergo, a similar mutation.

THE religious papers will hav their little joke, and several are getting a good deal of fun out of the following, put forward by a Baptist journal:

"A Presbyterian doctor of divinity traces the office of the eldership back to Adam. Then the world was ruined by a Presbyterian elder and his wife."

A Presbyterian paper picks this up and adds:

"The church was organized after the fall, and Adam was the first person admitted into it. He started the church of redeemed humanity on the Presbyterian model. If he had been a Presbyterian elder before this time, he never would hav fallen."

Here a Congregationalist editor steps in and argues:

"The truth lies between the two. If Adam had not fallen, he would not hav become a Presbyterian elder. Wherefore the Presbyterian church is founded on his fall."

A plausible view is that Adam was an elder before the fall, if ever, and that, being an elder, a fall was the most natural consequence. If there is any among the elders discussing this subject who thinketh he standeth, let him take heed lest he fall.

An Idle Day.

DEAR GENE: The close of my letter last week left me in Portland, Me., with a ticket in my possession for Houlton, Aroostook county, and an eminently pious Scotchman trying to keep me in sight. Scotchmen are humorous fellows. This one bought a postal card at Portland, and mailed to his family in Brooklyn the glad tidings that he had reached the present stage of his journey without accident. After the card was deposited in the letter-box, he happened to recollect that some of his relativs or friends might read in the papers an account of the Franconia's collision with the Rhode Island, and knowing he sailed on the former boat be apprehensiv for the safety of his life and limb. He therefore sent a second card, assuring the anxious ones of what he forgot to mention in the other—namely, that he still lived. When he had started this on its journey he told me what he had done. My remark that his relativs would probably infer the contents of the second card upon receiving the first kept him in deep thought for half an hour. Then light broke in upon him, and he acknowledged that perhaps that was so. Seated in the cars, the old chap mumbled a short prayer, but he happened to look up at its close, and saw a one-legged boy coming with his hat in his hand asking alms. He resumed the prayer until the boy had passed us. I joggled him considerably in making my contribution, but his devotions were not to be interrupted. In justice to the man I will state that on the return trip he gave the boy something.

A ride upon a train of cars has little of interest in it either to recount or to experience, so I will say that about half-past four o'clock we brought up in the outskirts of Houlton, Maine. The New Brunswick railroad, from Vanceboro to Woodstock, is by all odds the roughest, and the cars the slovenliest, of anything of the kind I know of. The editor of the Aroostook Times speaks of "riding over the smooth rails and in the commodious cars" of this road. The disparity between his opinion and mine on this subject, I take it, represents the difference between a free pass and a ticket bought and paid for.

I said we brought up at Houlton. The road ends there on a pile of cedar logs, with one or two projecting above the rails in order to keep the train from running off in case the roughness of the road should throw the engineer out of the cab before arriving there. Houlton village, when I reached it just after a three weeks' rain, reminded me of a lot of magnified children's blocks stuck helter-skelter into the mud. Its buildings are many of them large and new, but there is no order about them. Each was an independent island in a sea of mud. Houlton is the capital of Aroostook county; has some three thousand population; supports two weekly newspapers, and one copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Large numbers of lumbermen rendezvous here, while the east branch of the Meduxnekeag furnishes water-power and a word which few people can pronounce without practice. Four political banners depended from ropes strung across the principal streets. One was for Blaine and Logan and the Republican party; another for Cleveland and Hendricks and the Democratic party; a third for St. John and Daniel and Prohibition; while a fourth bore the inscription "E Pluribus Unum," and went in for general results. The last belonged to a hotel-keeper who evidently had little prejudice as to party, but great faith in the ultimate destiny of America.

The first curiosity I met with was a $3 bill, received in making change. I had never seen one before. They are published in New Brunswick, and are said to be frequently met with among the wealthy.

My arrival at Houlton by no means completed the journey upon which I had set out, Oakfield Plantation, down on the maps as "No. 5, Range 3," being my objectiv point. Perhaps this is as good a place as any to say that the county of Aroostook is somewhere near the size of the state of Massachusetts, containing about 6,800 square miles of territory, cut up into ranges. The ranges are subdivided into towns and plantations. The towns hav names; some of the plantations hav none. Those not so distinguished are known by their number and range. One point of difference between a town and a plantation is that the latter is not liable for any damages which may come about through defect in the roads. This relieves it of a grave responsibility, for the thoroughfares are many of them dangerously rough. Between Houlton and Oakfield I could not learn that there was any public conveyance, but I discovered that a stage for the town of Patten in Penobscot county went in the general direction in which I was headed, so I threw up my valise to the driver and climbed aboard. I had in view the residence of an uncle of ours who years ago pushed his way into the wilderness of the Aroostook and hewed a house and a farm out of its woods. More than twenty years since, when he lived in an older part of the state, and when the Civil war had robbed us of our paternal support, this man took me in charge and gave me a year and a half of excellent bringing up. I hav always remembered him with feelings of gratitude limited only by my capacity to be grateful. I had not seen him before for a dozen years or more, but when, as I bumped along beside the stage-driver, I saw a man driving down the road toward us, I was not long in recognizing our respected relativ. He had started at three o'clock in the morning and driven somewhere between fifteen and twenty miles through the mud almost before sunrise. He took me home with him, and the ride there was the pleasantest part of my journey.

Being a man who has all his life lived in the woods, except when he emerged therefrom with a musket on his shoulder to help put down the Rebellion, I presume our uncle would not prefer to hav me talk much about him. But let me say that I found him to be a Freethinker; a close reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER; an ardent admirer of Ingersoll, whom he hopes to help to vote into the presidential chair of this nation; well versed in the Bible and in the history of the United States; and full to the brim of rare anecdotes such as were never printed and probably never will be. His repertory is inexhaustible, and rich with parable and simile. I don't think he invites religious discussion with his Christian neighbors, with whom he is apparently on the best of terms; but when any one shows a desire for that sort of recreation he has a "bear charge" ready for him.

I spent nearly four weeks in Oakfield Plantation. It is six miles square, largely devoted to the cultivation of woods and lakes, and contains some five or six hundred inhabitants. The local bard, Capt. John Maxwell, an adolescent octogenarian, has immortalized it thus:

> "Oakfield is a pretty place,
> It lies within a fairy vale;
> The lofty mountains at the south
> Protect it from the southern gale."

Whether this is the whole of the captain's tribute to the place I am unable to say. Perhaps his muse rested here, and maybe this is only the auspicious beginning of a lengthy poem. These four verses I found in a young lady's album, and afterward heard them from the captain's lips, illustrated with appropriate gestures. Off to the west, Mt. Katahdin rears his five thousand three hundred and eighty-five feet of rock and soil into the air; to the north, barring a little clearing in Smyrna, there are fifty miles of woods—perhaps more. The place is not yet free of wild animals, and occasionally Bruin comes out of the woods to be seen of men and to carry off a sheep, but his habits are retiring, and he runs at the sight of a human being. The night-traveler on lonely roads is still liable to be startled by the snort and plunge into the woods of this sort of animal. I met none of them; but it is told of a young schoolma'am near by that, proceeding to her daily task one morning, she perceived a bear on the further side of a bridge which she was obliged to cross. She turned and ran back to the house where she was stopping—a distance of a mile and a half—and there fell in a faint. What the bear did is not recorded, but an old settler whom I met made a mental calculation with regard to his probable action in the matter. He estimated that the bear ran in the opposit direction twice as fast as the girl, so that by the time she stopped running, maiden and Bruin were just four and one-half miles apart. This story is a true one, as I can testify, having seen the schoolma'am, who proved to be an engaging young person.

Religious enthusiasm does not run high in Oakfield. "The sound of the church-going bell" these valleys and hills never heard. Feeble attempts to start a Sunday-school in the district school-house were remarked; but, as a western correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER has stated it, they were unable to "make the riffle." The meetings afford the young people an opportunity to ride out together, but here the attraction ends. The two denominations best represented are Second Adventist and Hardshell (or Potatobug) Baptist. The one amounts to little; the other to nothing at all. Last winter the Baptists attempted a revival, though I do not know that any one was converted. A certain man distinguished for his swearing ability came near to it, but fell short of the goal. He requested prayers one evening, and no attention was paid by the revivalist to his petition. The next day he was met by a neighbor, and asked if he should renew his application. "No, by lightning," said he, "I shan't. Last night," he continued, "I was ready to be converted, and if the elder had buckled down to it and prayed for me like a man, he would hav got me; but by thunder he can't get me to-day;" and he remains dead in his sins up to this time. I hav here substituted "lightning" and "thunder" for the more theological terms employed by this man of grief.

A conspicuous industry, if so it may be called, of the farmers of Maine, is the culture of honey-bees. I spent some little time observing the customs and habits of these industrious insects. There is a class of overgrown individuals among them known as "drones;" and I had it explained to me that these were the "ministers," resembling that variety of human beings both in their idle habits and in that function for which clergymen hav made themselvs pre-eminently distinguished. (See Col. Billings's "Recapitulation" in "Crimes of Preachers.") When the workers among the bees discover that the drone is no longer of service to them, he is incontinently ejected and made to shift for himself. It is not yet too late to learn something even of bees. The influence which a preacher's name exerts here, I expect, is not judged to be beneficial. To illustrate, a man had a dog which he wished might grow up an honor to his name, and as one whose follies should cease with his youth, and whose age should not add stupidity to ignorance He therefore named him Nanton, after a local preacher so distinguished. The pup, previously black, thereupon began to turn gray. That color not being to the liking of the owner, the dog's name was changed to that of Ridley, another preacher of the vicinity, and thenceforth everything which the dog ate made him sick, and there was no health in him. Ministerial cognomens were then abandoned and the name of Winfield Scott substituted, since when the dog has become one of the likeliest pups in the Aroostook, and promises to be all that his owner expected of him from the first. This narrativ is vouched for and often repeated by the proprietor of the dog.

While the people of this new country are not ardent supporters of religious denominations, their educational institutions are something to be proud of. The schoolhouse is found everywhere, and usually with school in session. This speaks well for the future of Maine. Oakfield is not behind in placing woman where she belongs. The supervisor (or superintendent) of schools in that plantation is a woman—a woman, too, of judgment, intelligence, and executiv ability, who shows signs of working a sort of civil service reform among teachers. I hope the people of the place will not allow her to resign. A man can't do the work properly which devolves upon a supervisor of schools, because the first thing he has to do is to examin female applicants for the position of teacher. Around here these are young and good-looking. When one of them comes into the presence of the committeeman, brushes up against him, and asks for a certificate of moral character and good scholarship, his first impulse is to smile winningly, hand over the certificate, and ask if there isn't something else he can do for her. I hav reflected on the matter and know how it would be with me, and I never yet heard of a man refusing a girl a certificate under such circumstances. If he was a gentleman, how could he? But when the examining committee is a woman, of course the applicant cannot work that so-called "racket." Hence I believe a woman is here in what is pre-eminently her proper sphere.

A word about farming in the Aroostook. The soil offers good inducements to intelligent workers. The land is good and can be bought cheap. Five hundred dollars will buy all the land one man would need, including house and barn. A farm in Oakfield, containing one hundred and thirty or forty acres, is for sale at that price. The soil is good. This looks to me much like finding land. Potatoes are a staple product, and find a ready market at the numerous starch factories everywhere building. Wheat and oats shoot up until stumps and fences are lost sight of. I believe that labor here is not now as intelligently directed as it might be. There is room for improvement in the current style of farming, especially in its esthetic features, if it can be said to hav any. "Damn the looks!" seems to be the harvester's refrain. The people work hard, and are old while they are yet young. They do not yet realize that a boat overloaded will sink. The folks here are so generous and hospitable in their style of entertaining a stranger that it is something like ingratitude for me to criticise their methods of agriculture; and I would not even allow what I hav said to go into print except with the accompanying statement that whatever of neatness is lacking in the men out-doors is offset by the tidiness of the women in the house. That has passed into proverb, and goes without saying.

Perhaps you would like to know whether we felt the earthquake shock. No, we did not. A short distance from where I was staying, a man was drawing in or raking hay most of the time with a horse that had the cheerful habit of reaching up occasionally and lifting the railing off the hay-rigging with its hind foot; and in another direction the champion swearer of the Aroostook was also at work, and doing his best to lower the record. An earthquake that could assert itself in the midst of the excitement arising from these sources would hav spread Katahdin all over the county.

My letter has assumed such magnitude (in the way of space occupied) that I must bring it to an abrupt close. There is much I could say of Maine, its vast territory, its 3,200 square miles of rivers and lakes, and the unpronounceable names of them; its grand woods, and, above all, its splendid people. But other matter of more importance than anything I could write is knocking for admittance to the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER; and so when your readers reach this point they will hav heard the last of my "Idle Day." Your affectionate brother,

GEORGE MACDONALD.

Our London Letter.

On Sunday evening last Mr. Charles Watts gave his final lecture in London before leaving for the States, the subject being "Secularism Proved to be Superior to Christianity." Previous to its delivery, Mrs. Watts recited a poem entitled, "The God-horror," written by a Freethinker known more generally under his nom de plume of "Lara." The audience was also favored with piano forte selections both before and after the lecture. As a rule, Freethought lecturers seem somewhat averse to introducing music, though, for my part, I am rather in favor of Mr. Watts's method; and from the manner in which the pianist is received, it would appear that the majority of the audience is of the same way of thinking as myself.

The lecture, which took about an hour to deliver, was about the best I hav heard given by Mr. Watts; but, as doubtless it will be given by him in America, it will be superfluous on my part to giv any detailed account of it. At its close, opponents were as usual invited to make any comments or show up the faulty arguments, and but one was found who had anything to offer against the discourse; but as it turned out that he had no belief in the existence of the gospel Christ, and merely wished to say that there were some very good maxims in the Bible, those who anticipated a lively discussion were doomed to disappointment.

Our friend had some little difficulty in getting away from the hall, as so many of those who had repeatedly heard him were anxious to bid him farewell, and wish him good-speed and a speedy return. He has certainly made himself extremely popular in this country, and can command a good audience on a day when the thermometer stands considerably high, when most people are only too anxious to get into the country to find out what fresh air is like. That he will meet with a good reception in your country almost goes without saying, judging from his past experience there. His friends here only hope he will not get treated too well amongst you, and thereby be induced to take up his residence in America.

Owing to the intensely hot weather, probably, Christian hostilities hav ceased to a very considerable extent, and the champions of the church show no activ desire to defend themselvs or attack Freethinkers, and consequently the propaganda goes on rather more slowly than during the winter months. The holiday number of Mr. Foote's paper, the Freethinker, might be considered pretty well as "blasphemous" as the number for publishing which he was prosecuted, but no steps appear to hav been taken to suppress it. Perhaps they intend to leave this one to see if the God they profess to worship will do anything himself to avenge his outraged honor; but, if he is the perfect and powerful being he is represented to be, he will surely not be possessed of vanity enough to feel insulted by ridicule. I can never understand how anyone can possibly, after a perusal of the Bible, call the God therein depicted, omnipotent, omnipresent, omniscient, loving, good, beneficent, or in possession of any of those attributes we call virtues. It certainly requires that singleness of eye possessed by Christians, which I imagin must be a kind of semi-blindness, to find anything worth reverencing in that being depicted in the book which has been facetiously called "the secret of England's greatness."

I trust the convention shortly to be held may prove a grand success. J. D.

A Reminiscence of the Co-operativ Movement of '48-'52 in France.

Our Gallic brother-artisans hav had to meet peculiar difficulties from the law prohibiting or restricting very narrowly public assemblages. Several years after the declaration of the present republic, Le Devoir, a paper devoted to the co-operativ principle, was still protesting against this arbitrary barrier. In '48, however, democratic enthusiasm swept over it under the fiat lux. Then numerous associations of the trades sprang into existence. Napoleon "le petit" has a dark record in history, but the blackest of his crimes is his perfidy toward the labor movement of co-operation whose principle he had pretended to espouse in a work written during his imprisonment. He crushed in the bud, by his military and civil police, the most hopeful germ of true humanity that France has known.

We translate from Victor Hennequin, a representativ in the French legislature of 1851, a communication to the Democratie Pacifique:

VISIT TO THE LEATHER DRESSERS.

On the 8th of September, one of our colleagues, Michel Boutel, who, before his election as a representativ of the people, had practiced the trade of a joiner, accompanied me with another friend to the Association of Leather Dressers, Rue de la Terrasse, 40, aux Batignolles.

Crossing the front of the building, where its offices are kept, and a pleasant garden spot annexed, we came to the large workshop adorned with hides, smooth or grained, varnished, black or fawn-colored. Several strong men, bare-chested, were scraping hides with the backs of their knives. They received us cordially; we felt ourselvs at once in spmpathy with these children of toil. Laborers of Paris, emancipated by association, spontaneously assume the tone that becomes free men. No ceremonious humility nor flattery; neither on the other hand stiffness nor rudeness, but the dignity of a fraternal candor.

Here most of the workmen kept on with their respectiv tasks, but talked freely with us. Others offered us their escort. I résumé what they told us in walking through the rooms. Their association has a retail store. They began with the year '49, and seventy-four workmen, who, leaving their bosses, and thus divorced from capital, invoked of the co-operativ principle, the dignity of liberty. Government refused them a share in the funds voted by the Constituent Assembly in favor of associated workmen. The seventy-four hardly mustered among them 2,700 francs, and tools valued at 3,300 francs. Workmen without a boss met distrust in the market. They had to pay cash down for every hide. They incurred, like all the associations, political mistrust; accused, and with reason, of being thorough-going republicans, which then compromised men seriously. Their rooms were twice searched by the police.

They constituted a reserve fund from ten per cent of each member's daily earnings. Sixty-eight outside members, having signed the statutes, contribute the same, in awaiting such arrangements as should unite them at work with the others. A third class of affiliates had paid in each fifty francs, and had a deliberativ voice in the sessions of the body.

Advancing into the workshop, we meet the statue of the Republic, with crowns laid at its feet. This fairy who protected laborers has been paralyzed by the wicked one, "the Reaction."*

ALLOTMENT TO CAPITAL.

All associates, leaving with the Society funds in excess of the first one hundred francs, which is never returned, receive, like other creditors, deeds of stock bearing interest at five per cent a year, transmissible by indorsement, exchangeable at the Society depot for products or money.

Ten per cent withheld from earnings to build up the societary capital are set down to the credit of each, and may be withdrawn after giving twelve months' notice. This constitutes a check to hasty and capricious abandonment.

RELATIONSHIP OF GROUPS IN THE SERIES.

The association were embracing experimentally, upon a small scale, shoemaking, saddlery, trunk-making, and other branches of leather works. Such synthetic growth will advance in ratio to their command of capital if the state leaves them at liberty to develop their organic idea. This radiation, annexation, and incorporation with related industries, if proceeding simultaneously in other departments of labor, will obviate the dependence of laborers upon capitalist owners. Wage slavery will then follow on the heels of its brother, chattel slavery, and the network of association become co-extensiv with human activity.

MODE OF RETRIBUTION.

Article 9 of the statutes: Labor is paid by the piece, the number and importance of pieces being estimated in the award according to rates previously determined. In its application, this rule actually renders an average award of from three to four francs per diem to each workman, about the same amount which they used to receive from their bosses. Their real gain by change of methods is less pecuniary than social. Now, equal in rights, masters of themselvs, safe from arbitrary dismissal, a cheerful pride results from their security. [To these values of sentiment are to be added the pleasures of hope and the disciplin of character. Beyond their control was the viciousness of government that thwarted their enterprise by aggression on their personal liberties. Peasants must till the soil even in the shadow of Vesuvius; but under fair human conditions, the self-denial practiced by these workmen in order to free themselvs at once from debt and from future dependence upon capital other than their own is in itself a cumulativ force, a wealth of character, bearing its reward at once in hope and self-respect. This sinking-fund was, thus, a good investment notwithstanding fate.—TRANS.]

They might share larger dividends were they willing to turn out work of no better quality than when they were hirelings; but now they sacrifice the profit on quantity, or the number of pieces, to quality, in their more perfect execution. Industrial honor, the pride of the artist, the conscience of perfection, are remarkable as a novel and general fact in all workingmen's associations. The importance which the leather-dressers attach to quality is shown by Article 11 of the statutes:

"Stamps devised with a view to the avoidance of fraud shall show the purchaser the relativ worth of every article, with the name of our Society." The associates regard themselvs as the vanguard of liberty's army, and as responsible for her future. Jealous of every reproach, industrial or social, they scrutinize the result of their mutual labor. Ordinary maxims of trade, such as to increase profits by flimsy and rapid production, are revolting to their pride.

As soon as they hav liquidated their debt, or two-thirds of it, they propose an additional distribution of profits per capita, in which their outside contributing members are to share. This association employs none but its own members, and these are all responsible in its solidarity.

DIVIDEND OF SKILL.

Besides the appraisement of piece-work by quality, Article 10 of the statutes reads: "With a view to stimulate and to reward zeal and faculty, this Society registers depositions concerning all inventions and improvements that may be made by members, coupling with their names the premiums decreed to them."

Testimonials of fraternity are conspicuous. Here is a table on which hides are stretched, supplied by the association of billiard table makers—an immense piece of furniture, in which, after long and trying use, the joints are hardly visible. Another table from the marble workers' association. The perfection and luxury of utensils, resulting from industrial pride, become in turn a cause or motiv of attraction. The loyal destination of the fine arts is to embellish and idealize labor. Beauty is the bride of use, though indolent wealth has seduced her and sequestrates her charms in its harem. Here, instead of gilded mirrors, we find varnished sides of leather. Abridging details, however, one thing that we expected to meet with in a leather manufactory was most agreeably absent—stench.

We were also surprised by the ingenious process of dividing hides into two layers by a saw, the outside being the "flower," and the inside, of inferior value, the "crust."

FEATURES OF ORGANIZATION.

This association distributes its members in sections, corresponding to each distinct function in the leather manufacture.

Its administrativ section numbers also directors, salesmen, bookkeepers, etc.

Each section elects its own chiefs, and also its aids, from outside workmen, when such are required. A general council is elected by the collectiv society. Its officers hold their places at the pleasure of a majority.

The chiefs of sections deliberate with the general council once a week. This compound body proposes measures, presents facts, reports experience, but renders no final decisions, ordains nothing, is not a government.

Once a month all the associates deliberate on these reports. Their statutes were passed by the whole body after five month's deliberation. Under its general control the council is not merely a deliberativ assembly, but a group of executiv committees which applies the statutes and manages collectiv interests. Every day they hang upon a nail in the workshop an account of the proceedings for that day—purchases, sales, payments, etc. Every one reads and judges. The chiefs of sections receive just the average award to piece workmen in each of their respectiv sections. Members of the general administration receive the average award to the chiefs of sections.

COLLECTIV CHARITY.

Members become invalid, widows, and orphans, draw regular pensions adequate to their support in ratio direct to the number in such families, and inverse to their capacities for self-support.

Gratuitous education is contemplated. The children of members take precedence for apprenticeships, and are to be paid by the piece as soon as competent. To carry out their views of industrial education, the choice of employments, according to spontaneous vocation, requires a contract of solidarity among several associations for the exchange of apprentices. Otherwise crafts, becoming hereditary, might constitute castes, as in Hindostan. An associativ township will offer to childhood the attractiv spectacle of numerous arts and trades interlocked by the exchange of members, and soliciting the evolution of faculties by sympathy and imitation.

In taking leave of our friends, the leather dressers, we noted a kitchen and refectory, which, by the economy of catering at wholesale rates, supplies three meals with a bottle of wine each time, at twenty cents per diem. EDGEWORTH.

*Of this we speak in a second paper.

Terrible Effects of a Stroke of Lightning.

"Where in the world hav you been, Johnny?"

"Why, I hav just been over to see Mr. Smith's barn. It was struck by lightning this morning, pa."

"So I heard. Did it kill anything?"

"Yes, it killed lots of animals."

"Well, what animals did it kill, my son?"

"It killed—it killed a sheep and two pigs, and a calf, and another sheep, and a goose, and a horse, and a jackass, and a cow, and the preacher, and another jackass, and—"

"Any other animals, my son?"

"Yes; it killed a hog, and a Sunday-school teacher, and another goose."

The Convention.

Mr. Green made a new departure in selecting the place of meeting for this year. Cassadaga Lake is an irregular body of water, in Chautauqua county, several miles in length, but nowhere over a half mile wide. The camp grounds of the Cassadaga Lake Free Association upon its bank comprise many acres, originally wooded land, as is evidenced by the innumerable stumps thickly studding the inhabited portion of the grove. The association is a stock company, selling shares at ten dollars. It is only five years old, but already the members hav erected dozens of cottages, many of them quite beautiful and commodious structures, and other members and visitors are camping out in tents. The Spiritualists' meeting closed the Sunday previous to the opening of the Freethinkers' meeting, but a hundred or so of the attendants remained to listen to the Liberal speakers. The approach to the ground is by the Dunkirk, Allegheny Valley & Pittsburgh road, and a most miserable apology for a railroad it is, with unfrequent trains, uncivil employees, and wretched rolling-stock. The first year or two of the existence of the grounds as a Spiritualist camp, the officials did absolutely nothing, and hav done but little since. Whether they are unfavorable or not to the ideas of the Spiritualists, it is evident that the saving of a dollar is of more consequence in their eyes than the accommodation of the public. It is to be regretted that the efficient Erie service could not be extended to the branch run by the D., A. & P.

The Spiritualist Association generously gave the use of the grounds to the New York State Association of Freethinkers, and also extended the invitation to the National Liberal League. The grounds are well managed, and with the exception of poor hotel accommodations there can be no fault found. A moderate influx of visitors, however, swamped the resources of the manager of the only hostelry within the limits of the camp, and the place must suffer in popularity unless the building and restaurant are improved. But tents and cottages are rented cheap, and in this way the limited number of Liberals who found their way over the beastly D., A. & P. road are comfortably domiciled.

Dr. T. L. Brown, the president of our association, was promptly on hand, bringing with him a huge black canvas on which he had painted a most pointed and excellent motto of the philosopher Thales, joined with that of the Freethinkers, which he hung over the platform. It reads:

U. M. L.

"Avoid doing what you blame in others."—Thales (650 B.C.).

U. M. L. stands for Universal Mental Liberty, but the doctor says it is equally good for the Christians, who can interpret it, "U May Lie, and repent and go to heaven." Mr. Green was also an early arrival, but owing to severe indisposition is able to do but little work, and the activ work of the convention has devolved upon S. P. Putnam and W. S. Bell, members of the Business Committee. Tuesday night an impromptu dance was organized by the remaining Spiritualists, which was attended by some two hundred ladies and gentlemen living on the grounds, or close by. It was a very successful affair in sociability, a regular leap-year party, and, being managed by the ladies, was of course free from objection. No gentleman was allowed within the pavilion unless invited and attended by a lady. This dance was the real opening of the Convention, the geniality it started being visible all the way through. The sessions of the Convention began on Wednesday morning, Dr. Brown opening by an address of unusual clearness and power. The Business and Resolution Committees were appointed at this session also. W. S. Bell, S. P. Putnam, Mrs. Mina Seymour, H. L. Green, J. H. Burnham, Juliet H. Severance, and G. W. Baldwin were appointed to conduct the meeting, and the following persons were expected to frame the resolutions: A. B. Bradford, Courtlandt Palmer, George Chainey, Charles Watts, Mrs. Mattie Krekle, Miss Helen Gardner, E. M. Macdonald, J. E. Remsburg, and Allen Pringle. A fine quartet, besides H. H. Hall, was in attendance, and made music to the satisfaction of all parties. The use of a very fine piano had been gratuitously given by W. F. Graves, of Castile, N. Y.

The sensation of the Convention is the conversion of George Chainey to Spiritualism. St. Paul's flop-over was apparently a well-considered act compared with the headlong jump which precipitated the brilliant This World-er into the very heart of the strait-laced Spiritual sect. Mr. Chainey in his previous life had made many opponents among the Liberal Spiritualists because of his disregard of their ism, and they are now as restiv under his adherence as they were indignant at his lack of appreciation of their theories. It is generally conceded that he is honest in his change of convictions, but still the mystery of how it was done excites universal comment. Almost every person one meets, Spiritualist or Materialist, within the limits of the camp, after the first salutation, inquires, "What do you think about Chainey?" If he had desired to get up a first-class sensation, he could not hav chosen a better course. Thursday afternoon he first spoke to the Convention. His subject was "Ingersollism," but toward the close he departed from his text to enlighten his whilom friends and new allies upon the subject of his conversion. The part of the lecture bearing upon this is as follows:

"But is all the beauty and inspiration of this world a sufficient inspiration to the best life and largest joy? Does it represent all the truth? Having stopped gazing at the stars long enough to see the beauty of the flowers blooming at our feet, shall we look at the stars no more? When I first left the church I fancied so. It was all the truth I saw. I saw thousands leaving the church and wandering forth like sheep without a shepherd. I resolved to do what I could to gather all the sweet inspirations of earth and distill from them the cheer of life. I went to Boston for this purpose.

"At first my whole heart found satisfaction, rejoicing, and grandeur in my work. Every day brought me words of cheer and comfort. Husbands blessed me for reconciling their wives to their views and bringing sweetest harmony where all before was harshest discord. Wives loved me for making their husbands more loving and gentle. Parents thanked me with full hearts for inspiring their children with noble thoughts and lofty ambitions; while weary, discouraged souls, disposed to suicide, blessed me from their hearts for making life for them again to seem worth living. This, however, could only last while I preserved undimmed the flame of enthusiasm and the ardor of faith. But at the end of the second year I began to feel that my lectures were simply received by the majority as an emotional and intellectual entertainment. The great purpose of organization, of educational and philanthropic work, underlying them all in my own mind, was either unheeded or frustrated by the selfishness or jealousy of others. The crowd would make the roof ring with thunders of applause and then leave the brunt of the burden of support to fall on a few over-generous hearts. I grew faint-hearted; and you know 'faint heart never won fair lady.' My work became irksome. It is only 'the labor we delight in physics pain.' Though I long refused to believe my own sight, I noticed a tendency among Materialists and Agnostics to indifference to the propaganda of their own faith. I felt the rust growing slowly but surely on my own sword. When I would construct the new temple and sing the new songs I perceived less approbation than when I wielded the hammer of the iconoclast or hurled the gibes of mocking sarcasm at the old theology. In many places I found in their meetings no higher purpose than the love of intellectual gladiatorship. All good impressions of an earnest, eloquent lecture would be dissipated in a free fight—not with clubs, knives, and bullets, but with the knock-down arguments of logic, the sharp edge of sarcasm, and death-dealing words of malice. I saw put forth as Liberal literature often the unripe fruit of unripe minds, the mere slop-bucket refuse of the true intellectual development and provision of the age, while our conventions are disgraced by all sorts of lunacies and crankisms, until I sometimes felt that such Freethought was a kind of a hell-broth concocted by all the foul witches of discontent.

"For the last year I hav been in a constant state of disquietude. While my love and purpose and education all urged me to endure, my judgment said: 'It is a useless martyrdom. You cannot screw your courage to the sticking-place, and so will fail.'

"I made up my mind to abandon the attempt, and try my fortunes on the stage. I believed in the future of the theater, and felt that the grand inspirations of Shakspere offered me a pulpit from which to teach and elevate the world. But at the solicitation of friends who hav more faith than I do in the success of Agnosticism, I consented under certain conditions to try it one more year. But for a seeming accident that brought me to Cassadaga camp, that would hav been the end; I should hav buried George Chainey, and gone forth under a new name to wrestle for the prizes and emoluments of the tragedian's art.

"But that star for me has set, while a far brighter one shines in its place. When I came to this camp I no more expected to become a Spiritualist than I did to jump over the moon. I could now no more doubt the truth of spirit communion than I could in my present organization jump over the moon. If there is any such thing as trusting one's senses, I know that our departed friends are all around us, that the living ears that listen to me to-day are but few in comparison to the great cloud of unseen witnesses that hover about us. When I know that scores of new slates, untouched before, are written on without the intervention of any human hand in broad daylight, and each message written in the hand-writing of the person signing; when I sit in a dark circle under absolute test conditions, and witness wonder after wonder that no sleight of hand could produce, hear voices in the air telling us whose they are, feel the palm of a little child laid in my hand in a room in which all are adults; when a medium stands on this platform giving hundreds of names, descriptions of the departed that are fully recognized, goes clairvoyantly into scores of homes, sees past and future events, tells the position of articles of furniture in rooms, tells the contents of bureau drawers; when on this platform ladies giv glowing, eloquent lectures on subjects concerning which, in their normal condition, they are entirely ignorant, beautiful poems at a moment's notice; when trance mediums giv me names and descriptions of friends whom I had forgotten, and whose funeral sermons I preached years ago; when wonder after wonder confronts me until, if I should attempt to tell them all, I should hav to ask for all the time of this convention, do you think that I can resist their influence? Belief is no act of volition. I could no longer doubt if I wished. I am simply compelled to believe. Do you think that I wooed it, and cheated myself into believing it? Don't you suppose I knew that you would point the finger of scorn and say as they did of old, 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' Don't you suppose I knew I should hav to run a gantlet of jokes about being 'taken in,' and having 'the wool drawn over my eyes,' being a 'little weak in the upper chamber,' and all sorts of hints about 'lunatic asylums?' Don't you know that I hav lived with you long enough to know that some of you are such inflated egotists that you actually think that you know all that there is to be known of life and destiny? Don't you know that I am fully aware that some of you hav cultivated your reasoning faculties until your hearts and intuitions are dead within you, and that an intellect without a heart is as cruel and unfeeling as the grave?

"Don't you know that a sensitiv soul shrinks from all such criticisms as many of you are passing on my change of opinion as the flesh shrinks from the lash? When I thought of all these things, I resolved to run away from their influences and never again hav aught to do with Spiritualism. I told the friends here, while thinking of these things, that I should leave in the morning. I went around bidding my friends good-bye, and retired to bed. But I could not sleep. As I lay in bed it seemed as though some one came and impressed me that I must stay until every dark cloud was cleared from my mind. Long I reasoned against it. When I at last resolved to be guided, a soft hand was placed upon my fevered and aching brow, and lay there caressing it with touch as light as down and softer than velvet. I could not move hand nor foot. Then through all my being coursed streams of life, vibrations of ecstatic joy. The hand then seemed to change into a focus, through which rays of light pierced and illuminated my brain, cleansing it of all the haunting shadows of doubt and despair. Since then my mind has been flooded by a wondrous sense of luminosity, and my heart brimming over with joy. I would not part with that experience for all the gold of earth.

"The questions arise, What is the value of all this? What additional motiv power does it giv to conduct? What will be its influence on society? Will it rebuild the lost bowers of childhood in which faith shall climb to beauty and prayer to praise? In other lectures I shall answer all these and many other questions; but to-day I must content myself with a general description. I find in it a new gospel justifying the wildest hopes and brightest dreams. Death is no more for us. The sun sets, but we know it simply continues to shine on a fairer sphere. This faith, or rather knowledge, brings the brightest visions and loftiest ideals that ever ravished the soul of mortal man. It opens before all aimless steps a straight and sure path to the goal of all true desire. It turns death into a beauteous white-robed angel. It gems the darkest night of despair with radiant stars of hope. It points to every soul a grand heritage of immortal progress. It promises atonement full and complete for all that is darkly suffered and borne on earth for right and truth.

"It seems to distill the essence of every kiss of true love since the world began into our hearts to-day. It takes the fragrance of every flower of earth into its censer of sweet incense. With spirit friends hovering in the air no flower 'wastes its sweetness on the desert air.' We feel through it the companionship of all the great souls of history. In this faith I find the true home of the soul—the mother who must liv long as her children, possessed of a tenderness that is greater than our largest love—a glory of truth perfectly rational and in harmony with nature's laws. Reason nor love need no longer rest an hungered. We hav found a scheme that contents them both and saves them from holding the world accursed. The head no longer crucifies the heart, but goes before it to lead it to the goal of its uttermost desire. Love no longer sends out orphan cries for help from north and south, east and west. Come, swift messengers of light and love—not strangers, but fathers and mothers, still watching over their children; children coming back to comfort sorrow-stricken parents, lover returning to lover, friend to friend. Through these eternal loves we come again to the soul that is in all and through all. 'In the darkest night hope sees a star,' and listening love hears the echo of a familiar foot-fall on the shadowy shore of the unseen. Acknowledged or unacknowledged, this faith is the desire of all hearts. It redeems the past, and fills us with hope for the future. It crowns every martyr and justifies every reformer.

"It gathers up all the prayers and tears of earth, and out of them constructs a bower where prayer shall turn to praise and sorrow to rejoicing."

This injudicious harang was delivered with great fervor. Afterward the orator said that his spirit love, Lilly Dove, stood by his side and sustained him by her presence. In this he was corroborated by Mrs. Anna Kimball, a somewhat noted if not notorious medium, who said she plainly saw the aforesaid spirit love, with others not specifically named. The effect of the speech upon Mr. Chainey's former associates was not happy. The charge that they are inflated egotists is regarded with some suspicion; and during the delivery of other portions of the discourse, Mr. Charles Watts, who sat upon the platform, was seen to stifle several smiles. A medium asserted that some of Mr. Chainey's words moved Mr. Watts deeply, as he was seen to furtivly wipe away a tear. Upon investigation, however, it was found that a cinder had lodged in the big blue round right optic of the incredulous Englishman, and that it was that which brought the dew to his cheek. The general opinion is that Mr. Chainey is making mistakes. That he should become a Spiritualist is not objected to. His sincerity is admitted, and his right to revise, change, or abandon his former ideas, and even associates and friends, is as clear as the sun. If he has evidence sufficient to convince him of a continued existence, why, "so mote it be." Perhaps he is to be envied. But his public treatment of the Liberals, on their own platform, too, is stigmatized by those who heard him as little short of scandalous. The limited length of his experiences, to say nothing of the frivolous character of some of them, is thought to be some reason why modesty in public demeanor on Mr. Chainey's part would be graceful. In more senses than one his worst foes are to be found in his own new household. In one way, the conversion has certainly done good. He has reformed. Not that he needed reformation, for it was never known that he did, but he has changed his social habits. No longer does he smoke cigars, or drink beer, or eat meat. In this sudden abandonment of little vices, he irresistibly calls to mind some Methodist redemptions. It is by no means certain that the parallel will not be extended even to the backsliding.

Wednesday afternoon Mr. Bell gave his address on prohibition. He was followed by Mr. Putnam on the province of religion. The evening was devoted to a free conference of ten-minute speeches, and was a very enjoyable affair. The quartet—composed of Mrs. H. O. Wait, soprano; Miss Emma Smith, alto; W. W. Wilson, tenor; A. D. Lane, basso; Mina Seymour, pianist—also contributed to the evening's entertainment. The audience on Thursday morning was largely augmented in numbers, but the attendance on the first days was at no time so large as at Rochester. The first hour of the morning session was occupied by Hon. A. B. Bradford, who took for his subject, "In God We Trust." Demurring to the placing upon our national coinage the motto which he took for his subject, he held that the American people did not trust in God, but in themselvs and to their own individual and collectiv exertions, for all they had in this world and for the maintenance of their government; that during the war they did not rely upon the priestly cant of "trust in God," but buckled on the armor and went out and conquered the enemy by their own exertions. In closing, he warned his hearers that there was a deep-laid plot of the clergy and the church to crush out heresy and Infidelity in the free United States, by proceeding first by fire and sword to annihilate Mormonism in Utah, which, having been accomplished, their thirst for blood would hav to be still further appeased by exterminating every one who did not fully agree with the motto, "In God we trust." He urged organization and co-operation to defeat that end.

Mr. Bradford was followed by Dr. McCormic, a pronounced Spiritualist, who took for his subject, "Why spirits are not visible to mortals, treated from a purely scientific standpoint." Advancing upon the wave theory of sound and light, that it was impossible for the human ear to distinguish sounds produced by less than sixteen vibrations per second or more than thirty-four thousand, and so with regard to the vibrations of light, it was impossible for the human eye to distinguish beyond a certain extent. The spirit, owing to its intensified organization, and the consequent intensified vibrations, is therefore beyond the mortal, and to make himself heard and seen by human organs, has to coat himself over with the grosser material of the medium. The speaker predicted that the time would come, by constant advancement, when we would all be able to see and converse with our friends over the river. H. H. Hall opened the afternoon session with one of his vocal selections, and Charles Watts occupied the platform for an hour, on the subject, "The Claims of Christianity Criticised," holding that not all the teachings of Christianity should be rejected, but only those that our advanced civilization taught us were actually bad, as were the tortures of heretics in olden times, the rack, the dungeon, and the Inquisition. If God was the omnipotent being that Christians claimed him, he ought not to hav allowed the world to exist till less than two thousand years ago before he offered it the chance of salvation. Christianity did not always make people bad, but it did not prevent them from being bad.

In the evening Dr. McCormic again held forth, followed by Mrs. Juliet H. Severance, who gave her ideas upon the new republic. Mrs. Severance is an exceptionally able woman, and though extremely radical finds favor with all her audiences. In the regular report of the proceedings an abstract of her remarks will find room.

On this evening, at the invitation of Mr. Chainey, Mr. Putnam and the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER attended a seance at the house of Dr. Crane. It was called a dark circle, and was so in fact. So Cimmerian was it, that a young lady in a white Mother Hubbard was a shadow at three feet; the resplendent white waistcoat surrounding the jolly form of Mr. Putnam was indistinguishable at a distance of two feet; while the brown hair of a lady within one foot of the editor's visual organs was totally invisible. But no manifestations were apparent, and the circle broke up disappointed, at least so far as two individuals were concerned. One or two persons asserted that they saw lights, another heard raps, and a lady asserted she saw standing by the editor on old gentleman, a young lady, and a little girl. But the Spiritualists present listened to them incredulously; the skeptics said nothing, and the general conclusion was that the seance was a failure.

Friday morning Miss Helen Gardner gave her lecture on "Men, Women, and Gods." It was listened to by a delighted audience. Miss Gardner is epigrammatic, witty, eloquent, and pathetic by turns, and deserves the success she has gained in the lecture field. Her lecture was the same as delivered in New York at Chickering Hall when introduced by Col. Ingersoll, an abstract of which was published in these columns. She was followed by Mr. Remsburg, who expounded the "morality" of the Bible in a manner calculated to make good Christians grieve.

[The continuation of the editor's account of the Cassadaga Convention, together with a full report of the proceedings, will appear next week.]

The Negativ and Unenthusiastic Objections to Liberalism.

A popular charge against nineteenth-century Liberalism, raised by the clergy, indorsed by those who are known as "other-world" Spiritualists, and often admitted to be true even by Liberals themselvs, is that it is a doctrin of pure negation. This charge cannot be sustained. Liberalism does not mean denial of anything except falsehoods; and the denial even of a falsehood is equivalent to an assertion of the opposit truth. An untruth cannot be disproved without demonstrating a fact. But does Liberalism affirm no fundamental truths, as opposed to Christianity, to take the place of lies deposed? Let us prepend:

Liberalism affirms the supremacy of the human reason. Christianity denies it.

Liberalism maintains the right of free thinking. Christianity denies it.

Liberalism affirms that the universe is governed by natural law, "modified by human intervention." Christianity denies this, and interposes miracles.

Liberalism affirms that our first duty is toward ourselvs and other human beings. Christianity denies it.

Liberalism indorses evolution as a fundamental truth. Christianity denies it in favor of creation.

Liberalism affirms that the good in human nature overbalances the evil. Christianity denies this, and substitutes the doctrin of total depravity.

Liberalism affirms the equality of all citizens before the law, regardless of religious belief or unbelief. Christianity denies it.

Liberalism affirms the supreme importance of knowledge as contrasted with unreasoning belief. Christianity denies it.

Liberalism holds all it has by right of intellectual conquest. It believes that a world in the hand is, for practical purposes, worth two in the skies.

In a word, Liberalism affirms every demonstrated fact, and denies only that which is untrue. As to the existence of God or a future state of existence, Liberalism does not dogmatize. It says with Ingersoll:

"I hav made up my mind that if there is a God, he will be merciful to the merciful.

"Upon that rock I stand.—

"That he will not torture the forgiving.

"Upon that rock I stand.—

"That every man should be true to himself, and there is no world, no star, in which honesty is a crime.

"Upon that rock I stand.—

"The honest man, the good woman, the happy child, hav nothing to fear, either in this world or the world to come.

"Upon that rock I stand."

If there is more than "subdominance of affirmation" here it is not apparent; and surely there is no dearth of material for inspiration to action when every one of these declarations is denied and assailed.

Neither is there any good reason why there should be a lack of healthy enthusiasm in the cause of Liberalism. Fanaticism (which is blind enthusiasm in the cause of the unreasonable) is neither expected nor wanted. There is no poverty of belief among Liberals. They believe in all that exists. If more existed, they would believe in that also; but nothing can be added to human knowledge by affirming an untruth, even if the truth be not always according to the ideal.

As there is no reason for a lack of enthusiasm among Liberals, so there is no lack of it. But its power is left to exhale itself unutilized, as the water pours over the Falls of Niagara without being captured and directed to the uses of mankind. If there are those who hav been cajoled into an admission that the pulse of Freethought beats slowly, let them attend a Freethought convention, or even the three hundred and fiftieth meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club. Liberalism they will there find is not, as some hav thought it, a "garden of the dead" wherein no bird of promis ever sings.

What is needed, then, is organization and the construction of channels in which this current of enthusiasm can be so directed as to lend its force to the cause which has aroused it. Perfect organization has not been effected for the reason that organizers hav been wanting. Given the machinery of the church, and in ten years Liberalism would not leave an intelligent supporter of superstition in the country. Present hope for something to be done in this line rests with the National Liberal League. Its actions are awaited by Secularists with interest and anxiety. If the right men are in the field, it is safe to prophesy that Liberals will show to the world that they hav something to contend for more than the "mere negation" which has been imputed to them as their creed.

Church Charities.

The Rev. Wilbur Crafts makes the assertion that "Infidelity has built but one college in our land." If he means by this that unbelievers in Christianity hav built but one college, his statement is a falsehood. Girard College is the institution referred to by the Rev. Mr. Crafts. He did not add that it had been diverted by rascality to the teaching of the Christian superstition. More than a dozen millions hav been given by Infidels to public institutions of learning and to charities.

But it might be interesting to ask where most of the money has come from that has been so ostentatiously bestowed upon churches and church so-called charitable institutions. Ask the absconding bank cashiers, now in Canada. Ask A. S. Hatch, now insolvent. Ask Hathaway, and Fish, and Seney, and Eno, and Ward, and Dodd, and Fisk, and Grant, and Bogart, to say nothing of the pious and religiously philanthropic Paymaster Roberts, who has just defaulted at Wilkes Barre to the amount of $125,000, much of which is now in the hands of the church. These men are all prominent in religious circles, and their money was taken from others and no equivalent returned. Charity must be broad indeed to cover the sins of those who hav given in its name that which never belonged to them.

Idle as it is, the Rev. Wilbur Crafts is welcome to his boast.

Letters from Friends.

WILKES BARRE, Aug. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of August 9th, friend Otto Wettstein, after having had a slumber, so far as his contributions to THE TRUTH SEEKER are concerned, not yet apparently fully awake, contributes one whole page of matter under the title of "Realistic Meditations." He says these were brought about by once more reading the articles of "Macdonald, Heddon, and Perry, in their able defense of immortality."

I am quite sorry to find that instead of answering the arguments, or replying to the facts that their "able articles" may hav contained, he has concerned himself about the suggestion of a long list of Materialistic conundrums that hav no reference to the main question whatever, as it is quite evident that, if there is a human spirit, and if that spirit is immortal, the very fact of immortality will take in all necessary conditions of existence, and there is no use of borrowing trouble about how to clothe a spirit, how it shall make music without a piano, how it shall eat, or liv without eating, and a hundred other matters of similar import.

To speak of the scarcity of food, or other materials, so fine that no human eye can behold them, and so imponderable that no material scales could weigh them, and which we know to exist in these conditions in the world around us, is simply suggesting a condition of things that has no existence, and which there is no occasion to worry over.

Every thing that grows upon trees, sprouts from the ground, or in any way furnishes us with food or clothing, exists in this spirit world around us. The air contains every element of food and clothing, and contains it in such a condition that no human eye can see it. Now, friend Otto, do you not see that your material ground must first be fed by the elements of vegetation, and supplied by their vegetable germs, before you or I could find food or clothing here? Why concern yourselvs about the food of that locality, when we poor souls hav to depend upon it for our supply? If you are not convinced of this fact you must hav studied your chemistry to little purpose. Do not worry about the supply of food and garments for the spirits, as we get all ours from their country.

Then, again, I find you worrying about how a spirit can exist without organs. Who says they hav no organs? Who says they are composed of nothing? Who says they hear without ears, see without eyes, speak without organs of articulation, and think without a brain, or move without legs or wings, etc., etc., etc.? Why, Otto Wettstein, nobody that claims to speak for the Spiritualists says so. On the contrary, it is claimed that a spirit is an organic material structure. If the elements of all material nature may and do exist in an invisible form, perfect germs, that require ground, light, heat, etc., to clothe them in a compact material form suited to our gross condition, it must be evident that the whole office of materiality is but to clothe and embody these elementary substances.

If friend Otto will observe his lemon box, which he supplied with say one hundred pounds of earth, and watered occasionally for three years, he will find a full crop of lemons, and a large tree, which, if he will weigh, he will find to be several times the weight of the earth, and perhaps the earth is still all in his box. Now, whence came the tree and its load of lemons? Evidently from the atmosphere; not an atom of dirt was by any means changed into any part of the tree or its fruit; dirt was only a medium for the growth to proceed by, mainly, or the medium through which the elements combined and located themselvs chemically upon the tree, leaf, bud, and fruit. And in a similar process is materiality of earth only a medium for the growth and development of a human spirit.

Again, who says that a million spirits would not weigh a hair? I hav seen ponderable objects conveyed and moved, and intelligence manifested thereby, which objects weighed many pounds, without the aid of any human agency, and without any machinery; and as the intelligence was characteristic of a human being, whom in life I well knew, I claim that I am but a reasonable being when I declare my belief that it was a spirit, and the one it claimed to be. I hav held in my own hand, in daylight, an accordion which I had full liberty to examin (and I hav been engaged in the manufacture of reed instruments for twenty-five years, and ought to know what they are when I examin them); and when thus holding the instrument a force was brought to bear upon the other end of it, and familiar tunes played upon it, and some tunes that I never heard, and some, or any, that I mentally requested to be played—this happening in the presence of several persons. Now, sir, what is your answer to this fact on which the Spiritual theory is based, as an agency in these phenomena? It is all brought down in your vast meditations to one little simple word—"crank."

You say, "All that is claimed for this is idle speculation, theory, the cunning devices of avaricious priests and crankcy visionaries." How very refreshing such a statement is, coming from a profound material philosopher, who ignores the facts of nature, and substitutes his objections in the form of a Materialistic befuddlement about non-essentials!

The fact is manifest that Otto Wettstein is so wedded in his thought to an outward and tangible existence, that he has not the power to conceive of anything of an organic nature which he cannot feel and handle. Everything which exists outside of himself must, if too fine for such use, be classed and conceived of as a diffused mass. The idea that an organic being could exist, composed of these elementary substances, in a compact form, yet invisible, is beyond the telescopic range of his mental apparatus: and not being in a condition to see it, after straining himself to his utmost ability in his "Realistic Meditations," he affirms that the man who professes to see it must be a "visionary crank."

There is certainly no reason why the elements composing the nerve structure of man could not be reorganized into a human form after they are drawn from the human body at death, from the known laws of affinity of substances. These nerve elements should be more likely to assume the human than any other form, and the particular form and relation which they once bore to each other in the body. In fact, all combinations of substance take place by and in accordance with the law of affinity, and cannot do anything else.

In the face of some thirty years of experiences that hav addressed themselvs to my intellect, and for which no rational explanation has yet approached the subject to be compared to that of the spiritual, it is amusing to hear the hard-headed and solid-material philosopher handle and squeak his rickety "crank" upon all occasions, and endeavors to drown out all answers by his worn-out substantiv. He turns and turns it upon all occasions, even when he admits your argument to be logical, and "able in defense of the doctrin of immortality." Now, friend Otto, be a little careful how you swing that handle; it has been used and turned and twisted by so many in grinding out their replies, that the socket has become much worn, and the pin that holds it to the shaft considerably loosened, and should you giv it a sudden wrench in your excitement, it might take on the qualities of the ungovernable boomerang, and fly up and hit you in the eye, and that might close your sight to the beauties of either the natural or spiritual visions around you.

I am satisfied that no explanation based on the theory of a general diffusion of mind, or any other thing or substance in nature, can be put in the place of a spirit or spirits to account for such phenomena as I hav witnessed; and for anyone to assume to disbelieve it all, in the face of millions of witnesses who are as competent to see, and hear, and judge as I am of what they see, is simply dodging the question, and aping the pranks and mustering in the company of what they look upon as the respectable and popular class. Because Professor Huxley, when fairly driven to the wall, said "he was not interested in the subject of Spiritualism, even if true," there are lots of wise men who think it quite smart to adopt his style of treatment. No matter how indifferent the subject may be treated by a few, the millions are fast enlisting under the banner of the spirits, and defying the ridicule and contempt of facts, and until they are rationally accounted for, aside from a belief in the works of spirits, the millions will cling to the doctrins of the genial summer-land in preference to the chilling philosophy of a Materialism that is lifeless.

No matter how ably its advocates may destroy the gods of superstition, its structures and theology, they dare not let the demolished materials lie around in a shapeless and confused mass, hideous and frightful to look upon, nor expose the corpses to the gaze of an astonished world, nor the infecting odors of the dead. They must bury the dead, and re-arrange the materials into a more beautiful and enduring edifice, in which reason shall preside and the philosophy of all truth in nature be taught and worshiped. J. R. PERRY.

A REAL CIRCUS AND SHOW IN SNOWVILLE.

SNOWVILLE, VA., Aug. 21, 284.

Yes, here among the mountains, miles away from the railroad, we hav had a show. It came in wagons, and over roads so narrow, steep, hilly, and rocky, that now and then one of the wagons would upset, animals and all. They wisely carry their own blacksmith shop and tools along, as a necessity, in such country places where a breakdown may and does often occur far from any local smith.

For weeks this whole place and vicinity hav been placarded with numerous and enormous enticing show-pictures, which hav been as carefully studied and examined, and much better appreciated here, than would be the finest gallery of costly paintings. Scarcely anyone would believe the half would or could be shown. But the fateful day has arrived, and Snowville is alive for miles around. Oh, such a conglomeration of people! Old and young, rich and poor, black and white, as well as all intermediate shades of yellow. Men in broadcloth and cassimeres, contrasted with those in butternut jeans and linseys; women in velvet, silk, and cashmere, as well as homemade cottons and five-cent calicos; and head-gear of all conceivable shapes, sizes, and ages. Then the vehicles! Great lumbering Noah's-arks, covered with unbleached cotton, ox-carts, jerseys, carriages, and old farm-wagons, often a barrel of cider in front to pay expenses, and the family in behind. Or father, mother, and children on horseback, sometimes a whole family on a horse; the usual "band-wagon," with its "rag tag and bobtail," following behind. All this was as much a "show" as the magic tent and its animals, circus-performers, and curiosities. The one elephant was no larger than a cow, but it was well stuffed with apples, cakes, and candies by people who were anxious to see it eat. Little ones who had been scared by bugaboos of bears, gazed at the real live "children-killers" with curious and mingled feelings. One lady stood by the cage of monkeys cramming her little black servant girl; she actually made her believe one old monkey was her grandfather, and the others were her uncles and aunts.

The ubiquitous side-show was also there. The snake-charmer, a live head with no body, and a live body with no head, and most interesting of all was the "mind-reading," the reader being blindfolded and at the opposit end of the tent, while the performer passed around the audience asking her the color of this one's hair, that one's beard, or asked her what he had in his hand—watches, keys, pencils, etc.—all of which she answered correctly, even to the kind of a watch. And one man gave the performer something like a trunk-check, and the woman told the figures, letters, etc., on it correctly, though no one in the tent save the owner and the performer could possibly hav known them. Some declared the woman could see despite her bandages, but we know she was too far off to see, even if she had a fair chance. This was a mystery to us all till at last a close observer suggested ventriloquism. The same man had given a puppet-show, and was an excellent performer, and probably that solves it all. Questions not decided upon beforehand could hav been thus answered by him, the woman merely moving her lips to deceive the others, she being guided by the manner of asking in other cases. Thus do mysteries one by one become resolved into tricks and deceptions. No great meeting of scientists could create more talk, discussion, or excitement than a big show in a back country village where there was never one before. All the hoarded bits of pocket money are hunted up, and every urchin, as well as other impecunious individual, is looking up odd jobs for weeks beforehand, so as to earn money for the "show." Many exclaimed against it as taking money out of the town, but if it did it gave us ideas, and they are more than money, and it made idlers work, and that earned money, and the circus and show all had to be fed, and that left money. So on the whole we think the experience is worth more than the outlay. And this evening hundreds of children are practicing contortions, piling up chairs, and trying feats upon them, and enjoying a miniature circus at home.

I hope our readers will appreciate this glimps of our Snowville feast of fun. ELMINA.

THE INQUISITIV INFIDEL.

READING, KAN., Aug. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Only a few days ago, while waiting for a prescription at our village drug store, I overheard the following conversation between an Infidel and a Methodist preacher:

INFIDEL—You are the Methodist preacher, I understand.

METHODIST PREACHER—I am, sir.

I.—I presume you preach the same doctrin that Methodist preachers did fifteen or twenty years ago, when I used to go to meeting.

M. P.—I presume I do, sir, with a few modifications.

I.—Well, I suppose you claim that you were called to preach.

M. P.—Most assuredly, sir. No man should assume that position without being led by the hand of God.

I.—On what grounds do you claim that?

M. P.—Well, no man can be prepared to teach the way of life truthfully by his own power and mind alone. We hav many in the ministry not called, and we find them not successful in bringing souls to Jesus. Although superior in intellect and oratory, and equally as good Christians, they seem to lack that soul-stirring magnetic influence over their congregations that we find in a man whom God has selected to advocate his cause.

I.—Can you explain to me the difference between your feelings of being called to preach by God and the feelings of the men who wrote the Bible, who claimed to hav been inspired?

M. P.—I never thought of that idea before; but really, I believe it to be the same. I believe I am as confident of God's presence with me continually, and his guiding my actions and words, as the apostles who wrote the New Testament.

I.—Then you claim that what you say in your sermons is really God talking to the people?

M. P.—I certainly do, sir.

I.—Well, of course you believe in the instantaneous change of heart, or what is called experiencing religion?

M. P.—Most assuredly, sir. That is the gate through which we expect the whole flock finally to pass which now is so widely scattered, and we are Christ's hirelings—so to speak—now in his employ engaged in the great work of rounding up, as the ranchmen say, that they may come to the great shepherd and not be lost.

I.—Don't you think that which you call experiencing religion is simply an undue excitement, something akin to the passion of falling in love?

M. P.—Not at all, sir. Why, you disgust me! If you can't talk more respectfully of our great work that is so fast revolutionizing the world, I will not talk with you, sir.

I.—Hold on. Now don't get excited. I want to ask you one more question. Did you ever see an angel?

M. P.—No, sir.

I.—Did you ever know of anybody that did?

M. P.—Yes, sir; we hav accounts in the sacred scriptures of many instances of angels coming to instruct individuals in regard to the will of God, and were seen by mortal eyes.

I.—Did any of them explain how and what they looked like?

M. P.—No, sir; we hav no information in regard to the form of angels.

I.—Then you think that the pictures of angels which we see in the Bible and the statues of angels we see in churches are imaginary?

M. P.—Yes, sir; certainly so.

I.—Well, now, will you tell me from what feeling, emotion, desire, or inspiration, the artist or sculptor, or, rather, those who employed them to do the job, selected their chosen form for an angel, in every instance a beautiful, voluptuous, fully developed young lady, always about eighteen years old?

M. P.—I see what you are trying to show, sir, and I will not talk with you any longer. Good-bye, sir. W. H. P.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE WOMEN OF AMERICA.

TALENT, OR., Aug., 1884.

LADIES: Permit an old man of eighty-one years to suggest the reason why you, who make and educate the men, and who stand as their companion and helpmate from the cradle to the grave, are denied the enjoyment of coequal rights.

You perform at least half the work in every family, you teach in schools, work the telegraph, and do your part in the important vocations of national as well as in domestic life, and yet you get only one-half or two-thirds pay which men receive for the same amount of work. You pay taxes, are subject to penalties, but you hav no voice in making and administering the laws which you are forced to obey; and, as a consequence, there is as much unrest and disorder in the nation as there is in the family when bereft of its mother. The strong oppress the weak, so that with our vast resources of wealth the toiling masses are careworn and poor.

Scientists tell us that this sad condition is in consequence of the human race having evoluted through various grades of animal life up to the monkey, thence to the man, and that in the majority of mankind the animal (though in human form) is yet predominant, especially with Christians, who believe themselvs to hav been "conceived in sin, shapened in iniquity, and brought forth with hearts decietful above all things, and desperately wicked." This scientific discovery is one of the greatest which has ever been made in modern times, because it accounts for the tyranny of the strong over the weak, as illustrated by the following statement of Gen. Pope: "I hav known the Navajo Indians of New Mexico for twenty-five years as a civilized people, who make their own blankets, and own large herds of sheep and cattle. Nevertheless, I see no future for these peaceful Indians. The whites are pressing them and are bound to hav their land." It also explains why our representativs in Congress ignore the natural rights of the best half of the people, to secure which our government was formed.

With this origin of our race in view it is not derogatory to speak of the stock jobbers in Wall street as "Bulls and Bears," and in all cases where Congressmen and frontier settlers are not evoluted above the nature of these savage ancestors, it is but natural for them to hook and hug like their kindred bulls and bears in the city of New York.

Ladies, these facts suggest the following inferences:

1. That so long as you passivly allow men of this grade to represent you in Congress, and to wrong the Indians in New Mexico and elsewhere, you sanction the wrongs which yourselvs endure.

2. The united efforts of both sexes are essential for the election of government officials who will work for the rights of all the people irrespectiv of race, creed, or sex.

3. Complete success cannot come until mothers are conditioned in mind and body to produce and educate a higher grade of children.

4. Thanks for the ripening spirit of the age, which is helping you to secure a triumph over every wrong.

Respectfully, JOHN BEESON.

MR. EDITOR: I am satisfied there are Liberal people enough in the United States who could pay a small sum of money yearly to keep up lecturers and distribute Liberal tracts. Here is my plan: Let every Liberal paper start a list in their columns for one year, and see how many persons they can get who are willing to pay say one dollar a year for ten years, if they liv that long, for the purpose of paying good men to do nothing but lecture and organize Leagues, and a part, say twenty per cent, to pay for Freethought tracts for free distribution (such tracts as "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," etc.). Let it be understood that all who sign the list will also try to get at least another person each year to sign it also, and that each will make an effort to get all the money they can from persons who are friends to Freethought to send also, if it is only a few cents from each. Giv those who sign the list some name, say "Helping Hands," or some appropriate name. Hav a certain day appointed to send their money to the treasurer, say on Servetus's Day (Oct. 27th). Let the next Liberal Congress appoint three men whose duty it shall be to hire good lecturers at reasonable rates. Let each Liberal paper keep the name and post-office address of the treasurer of the National Liberal League, or whatever name it goes by, published in every number, and publish once a month the names of those joining the "Helping Hand" in that month. Let the tracts intended for free distribution be sent to auxiliary Leagues and to persons wanting them to send where they will do good service. I honestly believe that if only enough of the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" could be freely distributed, it would do more to upset superstition than any other tract I know of. It is the Bible fighting itself. Tracts on Materialism, Spiritualism, Prohibitionism, etc., are not what we want yet. What we want now is a separation of church and state affairs, a protection of all in their religious or non-religious belief. That is, allow every person to worship who and what he pleases and allow everybody else to do the same, and no person or persons to molest others or interfere in any way so as to injure them as long as they attend to their own business; secular and compulsory education, freedom of speech and press, etc. I think it would be a good idea to hav the platform or the aims of Liberalism printed on single sheets of paper for free distribution, and send them out to auxiliary Leagues and to subscribers who could hav one in their pockets ready, and would be a great help, for a small piece of paper is handier to carry around than a newspaper. The more people get their eyes open, the better it will be for Freethought newspapers and magazines. Let us see if we can't do more good in this way than the Young Men's Christian Association are doing, for which I hav no hatred at all, but I think the most of them are mistaken. They are all men we want to advance a little; we want the fair sex in our association with us; we want no bachelor association in ours.

Study over this, and if you favor the plan, straighten it out in due form, and hoist her sails, and I will go a dollar a year for the sake of truth.

I believe some such plan as I hav named would be a great help, and we hav as much right to help along a cause that is right as the Young Bachelor Association has. So let us adopt some plan, and start it rolling. O. CHERINGTON.

CORN-PLANTER, PA., Sept. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: After voting the Republican ticket continuously for twenty-eight years, I hav about concluded to call a halt.

I am disgusted with both parties. The Democratic party has been dead since 1872. At that time by nominating Greeley they lost their wits. And yet they lug around the disgusting corpse till 'tis a stench in the nostrils of all right-minded people. The Republican party is par excellence the party of monopoly, and James G. Blaine is its prophet. The banks and the railways own this country, and they must be shorn of their power, or we are literally a nation of serfs.

James G. Blaine is a Catholic, as his mother was, and he will die in that faith. He is both a demagog and a hypocrit to pretend to be anything else.

Cleveland's morals are after the "good old David" pattern, but as far as honesty and capability are concerned, he would make a good president.

Both Blaine and Cleveland lug in God, and the "supreme," while I see noble B. F. Butler in his letter of acceptance completely ignores the myths and phantoms, and besides, as your correspondent "Index" in your paper of the 30th of August conclusivly shows, is also in favor of church taxation. This plank is as follows: "Fifth, All private property, all forms of money, and obligations to pay money, should bear their just proportion of public taxes." These things together are good and sufficient reasons why every Liberal in the country should vote for Benj. F. Butler. It does not do to say that he will not be elected. He may be. He most certainly will be if every Liberal, every laboring man, and every foe of monopoly votes for him. It is altogether probable the House of Representativs will hav to decide the matter, and in this case the result is not doubtful. But success, after all, is secondary to principle. In the Butler program is everything to make the great party of the future, and the Liberal who does not help it along sacrifices principle and wisdom, and will miss a grand opportunity of helping the world a long step toward the golden future.

Let every man and woman who reads this resolve to get Butler's letter of acceptance and carefully read it through and digest it, and if he or she is not converted then I judge something is radically wrong with the brain of the reader.

It is made up of truths, impregnable, unanswerable, logical, and convincing, and is Butler through and through; and Butler has always been a man famous for giving no uncertain sound on public questions. And if defeat is to be ours, let it be Butler and principle in preference to Blaine and victory.

MR. EDITOR: On my late tramp through Quaker Valley in this county, I persuaded a friend to take THE TRUTH SEEKER on trial three months. Near to him is a large stone building, the lower story of which is used for meetings, and the upper one for schools. It was built by the Quakers, and most of the money to build it came from rich Quakers in Philadelphia. It is on an eminence, and from its top can be seen one of the most fertil and picturesque prairies anywhere to be found. The green hedges, the immense orchards, the groves of maple and various other trees, the winding Spring River bordered by woods, the immense corn-fields and numerous hay-stacks, the skirts and patches of woodland here and there in the distance, the mounds and plateaus, within a radius of fifteen miles, present a most charming picture to such a lover of nature as I am. I was at this Quaker God-house on Sunday, and listened to a young lady telling some young children about God, and how he caused the walls of Jericho to fall by the blowing of rams' horns, and many awful and inhuman deeds Joshua did at the command of God. This was followed by the meeting, the men sitting by themselvs on the right, and the women on the left of the aisle. All their faces were grave and solemn, and I suppose they felt they were in the immediate presence of their God. The gloomy solemnity of the inside of the house was in striking contrast to the cheerful and glorious scene outside. We all sat in silence half an hour, which was the only part of the performance that was, to me, worshipful. At length the spirit moved one solemn man, who arose, and, in a very slow and whining tone, bored me for half an hour on "the highway of holiness," which he seemed to know all about. He was succeeded by a thick-set, fat man, with a broad face, and a narrow and shallow forehead, who told us what he knew (?) about "Adam's fall" at the Garden of Eden, and by his tone and manner took me back sixty years. After him the ablest and best educated man among them, and editor of the Western Friend, arose, solemn as death, and gave us a discourse on holiness and the invisible spirit. There was no praying, and singing is not permitted. I could not appreciate the inspiration of their blind faith. A Quaker meeting would be hell to me if I had to attend it. My temple of worship is the "grand archway of the sky," and nature is my inspiration. J. H. COOK.

MERRILL, MICH., Aug. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please allow me to say a few kind words to T. Winter, Materialist. As Brother Winter seems very anxious to be heard, it may be well to let him know that he is heard. Our old friend seems to be afraid that his spiritual friends may make a mistake and reckon him among their number. My good solid friend of the granit order, thee has no cause for alarm. We Spiritualists are too ethereal to consent to be bound to the rock to which you seem to hav grown fast. We recognize the existence of two poles to the great universal battery. If Brother Winter wishes to plant himself on the negativ pole, and swear to his last breath that there is no opposit pole, it is his low privilege. And if Brother Winter takes more real comfort on his cake of material ice than we do in our park of ethereal sunshine, all right. We would recommend, however, that he be a trifle more liberal, and allow us the benefit of our sunshine. If he will not do this, we will feel compelled to write "Bigotry" opposit his name in the book of our remembrance. This seems to us fair.

Now, Brother Winter, if you still feel as though it is your highest duty to your friends to pelt us constantly with your hard Material pebbles, do label some of them "Reason," and some "Evidence." And do not insist on putting that ugly old phrase, "It is so," on each and every stone from your little sling.

In conclusion, Brother Winter, let me ask you to be fair with us. If you hav any reasons to giv to show that we are all wrong, giv them, but we confess that we hav had quite enough of your assertions. Either giv proof that we are wrong, or else fire at some other class of people awhile just for a change.

Very truly yours, N. HUNT.

So. COTTONWOOD, UTAH, June 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav thought frequently when reading the contributions on the Mormon question that I would write a word or two myself, but hav neglected it until now. So long as any controversy goes on fairly I hav little interest in putting in a word, but any unfairness always attracts my attention and enlists my sympathy for the weaker side.

What I would say about the matter may not be new, but it may be true. If millions of Catholics are not only unmolested, but protected, by the United States government, while they are sworn enemies to every power except the pope of Rome, how is it that so much fuss is made about the Mormons?

It seems to me that this whole affair, at bottom, is nothing but religious jealousy, religious antipathy on the part of the other religious sects. They are all fishing in the same pond, and if the Mormons get away with the most of the fish, who can help it? Perhaps they hav the best bait. Let the human fish take the bait that suits them best. Let there be free competition between them all—no intermeddling by government to support one and suppress another. Trust the law that has ruled the universe—"the fittest will survive." Truth, left free to combat error, has nothing to fear.

If polygamy, as some claim, is such a violation of nature's laws, it will soon be abandoned by every sensible man and woman. If it be an improvement on mistress-keeping, prostitution, illegitimacy, etc., why not allow it a fair trial? It is a Bible doctrin, out and out. Bring to bear all the combined wisdom and effort of the missionary power, education, and moral suasion that can be mustered, but leave legislation, prison, powder and lead, out of the controversy altogether. My word for it, everything will go right. ANDREW CAHOON.

ALTON, ILL., Aug. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3 to renew my subscription.

I spent last winter in Los Angeles county, Cal., and had a nice time sitting under the orange-trees and picking oranges and eating them in December and January. We had but four frosts all winter, but not hard enough to injure crops; green peas all winter. Orange picking lasts the whole year round, for they will hang on the trees two years from the blossoms. You will see oranges at the end of that time hanging on the trees, but they lose their flavor after twenty months from blossom. As the trees blossom in February the old fruit drops off. Limes blossom the whole year round, and drop off as soon as ripe. Some trees had blossoms, green and ripe fruit, all on the same twigs.

I am one of your oldest subscribers. I took the third TRUTH SEEKER that was printed, and hav missed but two numbers. I am seventy years old, and do not know how much longer I shall take the paper. WM. A. GRAVES.

CLEOPATRA, MO., Aug. 23, 28[illegible]

MR. EDITOR: Your paper comes to us regularly every [illegible]nday evening, so we hav the leisure moments during the week for perusal and application of advantages of instruction. A few families read our books and papers, and a great many persons throughout the country speak in rebellious terms of the practical working of church-members. I hav lived here six years, and, in conversation with church-going people, hav maintained that we should look for something grander than was to be seen through that old rusty telescope of eclesiastical history, and the musty folios of bewildered commentators. A great many are tired of the hash, but round comes their pilot and tells them that the devil causes them to doubt. Inclosed I send you the petition for secularization. The names are of persons who hav come to stay, and I think will help all they can. G. W. DAY.

ELGIN, IOWA, Aug. 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find $5.15, for which please send books and tracts as elsewhere designated. I want to use them for missionary purposes at the camp-meeting which commences on the 3d of September.

I hav just been re-reading "A Realistic Meditation" in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Aug. 9th. I wish that article was in pamphlet form; I would order one hundred to start with. I could not possibly do without the dear old THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hav taken it for years and like it better every year. But I must confess I was disappointed when in your last issue I read the answer to the contribution above alluded to. I had supposed at least there might be somewhat of an argument made as against Mr. Wettstein; but to me Mr. Wm. Watson's reply is an entire failure. JAS. COOLEY.

ONTONAGON, Mich., Aug. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3, which I owe you for the splendid TRUTH SEEKER. I am much indebted to you for continuing to send it. I told you before that it was impossible for me to send the money, for I was up the Ontonagon River, where the majestic pine-tree nods familiarly to the stars. I enjoy John Peck, and Chainey—there are too many of them to name here. I also like to read the articles by the Spiritualists. They hav a very beautiful theory, if it is true. The more I read of their articles in your paper and elsewhere, the less faith I hav in ghosts, although it is next to impossible for me to hav any less faith than I hav in either gods or ghosts. I'll close by subscribing myself the eternal enemy of all gods.

NATIONAL MILITARY SOLDIERS' HOME,
MONTGOMERY, O., Sept. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I send you three dollars to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am in my seventy-sixth year. It is doubtful whether I last the year out. But I must do all the good I can while life continues. The Soldiers' Home is a hard place for a Liberal, where all sorts of religion are mixed up with all kinds of stimulating liquors, and a Methodist chaplain and a Catholic priest call twice a week. I am the only one that takes a Liberal paper out of four thousand inmates of the Central Soldiers' Home of Ohio. There are others that pretend to be Liberals, but their money they want for something else. JAMES U. STEWART.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Lives longest though he soonest die."

The Mouse and the Lion.

One summer day, a hungry little mouse,
Who thoroughly had searched all through the house,
Looking in vain for some small bit of scrap,
Went out of doors, and fell into a trap.

'Twas nicely baited with a bit of cheese;
The door stood wide; he crept with perfect ease
Close up to where the tempting morsel hung—
One nibble, and the cruel trap was sprung.

Just then a noble lion he chanced to see,
Who traveled with a large menagerie,
And early every morning left his lair
And strolled about to take the country air.

With trembling voice he called on him for aid,
"Why, certainly, of course," the lion said.
"It seems some thousand years or so ago
Your ancestors helped one of mine, you know.

"It now becomes my duty to repay
The favor shown to him, without delay."
He raised his foot, and with his mighty tread
He crushed the trap, and left poor mousie dead.

It oft occurs that over-zealous friends,
Who strive to help us to attain our ends,
With very best intentions overdo it,
And often giv us ample cause to rue it.

My Trip to Philadelphia.

The good and bad actions of the persons we meet show to us their moral standing, and should enable us to choose that which is good and noble, and to discard that which is mean and ignoble. The incidents I am about to relate will go to illustrate this contrast.

When I was about ten years of age, our family lived close to the canal, along which the boats laden with coal went daily in large numbers. The boats at that time were comparativly small, only carrying from thirty to forty tons of coal, and it required a great number to convey the amount needed. The crew consisted of a captain, bowsman, and driver. The latter had charge of the motiv power, consisting, usually, of an old horse or a pair of mules; valuable horses were seldom used. The driver had decidedly the worst part of the business, as it was expected that he would walk the greater part of the time, the horse having enough to do to drag along the heavy boat. In fact, one of the essential points of recommendation for a boat driver was his reputation as a good walker; and some captains made a difference of fifty cents a trip in favor of the driver who would not ride more than one-third of the way.

My conversations with many boat-drivers as they lay at the locks for turns to be let through from one level to the other, inspired me with a great desire to see the city of Philadelphia, in which place my father was born. They would tell long yarns about the great ships and steamboats lying at the docks. They never failed to tell of their exploits in climbing up into the rigging, and described the great shrouds, or ladders, on which they had ascended to the tops of the masts. Then there were the many towns and some cities along the way, and the lots of fun they had at a jam; or when they got into a crowd of boats and had to lay by for days to get past certain locks; and the generally good times they had when they once reached the great city. I used to think there were some rather fishy stories, such as seeing sturgeons ten feet long jump out of the water. I had heard of "Jonah and the whale," but I had no idea any other fish could be ten feet in length. At all events, their stories were spread out on the map of my mind like a great panorama on canvas, and I always engaged the boys in conversation to see how their stories tallied.

At last I gently suggested to my mother that I would like to take a trip on a boat to see Philadelphia, but to this I met with a decided snub. She was astonished at my idea of such a thing; said I was "too little, would get drowned," and numerous other objections she made. But I persisted, time and again, and would call her attention to all the boys smaller than myself that went by. I would say, "There goes a much smaller boy; why don't he get drowned?" I argued my case with the persistency of a criminal lawyer, until at last one day a captain came for a boy. (He had heard that I wanted to make a trip, of course he had, as I had left word at the locks privately to let anyone know who might want a boy). He promised all sorts of care of me, and agreed to pay all damages if he did not return me safe and sound. At last, after eyeing me very closely to see if I would not relent, mother said if I wanted to I might go, just that one trip.

I hurriedly got some some clothing together, and off I started, without seeing half of the family. It was a cloudy and rainy day, and as I began to get some distance away from home, I could feel a great choking sensation in my throat, and I began to say, "If I had only seen all my brothers and sisters before leaving." I began to realize that mother knew her chicken better than he knew himself; not until that time did I realize what a home and a mother were. I had left my kind and good mother, and father, and all my brothers and sisters behind me for a foolish desire to see a great city. Every step I took seemed to press harder upon me, and by the time we had made only four miles night had cast his sable mantle over us, and the captain said we would "tie up," as he resided in that place. So they—he and his bowsman—went off the boat after we had our supper, and that left me alone to worry over my sad plight.

A sadder boy of ten years of age I do not think ever lived than I was. There was no sleep for me. The more I tried to sleep the more I could not. These efforts brought on headache and heart-ache. My temples throbbed, and all my bones ached. Every now and then I would look out of the cabin window or door into the thick, black darkness in the direction of the "home, sweet home" I had so foolishly left. It was as dark as Egypt, and I was getting homesick. I thought my heart would break if I did not get relief. Tears of affection would stream down my cheeks like drops of rain, as I brought my home, in imagination, before me. How I loved everything in that home no language could tell, only tears; and the abundance of them seemed to giv me ease and comfort. What a provision of our natures! Only let the scalding tears flow, and the heart-ache will be lulled. What a cure for grief! But that is nature's remedy. I worried thus hour after hour, and, without my knowing it, I must at last hav dropped into a doze, for I dreamed that I was at home, contented and happy, and was forming resolutions that I never would leave it again—no, never! If any of the girls or boys want to avoid the terrible shock that I experienced, I advise them to go from home a little at a time; do not take so big a leap at first. I was like a little bird that made from the high nest among the branches my leap clear to the bottom at the first effort, and could not get back. Depend upon it, that homesickness, when far away from those we love best in the world, is the most terrible distress that can befall you, and should it become chronic your days on this earth will soon be numbered.

My naturally hopeful disposition, together with a reasonable amount of good child sense, came to my relief the next day, when I beheld the bright sun shedding his pleasant rays on the moist earth, and carrying off the clouds and fog occasioned by the previous day's rain, and I think it had something to do with removing the cloud which hung over me. I did not, however, get the pleasure I had anticipated from the start at anything that I met on the way. The great city was at last reached, and the bowsman was intrusted to fulfil a promis to take me to the theater, which was the first I had ever seen. Going to the theater was the quintessence of my expectations. It was to be the event, and we went. At that time the pit was the lowest seating in them, and the admission fee twelve and a half cents, boys half price. Now that is all changed. The pit contains the fashionable goers.

The play was "Richard III." The place was jammed, and, not finding anything but standing-room in the pit, my companion hoisted me upon the stage to the right of the footlights. I enjoyed the little I could see of the dress, etc., but there was nothing in tragedy that I liked, and when I beheld the murders of that play I was anything but delighted. Presently Richard got along to the visions of the ghosts of his victims, and when his wicked life began to tell upon him, his nervous twitchings, with his deformed back, and protruding eyes, cast at one time directly into mine, rather scared me, and I began to wish he would play something a little milder; but he became worse, and as he crouched down and almost crawled toward me, shaking like a leaf, and staring like a demon, in his warlike accouterments, I was suddenly seized with the impression that he was coming at me, and down I jumped upon the heads of the boys and men, crowded below me in the pit, which feat a great many could not help seeing, and the rowdies shouted, "Put him out! put him out!" And I can assure you that I was as ready to be put out as anyone you ever saw. I wanted to go, but my companion would not leave, and laughed and giggled so much at my fright that it brought back my courage, and I resolved to stand it at all hazards. By this time Richard had got along with his ghosts, which his imagination had conjured before his wicked mind, and, mastering his mental illusions, he brightened up and said, "Richard is himself again." I thought, "So am I," for I wanted my friend to place me upon the seat that I had previously occupied, so that I could see, but he snickered at me, and shook his head for "No."

In a few days I had taken in all of the great city I could, and we were about to start on the return home. My task was to take the horse around to Fairmount dam, and wait until the captain and bowsman poled the empty boat along the shallow side of the river for two miles. On leaving, I had no stick, and I was watching for a switch as I went along. Finally I rode up to a board fence and broke a small one off a tree, but in doing so I let the halter fall from my hand. Just then I leaned over the horse's neck to get it, and, as bad luck would hav it, the horse at that moment stepped upon it, and the jerk it gave his neck threw me on the ground before him, and he placed the weight of one foot squarely upon my arm, which weight fractured it. I may, however, hav broken it by the fall, as I went down head-first.

My cries arrested his attention, and the sensible old fellow actually turned around and came walking back to where I lay on the ground, and stood over me seeming to realize that I was hurt. It was quite a while before I could gather myself up. As I did so a mean-spirited boy came along, and seeing my condition he thought to take advantage of it. He knew just where the horse had to go, and, while I was suffering the greatest pain, he was plying his questions, and wanted me to giv him two cents for leading the horse a few hundred yards, and tying him fast. I had not a penny, but finally said, between my sobs, he might do so, and the captain would pay him; but then he wanted three cents more for waiting until the boat came. He expressed no sympathy for me in the least. I never, before nor since, witnessed such an absolutely selfish act. His only desire was to get some money, and this I regarded as a very mean and cowardly spirit. It is what I call an ignoble thing.

As we were parleying about it, a lady came out from one of the houses near by, and, hearing my sobs, she came to ascertain what was the trouble. And oh, what a good, loving, motherly soul she was! She was an angel! My own mother could not hav acted more kindly. I hav often wanted to meet her, and thank her for the interest she took in me. She had the look of sympathy, and the light of a woman's true heart beamed in her countenance. In less time than it takes me to write it, she had my whole case. I was a poor boat-boy, far away from home and friends, with a broken arm, and had been treated badly by that mean boy, too, whom she dismissed in short order, and tied the horse to the fence herself. All the while tears of sorrow for me were streaming down her handsome face (she was a handsome lady, about middle-aged, and a handsome woman in tears is an interesting picture to look upon). She took me into her parlor, dispatched a messenger into the city for a doctor, her family physician, who came as soon as possible, and adjusted my broken and swollen arm. All the while this good woman was attending me with a camphor-bottle, bathing my temples, and inspiring me with courage to bear the operation. The doctor seemed equally tender, and when he pressed extra hard, would soothe the hurt with an added word of encouragement. He made a skilful job of it, for which I hav often been thankful to him.

By this time the captain came to hand. He was a kind-hearted man, and wanted to pay the doctor, but that good man said, "Captain, if you feel like paying anything, you may giv it to the boy," and then gave him such instructions as were necessary to heal the broken limb.

"Oh, no," said the lady, "I intend to settle this myself. I sent for you, doctor, and I will pay you;" but he absolutely refused any compensation.

The incidents of my trip to Philadelphia are a part of my mind, stored away in the memory—that subtle, incomprehensible consciousness, which enables us to liv over again the years that hav departed forever—to remember the kind act, the motherly attentions, the sweet words, and to feel again the soothing hands that gently stroked the throbbing temples. These we never forget; and to get also the deep shades of the mental pictures it is necessary to look at those ignoble actions that often help to giv a picture a bolder relief. The contrasts of life—they are all necessary to develop the soul. It may seem a little queer to see how life is made up and arranged, but had I not met with the breaking of my arm, I had not found the mean-spirited boy, nor the kind doctor, nor, above all, the dear, good, kind-hearted lady I hav been writing about. It costs us suffering and heart-aches to learn the good of humanity.

I arrived home in safety, my arm soon healed, and has done many a hard day's work in paving my way in life. The captain paid me full wages, and acted like a gentleman, and I was cured of any more freaks at boating on the canal.

Literature.

New Books.

The shelf whereon are laid the books sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER office for review is piled high with recent publications. One man could not read them all as they appear even if in some moment of misguided enthusiasm he should decide to devote his life to that object. An exhaustiv review of all would make a volume as large as the largest of them. We will mention them as they come:

"The Significance of Wagner's 'Parsifal'" is the title of an octavo pamphlet of 23 pages by E. E. Schlaeger, translated by Miss Coleman, and bearing the imprint, "Minden i. Westf. J. C. C. Bruns' Verlag, 1884." The writer's object is to show that Wagner's aim in writing the opera "Parsifal" is "to save and preserve in the realms and by the magic power of art for future generations that one thing true and divine—the consciousness of which Christianity has lost on account of the mass of dogmas heaped upon it." In make-up this pamphlet is decidedly German. For price address the publisher as per imprint.

"The Diet Question, Giving the Reason Why," published by Fowler & Wells, has 99 12mo. pages, and sells at this office for 25 cents. This book givs the reason why some articles of diet are better than others, and shows that the best are the cheapest. The alleged relation of food to intellect and morals is touched upon, and the relativ value of different sorts of food is shown by analysis. The mechanical work is good and the type large and plain. Susanna W. Dobbs, M.D., is the author.

An able defense of Evolution and Positivism is that of W. D. Le Sueur, B.A., entitled, "Evolution and the Positiv Aspects of Modern Thought: in Reply to the Bishop of Ontario's Second Lecture on Agnosticism." The print is good; pp. 43. Price, probably, 25 cents. The pamphlet bears the stamp of the Montreal [Can.] Pioneer Freethought Club.

Dr. J. L. York, known and honored throughout the great West as a Liberal orator, has published a volume of "Freethought Lectures and Poems" in green and gold binding, dedicated to his wife, Permelia Ann York. The Lectures and most of the Poems are original, and all are good. The volume comprises 160 pages, elegantly printed. A portrait of the author faces the title page, and he is a handsome man. The price of the book is $1. Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER office.

Two pamphlets are at hand from Benj. R. Tucker, of Boston, publisher. The first is a poem by Wilfred Scawen Blunt—printed, according to promis, in the highest style of the art—entitled, "The Wind and the Whirlwind." It is a lament and a prophecy. Judging from the poem, Mr. Blunt ranks with Shelley as a poet. The price is 25 cents.——The second is "An Anarchist on Anarchy," by Elisee Reclus, followed by "A Sketch of the Criminal Record of the Author," by E. Vaughan. (Price 10 cents.) It is a lamentable fact that most men who hav endeavored to serve the people hav had criminal records. The history of Reclus's is told in strong, Victor Hugo-like language. Anarchists are audacious fellows, and win admiration for their bravery even if they meet with little sympathy for their cause. "An Anarchist on Anarchy" will giv the reader an idea of what Anarchists are trying to do.

Before the Arkwright Club of New England Mr. Robert P. Porter gave an address on "Protection and Free Trade To-Day." This is now published in pamphlet form and sells for 10 cents. The ground taken is highly protectiv. A circular accompanying the pamphlet sent to this office says: "For several years a student of the industrial progress of the West, and author of one of the most useful works on that section; for three years in charge of an important division of the census, next a member of the tariff commission; and then sent abroad for eighteen months, by the New York Tribune, to investigate the condition of labor in Great Britain and the Continent, the words of the author of the address on the tariff will carry weight with those anxious for a practical view of the tariff question."

Here is a big book on "The Abolition of the Presidency," by Henry C. Lockwood, of the New York Bar, published by Worthington, of this city. It it written in support of the idea, substantially, recommended to the attention of Liberals at the seventh Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, namely, "Abolition of the one-man power created in the form of the presidency of the United States, and the substitution of a revocable executiv council therefor." The writer believes that the trend of governmental evolution is in the direction here indicated. The book contains 315 octavo pages, printed on heavy paper. Price, $2.

"Notes on the Opium Habit," by Asa P. Meylert, M.D., Member of the Medical Society of the County of New York, etc., is an argument on the question of interdicting the use of narcotics, and treatment of the habit, which habit the writer condemns. Thirty-seven 12mo. pages; paper, 40 cents.

Mr. David Reeves Smith, a member of the Liberal Club, is the author of a work entitled "Ownership and Sovereignty: An Outline of a True Republic." This book appears before the public heartily recommended by Wendell Phillips in a letter to Edward Gordon Clarke, who had taken upon himself the task of writing the Introduction. Mr. Phillips regarded the work, to quote his own words, "as one of rare ability and great value; sure to set many men to thinking and likely to win the assent of many." The type and pages are large, the latter numbering 136. Price, $2.

"The Co-operative Commonwealth in Its Outlines: An Exposition of Modern Socialism," by Lawrence Gronlund, is a book that deserves a more extended notice than we are at present able to giv it in these columns. The New York Sun devotes two columns to a review of the work; from which we quote the following:

"The best account of German or state Socialism that we hav seen in English is contained in a book called "The Co-operative Commonwealth," by Laurence Gronlund (Lee & Shepard). This little volume, of some 280 pages, sets forth with admirable conciseness and distinctness all the leading tenets of the Socialistic philosophy and political economy, for which the inquisitiv reader has been hitherto compelled to ransack a multitude of books and pamphlets for the most part printed in the German language. Whether one is disposed to look hopefully or distrustfully at the new social order, formulated by Carl Marx, and advocated by Lassalle, no American reader who desires to be well informed can afford to neglect the lucid, learned, and often eloquent exposition which Mr. Gronlund offers us."

Mr. Gronlund has the indorsement, we believe, of the leaders in the Socialistic movement of the day, and is regarded as among the ablest of its expositors. Price of "The Co-operative Commonwealth," $1.50.

"The Fallacies in 'Progress and Poverty,'" by William Hanson, is, according to the publishers, who hav the advantage over us of having read it:

"A bold attack by a clear-headed observer and most candid writer on leading points and arguments made by Mr. Henry George in his well-known 'Progress and Poverty' and 'Social Problems.' His sharp logic brings into clear light the errors that mar the reasoning of the books above named, and shows how inconsistent and impracticable are the methods of reform advised therein. The work is written for the people, from the point of view of the practical man and Christian philosopher."

The author cannot see that God is the author of misery; rather must it, he says, be traced to a transgression of his laws. Nor, in the opinion of the writer, does the recognition of or a belief in a supreme being detract in the least from the scientific quality of his essays. Agnosticism, he admits, "has its legitimate uses and merits respect." A Christian philosopher fair enough to make this admission, it may be presumed, will deal justly with whatever subject he may treat upon. Price of "The Fallacies of 'Progress and Poverty,'" $1.00.

"The Conventional Lies of Our Civilization," is the title of a book that has been prohibited in Europe, and translated and published in America by L. Schick, of Chicago. The edition before us is "from the German of Max Nordau." As will be seen by the title, Mr. Nordau opens up a large field, in which he could scarcely be embarrassed for want of material. He finds lies to talk about in religion, in monarchy and aristocracy, in politics, economy, and matrimony, besides general miscellaneous lies. While these are all mercilessly exposed, it is by no means certain that the author has not originated new ones. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

"Antichrist" desires to say a good word for Sister Slenker's "Little Lessons" for children. They are most of them judiciously selected from choice articles in a standard encyclopedia. Mrs. Antichrist has read some of them and has commended the book to her nephew, who, though he has not been to school, is able at seven years of age to read, understand, and profit by such "Lessons." Price, 20 cts., paper; 15 cts., boards. Order them of Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Pulaski Co., Va.

Professor Nathaniel N. Pierce, "Psychometric Counselor and Healing Medium, of Philmont, N. Y., formerly of Putnam, Conn.," sends a 34-page 4 x 6 pamphlet entitled, "Directions for cleansing the Blood and Curing all Forms of Disease that the Human Family is Subject To, Without the Use of Any Medicin Whatever." The writer thinks the question is settled that "doctors of medicin must go." The publication in question is an endeavor to help turn the rascals out. Thirty cents is the sum charged for the work—cheap enough if it will save doctors' bills.

Fifteen cents in stamps will buy Professor J. W. Caldwell's pamphlet (52 pages, 7x4 1-2) entitled, "The 'Delusion' of Spiritualism Compared with a Belief in the Bible. If the History of the Creation and Fall of Man is Not True, There is No Need of a Jesus to Save from the Fall, which is Proven Untrue by the Bible Itself, 'So Plain that a Wayfaring Man may not Err Therein.' How to Obtain the Best Spiritual Phenomena. Instructions for Becoming a Medium for All Kinds of Manifestations, Including Full Materialization. A Sharp Reply to the Ungentlemanly and Violent Tirade of Talmage. A Valuable Book for All Spiritualists to Read or Loan to their Skeptical Neighbors or Friends." That is the title of it. The author would like to loan this book to those who are willing to read and circulate it. His address is 401 Center St., Meriden, Conn.

"Rome in America," published by Funk & Wagnalls, New York, givs the views of the Rev. Justin D. Fulton, D.D., of Brooklyn, on papacy. The cover bears this significant sentence from Pope Pius IX.: "The only country in the world where I am really pope is the United States of America." A portrait and sketch of the life of Dr. Fulton are given. One hundred and sixty-four pages, with index. Price, in paper, 35 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Company.

"Rules of the Theosophical Society [of India], together with an Explanation of Its Objects and Principles." By the General Council—Damodar K. Mavalankar and Mortimer Marble, Recording Secretaries, Madras, India.

The name of no author is given to a substantial 90-page pamphlet entitled "Biblical Anthology: A Collection of Passages Illustrating the Purity and Morality of the Bible." The word "anthology" means, as here used, a collection of beautiful passages. The work of this unknown compiler has been anticipated by the publication of "The Holy Bible Abridged."

"Thoughts on Religion," by Thomas Douglas, of Warren, O., is a strong argument against the Christian superstition. "Religion," he says, "is superstition in fashion; superstition is religion out of fashion." With epitaph of author. Address as above.

"THE BIBLE ANALYZED."

MR. EDITOR: Some weeks ago I received from your office a large and beautifully bound book bearing the above title. I hav examined it with care, and I now take pleasure in saying that in clearness of style and sledge-hammer logic, it surpasses any work on theology that I ever read. The author, Col. John R. Kelso, is peculiarly skilful in forcing his opponents into dilemmas in which, choose whichever horn they may, they are hopelessly lost. They might as well try to refute the multiplication table as to try to refute his arguments. This book will undoubtedly do much toward the breaking down of superstitious bigotry and intolerance, and the building up of universal mental liberty. No Liberal should be without it, and every Liberal should do what he can to place it before the world generally. Let us all help in this good work.

Although, as stated above, I hav carefully examined this book, I did not need to do so to know its merits. A portion of it was written in my house, and I read it in manuscript. For many years I hav known the author intimately, two of these years as a guest in my own house; and knowing his excellence as a man in all the relations of life, I love him as a brother, and feel a brother's interest in his success in the great and good work in which he is so earnestly engaged. J. D. HARP.

Modesto, Cal.

"The Bible Analyzed," as well as Col. Kelso's other works, is published by the Truth Seeker Company, 33 Clinton Place, New York city, and may be obtained of the publishers or the author himself at Modesto, Cal. Price $3.00.

MR. EDITOR: We believe it impossible that anyone not hopelessly blinded by orthodoxy can read "The Bible Analyzed" without enthusiasm, or without desiring to encourage others to partake of its excellence. Opening it at random, as we did on several occasions, the attention is at once riveted by paragraphs worthy to be used as missionary documents in the cause of Freethought.

So clearly is every point brought forth that from any page may be taken a forcible sermon on some weakness of the subject in hand. Yet the general aim of the work is not at all impaired by the finish given to its component parts, but is rather ennobled by it, as the care given by the builder to each stone insures the perfection of the building. "The Bible Analyzed" is precisely what its name indicates—a taking apart and an examination of every particle of assumed evidence in the foundation on which faith in the book rests; and it seems that no portion has escaped a rigid though calm investigation.

We would urge upon all friends of Freethought the perusal of this book. If you can afford to hav but one Liberal work in your library, you will find that this one treats of all the vital questions of the theme. Procure it if you hav several Freethought works, for you will find some new thought on every page. Hav it, no matter what degree of development you may hav attained in Liberalism, and we are not afraid to assure you of satisfaction from your purchase. EVA V. COLLINS.

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This new book is a gem. It is a model in every respect. In fact, one of the richest, brightest, best ever issued.

It contains, besides the celebrated "Decoration Day Oration," never before published, and all the famous "tributes" heretofore printed in various shapes, but never brought together till now, many other gems selected from the speeches, arguments, lectures, letters, table-talks and day-to-day conversations of the author.

The work is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it.

In the more elegant styles of binding, this volume is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

In workmanship the volume is a masterpiece. The type is large and beautiful; the paper heavy and richly tinted; the presswork faultless; and the binding, as perfect as the best materials and skill can produce. D. M. BENNETT'S LAST WORK.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

FOUR LARGE VOLUMES.

With a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I. and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Late editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know the circumstances under which this work was written. The last words penned by the great author were for the fourth volume which was nearly completed at his death, and which will now contain an account of his world-lamented death and burial. MR. Bennett was a very patient and faithful chronicler of the habits and customs of the different peoples of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. Particular attention is paid to the progress of Freethought in the various countries he visited, and the morality of so-called pagan nations is contrasted with the morality of Christian countries, much to the detriment of the latter The work is a

Freethinker's History of the World.

This work and "A TRUTH SEEKER IN EUROPE" should be in every Liberal's library Besides its intrinsic worth it is a memento of one of the greatest Freethinkers the world has known—of one who ranks with Voltaire and Paine in the force and clearness of his writings.

Remarkable Cure of Paralysis in One Week.

CINCINNATI, Dec. 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: As I feel greatly indebted to you for the benefit I hav received from your treatment, and the use of your Magnetic appliances, I can say without hesitation to those afflicted as I hav been that the effect was simply marvelous. Two weeks ago I was stricken with paralysis in my right arm and could not use it at all, but after wearing a suit of your MAGNETIC CLOTHING for one week, can use it quite as well as ever. I hav also been troubled with Dyspepsia and Kidney Complaint for a number of years, from which I hav suffered intensely, and, although doctoring all the time, never found but temporary relief. Since putting on your appliances I hav experienced great benefit, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav in the past two weeks, will soon be well. I would, therefore, recommend to those suffering as I hav your Magnetic appliances as the only means of effecting a sure cure. Yours respectfully,

WM. H. CLEMMER,
No. 80 Eastern avenue.

Remember that the same appliances which will effect a cure in a case of Paralysis will at the same time eradicate CATARRH or DYSPEPSIA in the same patient. We do not, like the Old School Physician, change medicins every day until, after dosing the patient almost to death, he may possibly strike something (if he is very skilful) that brings relief for the time being.

Neuralgia of the Heart of Six Years Standing Cured in Three Weeks.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., Dec. 11, 1882.

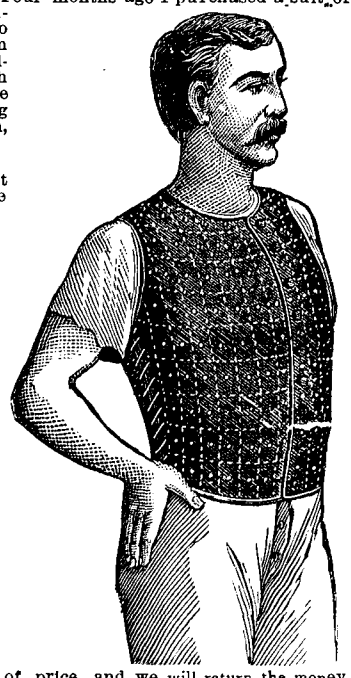
DR. L. TENNEY—Dear Sir: After wearing one of your MAGNETIC VESTS for about three weeks, I was entirely cured of Neuralgia of the Heart and Side, which had been a source of misery to me for the last six years. I had tried numerous remedies before without benefit, but as soon as I put on the MAGNETIC VEST I got relief instantly. With unbounded gratitude, I remain

Yours respectfully,
H. A. BROWN.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been under drug treatment for eight years with nervous prostration and female weakness:

OSBORN, O., Dec. 15, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY: Your letter just received; also the Clothing on Tuesday last. Fitted perfectly. FELT BETTER FROM THE FIRST HOUR I HAD THEM ON. Am not joking, and if I improve as rapidly as I hav since Tuesday, will soon be well. Will report again soon. Respectfully yours, E. J. K.



This lady reports herself entirely cured in less than six weeks after putting on the garments, and, although in bed, unable to get out, when applied, she nevertheless was able to ride twenty miles in two days after the application. The lady's name can be had upon application at this office, by anyone desiring to communicate with her.

Ladies, read the following testimony from a lady who had been suffering for two years with an Ovarian Tumor, and who had been told that nothing but the knife would save her life, and the chances were as 9 to 1 against recovery. In four months' time she is perfectly well, and has not taken a dose of medicin since putting on the appliances. Consult us when your physician tells you he can do nothinog for you; it will pay you.

SHULLSBURG, WIS., November 19, 1882.

DR. L. TENNEY, Dear Sir: About two years ago my health began to fail me; I became nervous, lost all desire for food, and, in fact, began to fail rapidly, so that I became alarmed and consulted several physicians of St. Louis, at which place I was then stopping, all of whom declared that I had an Ovarian Tumor, and that the only thing that would save my life would be the knife. About six months ago I grew rapidly worse, and had about made up my mind to take the only course that seemed left to me, and submit to an operation, when my attention was called to the Eureka Magnetic Appliances. As a drowning man will catch at a straw, so did I catch at this faint hope of a cure. Four months ago I purchased a suit of your appliances. From the very first I felt invigorated, the tumor, which had extended entirely across my abdomen, began to decrease, my pains became less from day to day, until now I am as well as I ever was in my life. Since putting on the appliances I hav not taken a single dose of medicin. My bowels, which before were constipated, are now regular. I would therefore cheerfully recommend them to anyone suffering as I hav, believing that they will do all and more than you claim for them. I remain,

Gratefully yours, MRS. MARY J. STEWART.

Gems of Thought.

OF course a man will accept the evidence of persons with whom he is acquainted, and whom he knows to be men of veracity, when they make a statement that is probable, that is not impossible; but from this it does not follow that he should believe persons wholly unknown to him when they proclaim utter impossibilities.—D. M. Bennett.

TRUTH must be investigated without any side glance to the consequences which that investigation may hav upon our hopes. Our faith is sure to fail us in the hour of trial if we hav based it on consciously or suspectedly fallacious grounds, and maintained it by wilfully closing our eyes to the flaws in its foundations.—Greg's Creed of Christendom.

A THEOLOGY which defends itself by forbidding or limiting inquiry, and by tabooing reason, must necessarily be an unreasonable theology. It declares itself to be devoid of reason in its very condemnation of reason. If it were itself rational, it would hav no objection to being submitted to the test of reason and inquiry. Things born of the light do not fear the light.—Sunderland's Orthodoxy.

IF you should ask me what God is, or what his character and nature are, I should follow the example of Simonides, who, when Hiero the tyrant proposed the same question to him, desired a day to consider it. When he required his answer the next day, Simonides begged two days more, and as he kept constantly desiring double the number which he had required before, instead of giving the answer, Hiero with surprise asked him his meaning in doing so. "Because," says he, "the longer I meditate upon it, the more obscure it appears to me."—Cicero.

FEW hav sufficient knowledge and firmness to relinquish all thoughts of surviving their mortality; men are ignorant upon the subject, and imagin that some sense of their existence will remain after death; with such pertinacity do they cling to the frail body that is about to be consigned to the grave. Whatever has changed its form, has undergone dissolution; the former form has disappeared—in fact, certain bodies are only distributed among other bodies, and thus their organization and identity are destroyed. In the slow lapse of time even the aspect of the world changes; no one thing remains perpetually the same.—Lucretius.

> EARTH, that nourished thee, shall claim
> Thy growth, to be resolved to earth again;
> And, lost each human trace, surrendering up
> Thine individual being, shalt thou go
> To mix forever with the elements;
> To be a brother to the insensible rock
> And to the sluggish clod which the rude swain
> Turns with his share and treads upon.
> —Bryant's Thanatopsis.

JESUS CHRIST, like Mohammed, provided only two abodes for the souls of men: one in heaven with his father, the other in hell, where the fire was never quenched. It was felt, however, by the general Christian world that this sharp separation of all mankind into black and white, goats and sheep, was quite untenable. Hence the Catholic institution of purgatory, which, whatever may be said against it, is a wise and liberal modification of the harsh doctrin of Christ, affording a resource for the vast intermediate mass who are neither wholly virtuous nor wholly wicked, and providing an agreeable exercise for that natural piety which prompts us to mingle the names of departed friends in our devotions, whether (as in Africa) to pray to them, or (as in Europe) to pray for them.—Amberley.

THERE is no great merit in taking care of one's own interests, whether it be in this world or the next. The man who leads a truly religious life in order to go to heaven is not more to be admired than the man who leads a regular and industrious life in order to make a fortune in the city; and the man who endeavors to secure a celestial inheritance by going to church, and by reading chapters in the Bible, and by having family prayers, and by saying grace in falsetto with eyes hypocritically closed [or turned up, like a duck's in a thunder-storm], is not above the level of those who fawn and flatter at oriental courts in order to obtain a monopoly or an appointment.—Winwood Reade.

SCIENCE is, I believe, nothing but trained and organized common sense, differing from the latter only as a veteran may differ from a raw recruit; and its methods differ from those of common sense only so far as the guardsman's cut and thrust differ from the manner in which a savage wields his club. The primary power is the same in each case, and perhaps the untutored savage has the more brawny arm of the two. The real advantage lies in the point and polish of the swords man's weapon, in the trained eye quick to spy out the weakness of the adversary; in the ready hand prompt to follow it in the instant. But, after all, the sword exercise is only the hewing and poking of the club-man developed and perfected. —Huxley.

THE good man not only will not dare to do, he will not even allow himself to think, what he dares not proclaim.—Cicero

RELIGIOUS liberty had not then (the Middle Ages) been born; but the priests from whom our mediæval ancestors learned the duty of persecution themselvs learned it from the Jewish books, which prescribe the wholesale massacer of the people in idolatrous cities, and punish with death by stoning the worship of strange gods, blasphemy, Sabbath-breaking, and every kind of offense against religion. The most hideous of all Christian superstitions—witch-burning—flowed from the same source.—Toronto Bystander (April).

THAT science and criticism, acting—thanks to the liberty of opinion won by political effort—with a freedom never known before, hav delivered us from a mass of dark and degrading superstitions, we own with heartfelt thankfulness to the deliverers, and in the firm conviction that the removal of false beliefs, and of the authorities and institutions founded on them, can not prove, in the end, anything but a blessing to mankind.—Goldwin Smith.

A PETITION FOR STATE SECULARIZATION.

To the Honorable Senators and Members of the House of Representatives of the United States Congress:

A republican form of government being based on liberty, equality, and fraternity, as both means and end, involves the separation of Church and State, whose union is the worst form of class-legislation and the most infallible sign of arbitrary power. A house divided against itself cannot stand. The institutions of this Commonwealth should be made homogeneous throughout. Impartial protection of all citizens in their equal rights and liberties, by encouraging the free movement of mind, promotes the establishment of truth in whatever direction. Any infringement by government of this absolute equality of its citizens is the parent of manifold evil, a national crime committed against that natural "justice" which, as the Constitution declares, this government was founded to "establish."

And yet, though the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States says, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof," there does exist a union of Church and State, which gives to Christianity moral and material aid, and so proscribes other religions and forms of belief and unbelief, while taxing these also for the support of that special religion.

The ways in which this old alliance between Church and State still survives among us are:

1. Recognition of God and Christianity in State Constitutions.
2. Exemption of Church property from taxation.
3. Appropriations of public money for sectarian purposes.
4. Religious exercises, as the reading of the Bible, etc., in the public schools.
5. Laws enforcing the observance of the Sabbath on the authority of the Bible.
6. Religious test-oaths in courts of justice and on instalment into office.
7. Chaplaincies in the Legislature, the Army, and the Navy.
8. Fast and Thanksgiving Proclamations, which contain theological ideas that may or may not be acceptable to the citizen.
9. The vague and indeterminate sense in which the words civil and sacred are used when applied to the marriage contract; and the appeal to God or the Holy Scriptures by some of the states, as the final authority on marriage.
10. Making morality subject to church dogma, by describing it as Christian, instead of natural, morality.
11. The license rather than liberty given to religion by the first amendment to the United States Constitution, by forbidding Congress to make any law "prohibiting the free exercise thereof," which, means really "the free exercise" of whatever anyone chooses to call "religion."

The necessity for this separation of Church and State is more apparent now than ever before, because of the still greater diversity of religious beliefs, the many forms of dissent from the religion which receives State patronage, and the growing signs of sectarian strife and ambition in the arena of politics. And emphasis needs to be given to the fact that the union of Church and State is a great hindrance to the employment of right methods in dealing with many questions of reform now demanding attention. And most essential is it at all times, and especially in the present, in order to secure for the law its due respect and observance, that the people's representatives should exhibit the strictest fidelity to their trusts by following the law in its letter and spirit.

Your petitioners, therefore, pray that immediate action be taken by the law-making power to bring into harmony the theory and practice of our government in making the following principle a part of the fundamental law of the land by amendment to the United States Constitution:

The total separation of Church and State, by prohibiting Congress or any State, County, Municipality, or Township from enacting any law that infringes the rights of conscience, or favors any practices in the name of religion, or of aught else, that interfere with private right or the public welfare.

Odds and Ends.

A BOSTON girl never speaks of the "naked truth." She refers to it as "truth divested of apparel."

"HAS George proposed yet, Emily?" "No, ma; but he did the next thing to it last evening." "What did he do?". "He asked me if I thought paregoric injurious to teething children."

"YOU did not pay very close attention to the sermon, I fear, this morning." "Oh, yes, I did, mamma." "Well, what did the minister say?" "He said the picnic would start at ten o'clock Thursday morning, and oh, ma, can I go?"

"MY dear, did you hear that Deacon S. fell asleep during the sermon last Sunday and tumbled out of his pew?" "I did not," she said. "Yes, it's fact. The deacon is a very lucky man." "Why?" she asked. "Because when he fell out of his pew he struck aisle, you know."

MASKED hugging patties are popular at church fairs in Missouri. By paying fifteen cents a man is allowed to hug a girl, but he is first blindfolded. It makes a man awful mad, however, to find, on removing the bandage from his eyes, that he has been hugging his own wife. Still, there's a novelty about it.

A WIDOW was taking the fresh air in Central Park with her two children, when she met a former lover, with whom she entered into conversation. "I am completely broken up, Amelia," he said, seizing her hand. "There is no telling what I might not say and do if it were not for these children." "Children," said the fond mother, pushing them away, 'run over yonder where the goat carriages are, and play until I send for you."

LEW CAMPBELL, the "One Spoon Baking Powder" man, who travels South, is, as those who know him will testify, quite a pious young man, and recently he was invited by a lady to dinner. The guests were all seated, and the lady, turning to Lew, said: "Mr. Campbell, will you ask a blessing?" "Wha—wha—wha—I beg your pardon, madam," he stammered, dropping his napkin and his jaw at the same time. "Will you please ask a blessing?" she repeated. Then she bowed her head, and so did everybody else, and poor Lew looked down at his plate and stuttered: "Lor—Lord, hav mercy on these poor vittles. Amen."

"YES," said the editor to the new political writer, "your article in some regards is very well written, but there are fatal objections to printing it as it stands. Unless you can fix it over a little we shall be obliged to reject it. Yes, the premises are all correct and your argument is perfect, but then you hav neglected to say anything about the political caldron beginning to boil, or the marshaling of the clans, or the tramp of the cohorts, or the grand uprising of the people in support of our man, or the political death of the other fellow. These little matters seem to you, perhaps, of no consequence, but they are essential, sir, indispensably essential, to a political article, sir, and without them a political article isn't worth the paper it is written upon."

H. W. BEECHER'S change of heart in regard to supporting Cleveland, as Mr. Lincoln would say, reminds a writer in Scissors of a little story. In the good old Knickerbocker days in New York, a Dutch judge had three brother Dutchmen brought before him for being drunk. The first, being called, was by his judgeship asked: "Hans, vhas you drunk?" "Yes, shudge, I vhas drunk." "And vhat did yon got drunk on?" asked the judge. "Rum," said the culprit. "Den I fines you ten dollars." The next acknowledged getting drunk on beer. "Den," said the judge, "I fines you five dollars." The third pleading guilty, was asked: "Vhat did you get drunk on?" "I got drunk on punch," he answered. After a little reflection and a long breath, the judge said: "You got drunk on punch, den I fines you noding at all, for I gets drunk on punch myself sometimes."

THE SONG OF THE SEASON.

> Gaily the candidate
> Seeketh the bar,
> Where thirsty citizens
> Throng from afar,
> Singing, "In search of thee
> Hither we come,
> Candidate, candidate,
> Set up the rum."
> Hark! 'tis the candidate
> Calls them by name;
> Up to the parapet
> Swiftly they come.
> And still his song's heard
> All through the din—
> "Thizz times it's zon me,
> Se'mm muppagin!"

"I CAN remember," said Henry Ward Beecher, "when I received an old cow in payment for a bad debt. It was a very bad debt, and I came to consider it a bad payment. She was a thin cow, but the former owner said she was better than she looked. being a cross between the Jersey and the Durham, She looked as if she might hav been a cross between an old hair trunk and an abandoned hoopskirt. I kept the brute three days, and no one, except, perhaps, Lieut. Atwell, could ever appreciate the suffering I endured in that time. The first night she broke through the fence and reduced to a pulp all the underclothing belonging to my next-door neighbor. She put her horns through my bath tub and ate up all my geraniums. She was to giv three gallons of milk a day, but she seemed short just then and never had that to spare while we kept her. The second day she walked into the kitchen, upset a pan of butter and a tub of lard. Then she fell down a well, and when I got her out, at a cost of $5, she took the colic, whooping cough, or something, and kept us awake all night. Not a green thing was left in my garden; my neighbor's peach-trees and the rope on which his underwear grew were as bare of fruit as a singletree, and he did not hav a twig of shrubbery left. My neighbor came over to see me, and said: 'Now, I don't desire any quarrel, but I want you to keep your cow out of my shrubbery.' 'And I want you, my friend,' said I, 'to keep your shrubbery out of my cow.'"

Notes and Clippings.

"I AM glad salvation's free," shouted the preacher. He then added, "We will now take up a collection."

THE Christian Register is credited with registering the appended joke: "Paul did not liv in clover, but he cultivated Timothy with good success."

OF the 300,000 Paris mechanics and day laborers, only 50,000 belong to trades unions, though the example of organization in England is close by.

AFTER careful inquiry, the Moravians (United Brethren) of Bethelem, Pa., hav decided that the Esquimaux of Alaska present greater obstacles to conversion than any other people on earth.

ABOUT the time the congregation is singing the loudest "I want to be an angel," along comes an earthquake, and the manner in which the congregation suddenly changes its mind is astonishing.

THE Rev. W. Cornforth, Wesleyan minister, of Nottingham, England, has just resigned his position because he cannot pledge himself to a "definit and positiv belief in the absolutely endless suffering of the unsaved."

THE psalmist would "rather be a doorkeeper in the house of the Lord than to dwell in the tents of wickedness." Some joker has said that this is because he would hav an easier time of it in the summer, and get his evenings to himself.

THE Burlington Free Press says that the wife of a Methodist preacher in Georgia takes turns with him at preaching. When his parishioners see the old gentleman digging worms in the back yard Sunday morning they know that it is his day off.

"THE secular press," says General Booth of the Salvation Army, "treats us very considerately and fairly in England. It is the so-called Christian press that is hostil and scurrilous." So far, it seems, THE TRUTH SEEKER is the only religious paper that has published anything in defense of this interesting body of cranks.

WARNER WILSON deliberately got drunk when about to die, at Vernon, Mich., because he had observed, throughout his religious experience, that intoxication always aroused him to especial fervor. Mr. Wilson's observations may contribute somewhat toward explaining why so many bottles are found on the grounds after a religious camp-meeting.

AT the Schuetzen Park, near Philadelphia, on Sunday, beer drinking, trapeze performing, band playing, negro minstrels, and target-shooting were in full blast, but the managers refused to permit a number of boys to play baseball. Of course the line between innocent and vicious Sunday amusements has got to be drawn somewhere.

ONE of Massachusetts' judges will not believe a professional spy whose evidence is not corroborated. He acquitted a hotel keeper accused of liquor selling, although a law-and-order league agent who had boarded two months in the house swore to regular sales. Anthony Comstock, it would appear, has brought the professional spy system into disrepute.

THE Chinese city of Foo-Chow, made interesting by French capture, is surrounded by a wall thirty feet high and twelve feet wide at the top. The streets are narrow and filthy, but from a distance, in consequence of trees and hills, the place is picturesque. The inhabitants excel in the manufacture of ornaments from nativ soapstone. The climate is hot and enervating.

IT is possible that the so-called divine mind is not altogether destitute of humor. The other day, says the St. Paul Herald, a little cherub of but a very few summers sat at the window of her residence on East Fourth street, when a genuin dude walked wearily by. His legs were phantom like, his shoes long and pointed, his dress foppish, he wore a single eyeglass, and carried a diminutiv rattan cane. As he stared about idiotically the little one said: "Mamma, did God make that man?" "Yes, my darling." The little one looked again and giggled, and with a merry twinkle in her eye said: "Mamma, God likes to hav fun just as much as anybody, don't he?"

THE mayor of Brainerd, Minn., has issued an order prohibiting Mother Hubbard costumes in the streets. The girls wore them scant and thin, he says, and, as a guardian of public morals, he felt bound to interfere. It is to be regretted that this mayor is not a governor, as he could then, like the governor of Iowa in dealing with grasshoppers, appoint a day of fasting, and pray the wicked things out of the state.

THE old question whether a smoker can tell with his eyes shut if a cigar is lighted or not is revived by a statement in the London Graphic that there are scarcely any smokers among the blind. Soldiers and sailors who lose their sight in action sometimes continue to smoke for a little while, but, as a rule, they soon giv up the habit. They say it givs them no pleasure when they cannot see the smoke, and that they cannot taste smoke unless they see it.

BISHOP COXE of western New York says that during his twenty years of observation in that field there hav been some improvements in religion and morality, but the increase of impiety and Infidelity is, on the whole, appalling. "The most blasphemous publications are circulated, and frightful Atheism uttered." The bishop adds that immorality abounds. Being in the church, where much of it exists, he may be taken as an authority of average reliability.

HENRY LAMB, aged 97, who died in Fairfax county, Va., recently, long resided near Mount Vernon. To his dying day he asserted that the vault containing the remains of Washington had been violated and the skull carried away to France, where it was sold to a firm of phrenologists. He said that the desecration was committed by the sailors of a French ship anchored in the Potomac near Mount Vernon, and that the skull which was taken away was replaced by that of a negro servant of Col. Fairfax.

AN extraordinary offer is made to rich maiden ladies by Rev. Dr. Gordon, of St. Andrew's, Glasgow. Boasting that he was the first Anglican in Scotland to burn incense at the worship of God, he explains that he wants money to keep up the ceremony. He goes on to say that he wants "a small chime of small bells"—five bells will do; "and the first five wise virgins whose hearts shall be opened to giv a bell each, or a subscription toward the belfry, shall be rung into the kingdom of heaven by the suffrages of J. F. G. Gordon, D.D."

A METHODIST minister once started a church in a young Western town, but for want of pecuniary support was soon obliged to abandon it. His farewell sermon to the lukewarm brethren was characterized by more heat than elegance. He ended thus: "At the last day the Lord will say to St. Peter, 'Where is your flock?' and St. Peter will answer, 'Here, Lord.' He will say to Calvin, 'And where are your sheep?' and Calvin will reply, 'Here, Lord.' And so all the shepherds can answer. But when he asks me, 'Where are your sheep?' how will I feel when I am compelled to reply, 'Lord, I havn't any; mine were all hogs?'"

SEVERAL persons tell the Paris Gaulois that having written to the pope they receive no reply. The editor explains that as the holy father's correspondence is very large, there are secretaries who go through it, classify it, and destroy or submit the missivs to his holiness according as they think proper. Mgr. Boccali, the private chamberlain, has charge of this difficult duty. It sometimes happens that a letter to which the writer attaches the greatest importance is in this way thrown into the waste basket. If you want to hav a letter to the pope surely reach its destination, inclose it in three envelopes, all three sealed, and each one bearing this superscription: "To his holiness, Pope Leo XIII., Prefect of the Congregation of the Holy Office at the Vatican (Personal), Rome." The prelate in charge opens the first envelope, then the second, but at the third he is obliged, under penalty of excommunication, not to open it, and to hand it to the holy father.

THE list of modern books which are not to be allowed in the public libraries of Russia includes translations of works by Agassiz, Bagehot, Huxley, Zola, Lassale, Lubbock, Lecky, Louis Blanc, Lewes, Lyall, Marx, Mill, Reclus, Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations," and "Theory of Moral Sentiments," and Herbert Spencer's works. A person found reading THE TRUTH SEEKER in that country would probably be exiled without delay. It is well known that a gentleman formerly connected with the Liberal Club, having married a Russian lady, and now living in Russia, deems it unsafe to correspond with his friends in America, and has requested that his name should not hereafter, even in this country, be mentioned in connection with his former field of labor. Such are the beauties of a country where the "Almighty," and not the people, confers powers upon its rulers.

THE following dialog from the Wall Street News contains an explanation of the popular mystery shrouding the origin of Baptist preachers: "Father, is Jay Gould a bad man at heart?" "Why, no, my son. Mr. Gould is all right at heart." "In case he should be shrunk out of the market, would he turn pirate or do some desperate thing?" "Oh, no, no! If Mr. Gould's stocks should continue to wilt until some day he discovered that he hadn't change enough to pay for his lunch, he would be calm and tranquil, though, perhaps, a little tired?" "But what would he do?" "Do? Why, where does the West get all its Baptist preachers from? Mr. Gould might not be sent to a very large town, nor a very large congregation, but in the midst of his trials and tribulations he is supported by the thought that the wolf of starvation can never find room on his door step to sit and howl."

SOMETHING new in the way of a religious sect has turned up in New York. This account of it is gathered from last Monday's Sun: A man with a Derby hat lighted seventy-two gas jets in the lecture hall of Masonic Temple last night. After he had blown out the taper, twenty-nine men and women walked in and sat down far apart from each other. At 7:30 o'clock, a big man with a long white beard and a silk traveling cap, and carrying a pile of pamphlets in his hands, and a number of red-bound books under either arm, climbed up on the platform and said he was a "member of the only church in the world that takes the scriptures as a criterion." He followed this with the remark that he would preach and take up no collection afterward. He spoke for one hour on "The Kingdom of Heaven Contrasted with the Kingdom of God." His delivery was so singular that the auditors could hear but one word in every ten. When he had done he threw his pamphlets and red-bound books on the floor at his feet, and offered ther for sale at from one cent to half a dollar each, according to size. One man bought a small pamphlet for a cent, and one woman a bigger one for six cents. Then the white-bearded preacher said he was James Cumming, and that he had been sent forth by J. J. Jezreel, of Kent, England, to giv the people of America a chance to embrace the only perfect faith by joining Israel's International College in Kent. There were fifty young people studying the faith there when he left. Eight had previously graduated and come to America. They had brought eight harps with them, and could play them, but they weren't like the Salvation Army recruits. Disciples of the new faith, Mr. Cumming said, didn't sing until they knew how. No bad singing was tolerated. Mr. Cumming closed his service by readin a hymn out of a red book, because there nobody present to sing it. Lastly he shu p the hymn book and invited everybody w..o wanted to know anything more about the new faith to climb up one flight of stairs at 27 Greenwich avenue to-day and to-morrow, and ask him questions. He would answer everything, he said, and be only too happy to meet inquirers.

News of the Week.

THE Republicans now figure up their majority in Maine at 20,615.

ROBERT HOE, the famous printing-press manufacturer, died on the 13th, aged 70 years.

THE French Admiral Corbet has been instructed to resume warlike operations against China.

TAMMANY HALL has finally declared for Cleveland. Mr. Grady, the favorit orator of the Tammanyites, bolts in favor of Butler.

ONE of the worst features of the Butler campaign is the fact that the ex-notorious Rev. I. S. Kalloch, of California, is conducting the canvass in that state.

THE daughter of Mr. Morosini, who is Jay Gould's financial partner, has created considerable agitation in New York society by running away with and marrying her father's coachman.

LAST week up to Friday was the warmest of the season in Vermont. On Saturday night some sections of the state were visited by a heavy frost, killing all vegetation that was unprotected.

THE New Brunswick, N. J., Bank, the cashier and president of which recently committed suicide, announces that it will resume business. The total loss to the bank by the rascality of its officers amounts to $220,000.

THE People's party had a mass meeting at Union Square in this city last Monday night. It was addressed by Gen. Butler, ex-Senator Grady, Isaac L. Rice, and others. From 10,000 to 20,000 persons were present.

OLIVER WORMALD, of Buffalo, N. Y., has announced his intention of going over Niagara Falls on a wager of $1,000. He will inclose himself in a rubber ball fifteen feet in diameter, into which compressed air will be injected.

THE American Missionary Society claims to be spending $1,000 per day educating Indians, negroes, and Chinese in the mysteries of Christianity. It is evident that the society is not realizing on its investment, being now $50,000 in debt.

UP to last Sunday there had been 3,297 deaths from cholera in Naples, Italy, since the outbreak of the disease in that place. The deathrate is at the present writing nearly 400 every twenty-four hours. From midnight last Friday up to 4 o'clock Saturday afternoon 687 deaths occurred.

MRS. BELVA LOCKWOOD, of California, is the Woman's Rights Candidate for the presidential chair of the United States. She is said to be an accomplished tricycle rider. Her statesmanship has not been tested, but the platform upon which she stands is a good one, and her letter of acceptance was able.

THE Nihilists of Warsaw, Russia, hav issued a proclamation setting forth that in maintaining the rights of the people against the czar the same weapons that he uses will be employed, and that no traitor shall escape. Thousands of copies of this proclamation hav been circulated, but the police hav failed to discover their source.

WILLIAM P. KEESER, a widower, and Mrs. Kershner, a married woman, both of Reading, Pa., hav been living together as husband and wife. The inhabitants of the place to the number of 250 turned out one night last week, with tin pans, horns, etc., made a horrid din, and hanged the guilty couple in effigy. The man applied to the police for protection. The couple are talked of by the neighbors as candidates for tar and feathers.

THE press of New York is endeavoring to incite the police to institute a crusade against the gangs of roughs that infest the crowded quarters of the city. These gangs are made up of young men from 18 to 30 years of age, numbering a dozen members each, and upward. They congregate on the street corners, drink beer, assault and rob passers by, and generally liv by stealing. Many of them are being taken in by the police and sent to prison. There are dozens of these gangs in the city.

Communications.

Through Day to Night, and Night to Day.

GEORGE CHAINEY'S SUNDAY LECTURE AT CASSADAGA.

Nature is full of correspondences and repetitions. History moves in cycles. Nations hav their seasons of spring and summer, bud and leaf, flower and fruit. In thought sometimes they sweep through the day, and then in dreams sleep through the night. The ocean is mirrored in the dew-drop, the majestic palm in the moss at its root, and the mighty oak in every leaf. The home is the forerunner of the state, while the experiences of centuries are shadowed in those of each individual. Man has a dual life of head and heart. He thinks and feels. The head is the type of day, the intuitions of night. We cannot afford to waste our days in sleep, nor trespass on the hours of sleep in the acquirement of knowledge or gain. I say that the day is intellectual because the mind is light. It is the inspiration of our activities. It drives us to work. There is no rest in thought. It is ever on and on, crying, Work, work! The night is the time of rest, amusement, inspiration, and love. Through the innocent sleep, garlanded with dreams, we gather fresh hope and courage for the battle of life. The religious life of the world is ever alternating between day and night, save when it takes a step nearer completeness in the marriage of the two.

Sometimes the day and night woo each other a long time before love wins it fruition. Materialism is the day. The intellect rules. You bring all to the test of reason. Dreams to you are but the children of an idle brain, begot of nothing but vain fantasy. Love grows cold, and the tendency is toward egotism or self love. Joy is driven away in care and anxiety. You fight and struggle for the mastery of thought. You would overthrow all opinions but your own. Many of you care no more for the feelings of your neighbors than the Wall-street speculator cares for the widows and orphans he is robbing through his clever manipulations. In this strife care unknits the sleeve of life. The dust of selfishness settles down upon the soul. The mind becomes weary and jaded, until at last we say, Who shall show us any truth? and often throw down the standard and rush into sensual enjoyment, saying, "Let us eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die." Fortunate, then, will it be for us if some sweet dream or some true loving heart recalls us to listen to the voice of our own heart until it proclaims to us its deathless energy, and wins some confidence from the unseen world. It might be interesting to some to trace this analogy of day and night through the various systems of religion. But it can only lead to practical results when applied to the present.

Christianity has passed through successiv days and nights. It was born in the night of love. It was corrupted in the day of creeds. It was partly regenerated in a night of mysticism. It was again corrupted by the day of ecclesiasticism. It was again revived in the intuitions and emotions of Methodism, and beautiful sentiments of Unitarianism. But the fierce, glaring day of scientific Materialism and Agnosticism swept down next and banished faith and hope in the name of reason and common sense. But fortunately for our poor hearts, the holy hush of eventide has already drawn its beautiful veil over the blinding face of the sun; soon will come again to all > "The innocent sleep—

> Sleep that knits up the raveled sleeve of care,
> Death of each day's life. Sore labor's bath,
> Balm for hurt minds, great nature's second course,
> Chief nourisher in life's feast."

Once more sweet and beautiful dreams re-adorn the inner chambers of the heart, and quicken the mind anew with faith in its own deathless energy. Once more we enter joyfully and thankfully the home of the son, and feel around our necks the arms, and on our cheeks the sweet kisses of eternal love. Once more the stars come out and teach us that this world is related to millions of others, and that this life is but the chrysalis, the mere vestibule, of existence. Once more the bride and bridegroom of reason and intuition meet in harmony and love until all the joy-bells of the son ring out in wild, sweet melody.

To speak, by the book, lest my meaning be lost in my allegory, this is the work of Spiritualism. As I hav already told twice the story of my personal experience, I cannot repeat it again in full. But weary of the strife of the intellect, sick of the noise and din of controversy, enthusiasm folding her wings and refusing again to lift me into her inspiring realm, the dust of selfishness and love of sensuous enjoyment carrying me steadily downward, thirsty with ambition for the baubles of fame, the sword of conquest for right and truth rusting in its sheath, determined to abandon the lecture-field for the stage, lingering in it only a little longer from motivs of friendship, I came by accident to Cassadaga camp. Some of the experiences I hav had here are too sacred and marvelous to be given to the public. Some of you are good and pure enough to receive them. But to others it would only be casting pearls to swine, who, finding nothing in them to feed on, would turn and rend me.

Nor do I expect anyone to believe in Spiritualism on my testimony. My only hope is that I may be an impulse to some who are prepared to receive it that shall lead them to seek. And if you seek aright you will surely find. Whether you heed or mock, laugh or cry, I know beyond the power of doubt or argument to disturb that here hav come to me countless proofs of immortality. If you want to know what they are, you must seek for them in my former lectures. Some of you are saying, "What a pity! Poor Chainey has gone mad!" But the time is not distant when some of you will say, "Though this be madness, yet there is method in it."

> "It is not madness
> That I hav uttered; bring me to the test,
> And I the matter will re-word which madness
> Would gambol from. . . . For love of grace,
> Lay not that flattering unction to your soul,
> That not your trespass, but my madness, speaks.
> It will but skin and film the ulcerous place;
> While rank corruption, mining all within,
> Infects unseen."

Like Hamlet's mother, many of you hav left the fair mountain of truth and purity to batten on the moor of sensuality. As you will see later, I do not free myself from this censure. To myself, as well as to you, I say, let us confess ourselvs to heaven, to the good angels that guard us, repent what's past, avoid what is to come, and never again spread the compost on the weeds to make them ranker. To them, as well as you, I confess that I was seeking my enjoyment and inspiration very largely in the use of stimulants and narcotics. When I came on this camp-ground I was using from three to five cigars daily. As soon as I knew that my body was simply the temple of an immortal soul, I had to giv these up. Is that madness? The spirit flows in the channel we dig for it. If that is soothed with the poison of narcotics and alcohol, do you think that your soul will not be injured thereby? I had commenced to say to myself, "You are a fool to become a martyr for Liberalism. If life is bounded by the cradle and the grave, you can well afford to sell a birthright in an imaginary world for a mess of pottage in this one." I began to say, with Macbeth,

> "I hav no spur to prick the sides of my intent,
> Save vaunting ambition, which o'erleaps itself
> And falls on the other side."

But now I know that this life is but the chrysalis of our true life; I know that whoever accepts death itself rather than be false to his own conscience makes a good choice. I know that for me the very stars again shine as the altar lights of the infinit and eternal. Once more the universe seems the throne and home of love—sweet, all-embracing love—instead of blind, inexorable law. Once more the desire to look up in meditation and prayer to sweet spiritual and unseen influences has come back to my heart, refreshing it as the sweet dews of night do the parched earth. Once more I feel that in some way beyond all reason to understand

> "There is a divinity that shapes our ends, > Rough-hew them as we may."

As at night we see far more of this universe than by day, so I now see far more of truth than I ever did in the garish light of day. As the mind is refreshed and quickened by balmy sleep, so has my brain been purified and illuminated by the sweet experiences through which I hav passed. As in the night beautiful dreams spring up in the garden of the soul, and, though unremembered, yet fill our waking hours with a most sweet perfume, so will the inspirations received here fill with fragrance all my future life.

But we must not forget the uses of the day nor the evils of the night. Night's cloak is often the garment of deception. It is the time when good things of day begin to droop and fade, whilst night's black agents to their preys do rouse. In the same way we find that the night of religion begets the horrible monsters of fear and dogma of eternal pain. Under her black cloak swarms of priestly robbers plunder and fleece their flocks of innocent sheep. Fortunately the day follows the night to correct these evils. At the rising of the sun these vultures and wolves, night's black agents, begin to slink away. The emancipation of reason and the light of positiv science are both essential in the great work of human progress. The cast-iron and inflexible creeds of Christianity, its horrible devil and eternal hell, were bound to bring in time a mental reaction against them. The best friends of the churches are those who hav protested against these relics of barbarism. If all had remained within the church it would long ago hav sunk out of sight through the weight of its own corruption. But thousands of earnest-hearted men and women hav left the church. Why? It is a business and social advantage to belong to a church. It cannot, then, be for gain. For evil, then? Nay. If you want to do wrong you will find it an advantage to cover your wolf's hide with a sheep's robe. I can tell you that it is not often a selfish motiv can carry you out of a church. It's your home. To leave it you must bruise and lacerate your heart, lose friends whose love is dear to you. But when the light shines upon you in its fulness you find that to respect yourself you must follow the truth, wherever it leads you, though it be into uttermost Infidelity. Better no truth than a lie. Better preserve your self-respect than lose it and gain the respect of the whole world. Every martyr who accepted the fiery robe of martyrdom rather than betray his own conscience made a good choice. But for such faithful souls, who hav kept brightly burning the torch of thought through the long night-watches of the world's darkness of ignorance, the entire earth would to-day be a howling wilderness, a fit abode only for beasts of prey. These are the brave heroes who hav stormed the dungeons of the Inquisition and Bastiles of tyranny and made it possible for us to breathe the sweet air of liberty. They are the hardy pioneers who hav opened up new lands and sailed unknown seas, and so widened the skirts of light and made the struggle with darkness narrower. What would the churches be to-day but for the reforming influence of those who hav come out from among them? Dungeons of ecclesiastical tyranny and centers of strife and ism.

But under the light of reason they are so fast changing that the time is not distant when they will be homes of liberty and true circles of loving human helpfulness. Of course we who hav come out hav sometimes been as extreme and illiberal in our opposition to them as they ever were to us. An illiberal Liberal sounds strange. But consistency is a jewel. The pendulum pushed to the extreme end of the arc must rebound to the other. Such retributions are the even-handed justice that returns her poisoned chalice to her own lips. Heaven hath pleased it thus to punish us with them, and they with us, that we may be their scourge and minister.

Some extreme Liberals, if they had the power, would destroy the churches root and branch. But God, or nature, whichever you please to call it, has more economical means of working than this. The light of the day of science is surely dispersing their darkness. For the old anthropomorphic gods they are coming to regard God as the infinit of the universe, the soul that is over all, through all, and in all things, constantly individualizing itself anew. Thus, instead of worshiping God afar off, sitting on a great white throne, they worship him in every manifestation of life, whether it shine from a distant star, or paint with beauty the dimpled cheek of a babe, giv strength to a lion, or blush in a rose; whether flooding the earth with the warmth and light of the sun, or filling our hearts with joy and gladness in the light and warmth of friendship and love. In the place of the old demons and hells of punishment and pain, they are adopting a philosophy of evil that reveals it to be the necessary counterpart of good, as cold is to heat, that hell is the descent of the soul toward animalism, and that nature is so kind that, when we become perfectly devilish, we find a certain kind of happiness in our deviltry. They are, also, through the influence of Spiritualism, beginning to believe that, when the soul reaches the lowest hell, it receives a shock that starts it, though blindly and unconsciously, on the upward path. In the place of Christ as an atoning sacrifice offering, an excuse for crime, they are presenting Jesus as one of the sublime souls in whom truth and righteousness perfected themselvs, so that for all time they shine as stars to light us through the darkest night. In the place of fixed and vain ceremonies, they are accepting the teachings of science, the ministrations of art, and the sweet charities of human helpfulness. In the place of local and partial inspiration in one book, they are beginning to accept inspiration as an eternal verity of the soul accessible to all on the same terms as to any, so that in the place of one Bible we hav many.

Many individual churches hav already planted themselvs squarely on this ground, and the time is coming when they must all move forward into this light, or sink out of sight. When they shall hav done this, the day and night of Christianity will be perfectly blended. This is the coming of the bridegroom spoken of by Jesus in the parable of the wise and foolish virgins. Those churches that replenish their waning lamps with the oil of wisdom distilled from nature in the laboratory of science, will be ready for his coming. Those who spend their time watching the expiring flame of past truth will, like the foolish virgins, find themselvs banished from the feast, at the marriage of wisdom and love, and condemned into outer darkness. From this marriage shall come new life and joy to the world. To-day is better than any yesterday, and to-morrow shall be better than to-day. Though the old sun hastes to its setting, a new one already begins to gild the horizon with beams of brighter glory than any former day. While this day of science reaches backward and reforms the church, it also stands in the way of the coming of a still more inspiring night. Let us be honest with ourselvs, both as Materialists and Spiritualists. I hav confessed to you my own sins or deficiencies while limiting my vision with Agnosticism. I know that the bride of my soul, the woman of my nature, was neglected. I know that if you hav formed the conviction that this life is the be-all and end-all here, upon this bank and shoal of time, you will seek more and more after simply sensuous enjoyment, until you will become blind to anything above and beyond. I know that this was so in my case. I said to myself, I cannot afford not to pluck any flower of pleasure that grows by my path to-day in the interest of any greater good self-denial may bring me in a problematical future.

I was in the descending ray of truth instead of the ascending. Now I must be as honest with you as I hav been with myself. I love you. Some of you are among my dearest friends. But let me ask you to think of what I hav already said and am about to say; not in haste or in wrath, but when you, in some silent hour, look through the clouds of passion, the mists of prejudice and self-interest, down into the secret chambers of your soul and see then whether you can afford to excuse yourself from a similar judgment, hav not many of the finer sensibilities and tastes you once had been blunted? When in masculin company, don't you offend sometimes the woman of your own soul, and dishonor the mother that bore you by speaking lightly and profanely of the sacred relations of the sexes? Are you not often more concerned with your own personal advancement than with the cause of right and truth? What mean these jealousies between leaders? Why make a great cause suffer through your personal spleen or spite? Why such an indifference on the part of so many professed Liberals to the propaganda of our faith? If my lack of enthusiasm has no grounds but my own deficiencies, why do the Liberal Leagues disintegrate about as fast as they integrate? Why did my subscribers to my published lectures leave me when owing me nearly three thousand dollars to fail and carry a load of debt ever since that has been a constant mill-stone about my neck? Why are the few generous hearts who hav had the interests of the League in their hands been left to mostly support it out of their own pockets? Why hav I seen your most generous workers growing sick and discouraged, scarcely knowing whether to keep the League alive or to try and save the reputation of the family by getting up a respectable funeral? Why hav I written in extremity to professed Liberals known to be millionaires and asked them to arrange for a lecture costing twenty-five to thirty-five dollars, and had them write back and plead poverty? Why does paper after paper sail out with flying colors, manned with hearts beating high with hope and enthusiasm, only to go to pieces on the rocks of bankruptcy? Why has this cause so little of the love and devotion of women? Why, after calling a convention of Freethinkers from all the states and Canada, is this the best that can be done? One of the most discouraging moments I ever had was last winter at Hornellsville, when, with my friend, Mr. Watts, we went there together to lecture. Two of these conventions hav been held there. Two years had passed. Was it foolish to expect that the seed sown by those conventions had in that time borne a rich harvest? Was I weak and silly to be sick and discouraged with the work I was doing when the audience was less than twenty. One time I found a volume called "Leaves of Grass," and saw in it a new gospel; a new Bible; a cosmos of the modern world charged with electric life; with moral inspiration of body and mind; with all delicacy and purity, written by grand old Walt Whitman, a very Titan; one of the world's Christs and redeemers. I saw him mocked at, reviled, spit upon by wretches too vile in heart and life to understand the nature of purity when they saw it. At last I saw him officially nailed to the cross of this world's scorn and obloquy through the low-minded schemes of that saintly scavenger, Anthony Comstock.

I tried to wash off some of the mud by pointing out the great purity of his work, and to stanch the red blood flowing from those cruel wounds. But some of the most influential Liberals pointed at me the finger of scorn for doing so. Why is this? Shall I blame you as individuals or as a party. Nay, if you do not blame yourselvs, I accuse no man. We are all of us in the hands of agencies that are mightier than ourselvs. If I know anything, I know that unseen agencies led me by the various steps that brought me to Cassadaga. I now can say with Hamlet, we defy augury; there's a special providence in the fall of a sparrow. If it be now, 'tis not to come; if it be not to come, it will be now; if it be not now, yet it will come; the readiness is all. Since no man knows aught of what he leaves, what is't to leave betimes? It is not in the economy of nature for the day to dispossess the night. Any society that leaves out of its constitution anything that is revealed by night or by day, must either reform or perish. Your principal method of propaganda has been controversy. This always disintegrates. You are also so ruled by the day that you cannot take time from your work. The lust of acquirement is like a fever in your blood.

It is often said that Liberals are poor. I know by experience that very many are rich. But they cannot part with their money unless it is for some tangible possession. Your idea of education is the acquirement of knowledge. You seldom read novels. The idea that fiction has a higher mission than fact, is to you an absurdity. It is only the night of love, rest, and dreams that can teach us this. Wisdom comes by illumination. In a true sense it is the gift of the immortals. Other men hav labored, and we hav entered into their labors. Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad.

Having been selected as brief agencies in the destruction of error, you become drunk with the excitement of controversy. You love the conflict for its own sake more than for its service to the truth. Some of you are all aglow with the prospect of an exciting passage of arms between myself and Mr. Watts to-night. I am afraid you think more of the fun than of the truth. Some of you would enjoy a laugh at anyone's expense, no matter how sacred the feelings it bruised. Some of you laughed like jockies at a circus day before yesterday at things on this platform that made others come to me in tears of grief and burning shame. I am sorry that this matter has taken the form of a controversy, not that controversy has not its uses. But George Sand was not far wrong when she said controversy is always the grave of truth. But at this time, and on this subject, I feel that it is altogether inappropriate. It would be perfectly right for Mr. Watts to say the strongest word he can for Materialism. But let every tub stand on its own bottom. This is a Freethought, not a Materialistic Convention. Why publish to the world your own want of consistency? I don't believe that the cause of truth is best served in this way. Words are always imperfect mediums of expression. They carry different impressions to each individual. Every rose of speech has its thorn. What of that? you that hav free souls, it touches you not. Let the galled jade wince. Our withers are unwrung. A skilled debater can make figures seem to lie.

Mr. Watts is, in my opinion, the greatest debater on the Liberal platform. It is his genius. He has trained himself to it as persistently as Mr. Sullivan, a fellow-citizen of mine, has to another form of pugilism. They say in Boston Mr. Sullivan is a gentleman. Now, I know Mr. Watts probably better than any other man in this country; we traveled and lectured together three months. I can assure you he is a gentleman of truth and honor—kind and gentle of heart, but never gentle in the treatment of an opponent. I hav seen him go at a poor innocent minister trying to defend the sincere faith of his heart in fear and trembling, with the tears vibrating in every word, like twenty tigers concentrated into one. I always told him that one of his debates with a minister was a form of cruelty to dumb animals that ought to be suppressed. I never believed in controversy, and though challenged many times hav always refused, and always shall. Let me assure you, however, that, though you will not hear from me to-night, Mr. Watts will giv you a brilliant and most solid and intellectual performance. The claws of the tiger will be sheathed to-night in the soft gloves of courtesy and kindness. But I am sorry he is going to do it, because I cannot see the value of fighting against this truth—I never had the heart to do so when an Agnostic. When Mr. Watts and I traveled together people said we made a good team, because he gave them the skeleton of truth, while I clothed it with flesh and blood; or, that he built the house and I came and planted flowers and vines to cover it with beauty and fill the air with perfume. Since I saw him last I hav discovered that we are building for time and eternity, and that the flowers, which I feared were but for a day, are beautiful immortals. Why should he tear them up with the rude hands of logic and trample them beneath the feet of ruthless criticism. I think, however, that most of them hav taken root beyond his reach. He will speak of a subject of which he knows nothing, while one tiny rap from the spirit world is mightier than the mightiest argument that can be brought against it. But, whatever Mr. Watts may say, let me assure you that he is a mighty good fellow, and as, in a few short years, I shall meet him some fine morning in some Spiritual encampment or congress and hav a good laugh at his surprise, I freely forgiv him, in advance, for all the laughs he will raise on me to-night. I wish in this relation to point out two or three mistakes I hav been making for some time. One of my mottoes has been "One world at a time. The best preparation we can make for another is entire devotion to this." It is quite difficult to explain how this still remains true, only in a larger sense than before. Our present life is inseparably connected with the spiritual realm; sometimes this union is conscious and at others quite unconscious. Since I hav become conscious of this fact my devotion to this world has been enlarged, quickened, and intensified. We need not be ignorant of astronomy in order to be learned in botany. I hav also said that if the hope to liv again is to be realized and we are to meet again with the loved and lost of earth, in some sweet Elysian fields beyond the grave, our joy will there and then be the greater by every moment we hav forgotten it in our desire to make this world a little more of a paradise. I made some terrible blunders here. In the first place I never dreamed that the flickering candle of hope could be changed into the electric light of knowledge.

Next, I hav learned by experience that the best way to make this world a paradise is to throw the light of this happier land down through the darkness of the grave, and say to all mourning hearts looking there for their dead, "He is not here, but risen."

But let us return to the night. All things grow first in the dark. So spiritual phenomena are born in the night. But the time is surely coming when all that is now done in the dark will be done in the light. This has already commenced. At present this cloak of night hides many fraudulent mediums and lying prophets. That does not prove it all false any more than the thief stealing under cover of night to his plunder proves all others rogues who happen to be out of bed at the same time. But before we pass fully from this night into the perfect day we must bring into life all the sweet and elevating influences of night, and destroy all its dark and demoniacal ones. When night's shadows descend upon us, we begin to think of the rest, amusement, and inspiration of the drama. We must bring into life the ministrations of art in all her many and beautiful forms. Art requires the infinit and eternal to liv in.

We must also apply it to our personal culture. The same laws that apply to the painting of a picture, the carving of a statue, the writing of a drama, apply also to the true cultivation of men and women. In this sense art has been cruelly neglected. We hav plenty of beauty of outward adornment, but how little of true beauty of form or of life. We hang our walls with pictures, while we remain scarecrows. Our clothing is shorn of the joy and beauty of color. When life might be a perpetual gala day, we make it a sort of an unending funeral procession. Our lives are mostly vulgar and commonplace. When we would be stirred with great emotions, we must seek them at the theater. Many are not capable even of finding them there. Look at our young people swarming the streets of our cities on Sunday seeking enjoyment in the mere froth of existence, finding a temporary relief from their dullness in the arrival of a train. The churches hav no power to charm them, while at our Liberal meetings they are generally offered only the dry chaff of intellectual controversy which the first breath of spirit life will blow away.

Look at the sons of the rich—often, from a physical standpoint, mere warts and wens, things we can neither call monkeys nor men, and so hav been compelled to invent a new term and call them dudes.

In this country a handsome woman makes a hundred thousand dollars annually by exhibiting herself on the stage. Why do we pay so much money to sit in the outward shadow of beauty. Because we lack it in our own lives. Because, with our scientific Materialism, we hav made life cheap and vulgar.

We must cultivate the dramatic faculty. When we hav done this, and through spiritual knowledge stand again in relations with the immortals, we shall be made the recipients of the life of the great and good of all time. The best part of our education is the unconscious influence upon us of our associates. By the same law, Spiritualism can educate us through the magnetism of the noblest and best of earth. This work has been commenced in the children's lyceums, and through some of the inspirational speakers. This is but the germ of a great unfoldment. The greatest of the past are but representativs of whole generations that will make jubilant this fair earth when this faith has married night to day. Then each life will be at once a romance, a drama, and epic. Night also is the time of love. It is by moonlight the lovers wander 'mid the vine-clad hills. It was at night when Romeo sought Juliet's balcony and exclaimed:

> "It is my lady; Oh, it is my love.
> Oh, that she knew she were!
> She speaks, yet she says nothing; what of that?
> Her eye discourses; I will answer it.
> I am too bold, 'tis not to me she speaks.
> Two of the fairest stars in all the heaven,
> Having some business, do entreat her eyes
> To twinkle in their spheres till they return.
> What if her eyes were there, they in her head?
> The brightness of her cheek would shame those stars
> As daylight doth a lamp; her eye in heaven
> Would through the airy region stream so bright,
> That birds would sing and think it were not night."

Love is to be reformed. It is to-day so imperfect because man, under the blaze of the intellect, has neglected sentiment and suppressed the woman of his soul. Man, to be at his best, must be in a degree womanly as well as manly; while woman must be manly as well as womanly. She will be a comrade and friend as well as a lover. She will assert and claim her full right to be and do whatever it is right for man to be and do. She will be perfect mistress of her body as of her soul. The woman that permits herself to be the slave of a man's passions, whether in or out of marriage, prostitutes the temple of God to base uses, and invites into her sphere every unclean thing. The world is to be saved by a pure generation, as well as by regeneration or spirit power.

It's much better to be born right than to be born again. Night is also the cloak of lust. Under its shelter seduction and prostitution hold high carnival. How shall we suppress that poor wretched woman who is, sooner or later, the victim of horrible disease or the policeman's club; for certainly the world will

The National Liberal League.

The Eighth Annual Congress.

The first session of the eighth annual Congress of the National Liberal League convened on Monday, September 8, 1884, at 10 A. M., on the grounds of the Cassadaga Lake Free Association, to which they had been invited by the officers of the association in connection with the New York State Freethinkers' Association, T. B. Wakeman, president, in the chair. He opened by reading so much of the call as was necessary to explain the obj cts of the League, and of this particular Congress, and then awaited the motions of the house.

The first regular business was the appointment of a Committee on Credentials. W. S. Bell, S. P. Putnam, and T. C. Leland were chosen for this work, and J. E. Remsburg, C. B. Reynolds, Miss Helen H. Gardner, A. B. Bradford, and Mrs. H. L. Green were appointed a Committee on Business and Order of Business.

Miss Gardner objected that she was not a member of the League. Her objection was unheeded, for Orlando Child, of Moline, Ill., quietly stepped up to the secretary's desk, and made her a life member by paying the fee of twenty-five dollars.

Next in order was the appointment of a Committee on Nominations. Mr. Wakeman explained that this had been the usual custom of the League, but if the Congress preferred, the nominations could be made in open convention as a Committee of the Whole. It was, however, deemed more expeditious to refer the matter to a special committee, and the following were appointed as representing the various states whose delegates were in attendance: M. B. Lawrence, Ill., chairman; A. B. Severance, Wis.; J. H. Burnham, Mich.; M. E. Billings, Iowa; E. M. Macdonald, New Jersey; W. J. Irvine, Ohio; Hannah T. Stearns, Utah; G. W. Baldwin, Pa.; Courtlandt Palmer, New York; Parker Pillsbury, New Hampshire; Mrs. Mattie Krekle, Mo.

The Committee on Platform was chosen in the same manner, and consisted of Elizur Wright, Mass.; Dr. H. S. Brown, Wis.; John Steves, Ill.; J. H. Burnham, Mich.; A. B. Bradford, Pa.; S. P. Putnam, New York; Thomas Lees, O.; Mary E. Tillotson, N. J.; Hannah T. Stearns, Utah; M. E. Billings, Iowa; Mrs. Mattie Krekle, Mo.; Parker Pillsbury, N. H.

A Committee on Ways and Means was suggested, and John Steves, S. D. Moore, and Orlando Child were appointed to act as such.

The Convention then adjourned. The afternoon session began at two o'clock. The Committee on Credentials reported the following authorized delegates as present:

The list as read was adopted, and on motion the annual members were allowed votes. The charter and life members, as well as president and secretary and three delegates from each auxiliary League, hav votes by the Constitution. Reports of committees were then called for. The Committee on Nominations, through Courtlandt Palmer, made what was intended as a partial report, or report of progress. The officers nominated by them were as follows:

For President,

COLONEL ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Vice-Presidents,

CHARLES WATTS, PARKER PILLSBURY,
T. B. WAKEMAN, JAMES PARTON,
ELIZUR WRIGHT, MRS. MATTIE KREKLE.

For Secretary,

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

For Treasurer,

COURTLANDT PALMER.

Mr. H. L. Green moved the reception of the report. A. B. Bradford moved that it lie on the table. M. E. Billings moved its adoption. E. M. Macdonald moved as an amendment to all the motions that it lie on the table until Col. Ingersoll could be heard from. A discussion followed, participated in by Messrs. Billings, Green, Elizur Wright, John Steves, and J. H. Burnham, at the close of which Mr. Macdonald withdrew his motion, and the report was unanimously adopted, thus electing the persons named.

A motion was then made that the Congress nominate and elect the balance of the officers. Agreed to. Mr. H. L. Green nominated for chairman of the Executiv Committee Mr. E. M. Macdonald, who declined to serve, as he had all the work he could attend in editing THE TRUTH SEEKER. He nominated C. B. Reynolds. Names were mentioned for the balance of the committee, when H. L. Green suggested that the chairman of the committee be allowed to select his own associates. The suggestion was adopted, and Mr. Reynolds was elected chairman of the committee.

Mrs. A. C. Macdonald was then nominated by Mr. Putnam for chairman of the Finance Committee. Miss Helen Gardner was also nominated, but as she declined to serve, Mrs. Macdonald was appointed. Her associates are D. C. Blodgett, Orlando Child, and S. D. Moore.

The evening session was opened with music. The first business on hand was to hear the report of the Committee on Platform. Mr. A. B. Bradford, chairman of the committee, read the resolutions prepared. As adopted by the Congress they are as follows:

The National Liberal League, in congress assembled at Cassadaga Lake, reaffirm the Nine Demands of Liberalism as they were adopted at Philadelphia in 1876, and regard them as the basis of union henceforth, and as defining our mission as Freethinkers and reformers. And the better to carry out harmoniously the policy enunciated in these Demands, we hereby, and for prudential reasons, recommend to the next Congress to drop the name of the National Liberal League, and assume that of the "American Secular Union," thus indicating our desire for co-operation with our Freethinking brethren in the British Dominion of Canada.

Believing with the founders of the republic that civil government is a natural and secular institution, and not a divine and supernatural one; and believing, too, that the human mind in the process of education should be entirely free from the trammels of superstition, we congratulate our fellow-Liberals everywhere that this theory of government and education is admitted to be correct, and American, in the lately expressed official opinion of the New York state superintendent of schools, that the use of all religious books and ceremonies are inappropriate in schools supported by public taxation. And we recommend as one of the advantages of the local organization of Leagues in the state of New York, and as one of the duties to be performed, that, in any case where, through church influence, this opinion of the state superintendent is treated with disrespect, the members of a League should feel it to be their duty to defend and advocate it. We also express our satisfaction at the fact that the constitution of the state of California, in the true spirit of the national Constitution, refuses to regard church property as public property, and in Article XIII., Section 1, requires all private property, whether of individuals or corporations, to be taxed. It is also highly creditable to California that, in Article IX., Section 8, of her constitution, it is declared that "no public money shall ever be appropriated for the support of any sectarian or denominational school, or any school not under the exclusiv control of the officers of the public schools; nor shall any sectarian or denominational doctrin be taught, or instruction therein be permitted, directly or indirectly, in any of the common schools of this state."

Resolved, 1. That all who favor the secularization of our government be earnestly and cordially invited to unite and become activ members of the National Liberal League.

Resolved, 2. That in inviting co-operation with the different classes of Radicals in the grand objects of secularizing the national and state goverments, and exposing the falseness of the popular superstition, the parties must never forget that in all our discussions of the main topics, and of such side issues as may occasionally present themselvs on our platform, each person's thought and speech, while they must be entirely and sacredly free, should also be entirely respectful and considerate to those who may hold opposit views. This mutual respect and consideration being the natural and immediate growth of Freethought, and the very meaning of the word, is absolutely the only ground on which we can stand in harmoniously executing the mission we here undertake as reformers.

Resolved, 3. That we deem it the duty of the Liberals in their respectiv localities to organize Leagues, lyceums, kindergartens, and all other instrumentalities for educating children in the principles of science and secular government.

Resolved, 4. That we earnestly recommend to Liberals everywhere to pre-arrange and giv orders to their survivors concerning their funerals, so that their opinions and character may not be misrepresented after death by the exponents of the popular religion.

Mr. Green was first on his feet after the reading, and moved the reception of the report. He was closely followed by Mr. Billings, who moved its adoption. Dr. H. S. Brown offered some remarks, the gist of which he did not reach before he was ruled out of order. The report was received, and its discussion began. Mr. Green objected to changing the name of the League on the ground that it would be a violation of the Constitution, as proper notice of the matter had not been given, the Constitution requiring that proposed amendments to it be published along with the call for the Congress.

Mr. Palmer then moved that for the peremptory wording of the proposed change the committee's recommendation be substituted.

Mr. M. E. Billings, however, thought that the call published was broad enough for anything, and insisted that the change be made.

The chair ruled, nevertheless, that Mr. Green's point was well taken, and sustained his objection. Mr. Billings appealed from Mr. Wakeman's decision.

Mr. Wakeman asked the indulgence of the house while he stated a couple of points. He opposed (1) the change at this Congress because it was revolutionary in character, and (2) upon a question of such moment the Liberals of the country should be heard through the Liberal press, and hav a voice in deciding.

Elizur Wright did not object to the change so long as the League's objects remained the same. A rose, he remarked, would smell as sweet by any other name. He couldn't see that, in adopting the suggestion of the committee, the Congress would violate the spirit of the League's Constitution.

Courtlandt Palmer still objected on technical grounds. Professor Seymour said the Pittsburgh Auxiliary League had discussed the question [first presented by Mr. Bradford in these columns.—ED. T. S.] and sent its delegates to the Congress pledged and instructed to oppose the project.

The declaration of change was then modified to a recommendation to the next Congress of the League, and in this form received a large majority of the votes cast.

The remaining resolutions were then pruned and adopted as given above.

The remainder of the evening was spent in discussing ways and means of making the action of the League effectiv. It was the understanding that if elected to office both Mr. Watts and Mr. Putnam should engage in activ propagandist work. How to hold up their hands was now the question. Mr. Putnam was about throwing up a situation that realized him nearly $2,000 per year, and in a few months would quite reach that sum. Mr. Watts had a family to bring from England and support when here, and the work they expected to engage in must remunerate them or be abandoned by them. Courtlandt Palmer moved that in the first place a campaign fund of five thousand dollars be raised by contributions from auxiliary Leagues and from individuals, from this fund the two officers mentioned to be allowed $1,500 per year each, with the privilege of increasing their remuneration by lecturing. The motion was afterward put in the shape of this resolution:

Resolved, That the Liberal League, for the ensuing year, raise a fund of $5,000 for the following purpose, namely, to pay to the first Vice President and to the Secretary a salary of $1,500 each, the residue of $2,000 to be applied to the general League expenses; and that the said officers shall keep and make exact and full report of all receipts from lectures and other sources, and be allowed, if earned, out of such receipts an additional sum of $1,000 each per year.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

A subscription paper was then read by the chairman of the Finance Committee. It set forth that—

We, the undersigned, agree to giv yearly the sum set against our names for the payment of salaries of officers, for propaganda, and for the purposes of legitimate League work, to be paid quarterly or oftener.

In response, the under-mentioned sums were subscribed.

Dr. Foote's, Mr. Van Deusen's, Mr. Somerby's (he was unavoidably absent from this session), and George Macdonald's subscriptions hav been received since the return of the secretary to this city. During the collection of this generous sum, the audience had nearly all gathered around the secretary's desk, and as the hour was late, no further business was transacted that evening.

Tuesday morning at 10 the League again convened. Mr. Leland read his report as follows:

I am not able to make a very formidable report this year. My work done does not compare favorably with that of previous years. In the first place, my health has not been good, and I hav had to moderate my rate of labor.

Second, I felt that the League was loaded up at Milwaukee last fall with more planks than it could bear, and found myself out of harmony with a portion of the platform. It has damaged the League, frightened away members, retarded new organizations, and made the work more up-hill which was sufficiently precipitous before.

Third, I was tired of appealing and begging for support of the League, and for means to carry on its legitimate work. I had nothing new to say. In my state of moral, physical, and financial ill-health, I ought to hav declined re-election last year. But the genuin and hearty friends of the League seemed too many and too devoted to abandon, although they were too few to secure efficient and thorough work; and I withheld my resignation till it would not seem to them like desertion and a retreat. Meantime the duties of the office hav had to drift. I just held the fort for a worthy successor—such as I am sure you hav found and elected in Mr. Putnam.

And yet the League has increased some. Eight new auxiliaries hav been added to our list of local branches, making the whole number of chartered auxiliaries 272. Two new life members and 119 annual members joined the League during the last year. The revenue from these sources and from gifts from Leagues and individuals has been hardly sufficient to set a squadron in the field and secure a Waterloo victory for Secularism.

There has been very little for a treasurer to do, but such as it is, he asks me to read his report. It is as follows:

C. PALMER, Treas.

Mr. Putnam then offered the following resolution of thanks and respect for the retiring president and secretary:

Resolved, That the National Liberal League expresses its thanks to its retiring president and secretary, T. B. Wakeman and T. C. Leland, for their untiring devotion to the Liberal cause, for the ability with which they hav labored, and the success which they hav achieved. The promis which we hav to-day, and the new hopes which inspire, are the result of their patience, heroism, and self-sacrifice. By their unflinching courage they hav preserved the advancing interests of Liberalism, and hav won the lasting gratitude of all true lovers of liberty.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. Watts in a very felicitous speech, and carried unanimously amid the greatest enthusiasm.

When Mr. Wakeman rose to reply his eyes were humid, and his whole manner showed plainly that his feelings had been deeply touched by the exhibition of love and good-will for himself. His voice at first was tremulous, but he soon straightened out and made one of those splendid little addresses for which he is famous on extempore occasions. He was long and loudly and repeatedly applauded.

Mr. Leland then indulged in a few personal reminiscences. He left a three thousand a year position in the Custom House because he had no time to work in the cause he loved. When Mr. Bennett was attacked Mr. Leland was enjoying a salary of just half that in a New York commercial house, but he gave that up to enter the open fight for Liberalism. In early life he had been a constructiv Socialist, but on beginning the war for Liberalism he began reading Huxley's, Darwin's, and other noted works of scientific Freethinkers. He went into the war against Comstock to defeat that individual and the churchmen back of him, and he thought that had been done. Now Comstock is not to be feared. He confines his attention to policy shops and racing pools. His cases are thrown out of court. He is in bad odor. The fight is over, Mr. Leland concluded, and he thought it fitting that younger men should take his place. He thanked the Congress most kindly for its resolution.

Mr. John Steves, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means—the other members being Orlando Child and S. D. Moore—then made a report as follows:

Your committee recommend as the method of finance and revenue for the uses of the national organization; for purposes of business and propaganda, the principle of voluntary contributions by the local auxiliary Leagues, and by individuals in sympathy with its principles and objects, to be paid to and collected by any of its general officers or agents, and by them paid or accounted for to the treasurer of the National Liberal League, monthly. And the names of the contributors—persons or associations—shall be published, when the amount contributed is one dollar or more, in such of the Liberal papers as will publish them gratuitously.

And when the amounts collected by miscellaneous, or congregational, or individual subscriptions, or by admissions to lectures or otherwise shall be remitted to the treasurer, the collecting agents shall state the time, place, and occasion, with the amount of the collection; and it shall be the duty of the treasurer to present at the close of the League year a balance sheet in full of the moneys received and expended, and the services and objects for which expended.

And the vice-presidents not beneficiaries of the funds, or a majority of them, with the treasurer, shall be and constitute a board of direction as to the proper objects of expenditure of said funds; and, except the treasurer, shall be a board of audit.

Mr. Steves's resolutions were accepted as a suggestion to the Finance Committee, and his committee was discharged with thanks.

A vote of thanks to the Cassadaga Lake Free Association for the use of the camp-grounds was then unanimously passed; and the business of the Congress was done. Short speeches were made by Messrs. Barnstable and Moore, followed by an account from the Hon. Elizur Wright of some of his early antislavery experiences. Charles Watts recounted the labors of the Secularists of England, and when he closed the Congress was over. The conference in the afternoon was independent of either organization.

Mrs. H. S. Lake's Letter to the League.

The secretary of the League during the Congress at Cassadaga read the subjoined note from the ex-chairman of the finance committee:

OSHKOSH, WIS., Sept. 5, 284.

T. C. LELAND, SEC. NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE,

Dear Sir: I write this to express my regret to you and my Liberal fellow-laborers, in Congress assembled, that I cannot be with you. For four years it has been my pleasure to meet with you upon occasions like this, and to take part in your deliberations. This year other engagements prevent my bodily appearance among you; but I wish to assure you, one and all, that in spirit I am with you, as heartily devoted to the purposes for which the National Liberal League was organized as at any time.

I trust that the questions which shall be discussed will be promotiv of the best interests of humanity, and that all who attend and participate may feel imbued with devotion to truth and justice, the great principles upon which alone can rest a happy and prosperous nation.

Should new officers be chosen, I trust the choice may fall upon those who will serve with the same zeal and devotion which hav been manifested by the present president and secretary.

For myself, I desire that some one may succeed me who may be able to contribute more to the financial welfare of the association, though no one can feel a greater interest in the principles upon which the League is established. Wishing you a prosperous future, and a profitable convention, I am

Very sincerely and truly yours, MRS. H. S. LAKE, Chairman Fin. Com. National Liberal League.

To the Liberals of America.

The late action of the Liberal League lifts it at once out of the details of party politics into the realm of universal principles. It now deals with the fundamental questions of human progress. It is unconnected with the thousand varying opinions that belong to particular reforms and measures, and labors for that necessary condition by which all true advancement must be made, namely, Freethought. From this time forward this is the one mission of the Liberal League and the American Secular Union, to set free the minds of men, to insist upon fair play in political government, to maintain equal rights for all. It commits itself squarely to the Declaration of Independence—that government is of the people, and should represent the people in their totality, and not a certain class or sect in that people who lay claim to superior sanctity. On this grand platform all minor differences of party politics are forgotten, and every intelligent and conscientious citizen who believes in justice and liberty can unite with us for the progress of the world. All those who are in favor of a total separation of church and state, who would drive out every shadow of ecclesiasticism from political co-operation, who would hav every honest opinion thoroughly respected, who would willingly accord the same rights to others that he claims for himself; every just, charitable, liberal, and progressiv man and woman, are invited to our ranks in order that this great work to which we hav set ourselvs may be fully accomplished, and that before we die we may see some attainment of that equality and justice and noble fellowship of humanity which is the dream of the heroic soul, the inspiration of the martyr, which is the fountain of joy and the star of hope.

Never were the prospects of Liberalism so bright as they are to-day. Never was there such harmony of feeling, such oneness of thought, such unity of purpose. If there is "a divinity that shapes our ends," we must say that it has breathed into Liberalism at this time with wondrous potency. Almost unconsciously, amid all our diversity of opinion, we hav drifted to the same conclusion. However, we know that this is the result of a careful, thorough, and profound consideration of the needs of the hour by the wisest and best Liberals. This is no hasty movement. It is not the ebullition of a moment. It is the outcome of years of toil, of suffering, of sacrifice, of consecration. In the darkest hour something has been done to bring forth this bright and beautiful dawn that so enchants us.

I am sure that thousands and tens of thousands of Liberals throughout America will respond to the new and vast opportunity that is now before them. Remember the magnitude of the task that is imposed upon us. We are taking part in the mightiest movement in the history of the world. In the glowing words of Victor Hugo, there is a change of front of the universe. We are the forward troops in this immense procedure, from whence humanity takes to itself new life, and unfolds a fresh civilization. Let us realize the greatness of our privilege, that we are in the midst of a creativ revolution of thought and hope, that we stand upon the threshold of a brilliant future, into whose light we can put some ray by our own sincere endeavors.

Freethought is forethought, and therefore we must lay plans for the time to come. We must be conscious workers in the evolution of humanity. We must be the providence of that new heaven of which science day by day is laying the strong foundations. The Liberal League has decided from this time henceforth upon an aggressiv campaign. We shall select our points of attack and press on with the utmost vigor. We shall allow the enemy no resting spell. From the Atlantic to the Pacific the fires of Liberalism shall be kindled, societies organized, not simply upon a negativ, but a constructiv basis, for the development of social life, the scientific culture both of old and young; the cultivation of the spirit of humanity; the attainment of art and poetry, and noble morals—of the beautiful and the good, in unison with the true and matter-of-fact. We are to be the soldiers of nature, and through nature and nature's wealth we are to make man happy here and now, and crown his labor with the golden fruitage of a just reward, so that every worker shall hav a home, and every child born upon this planet a place to liv and a right to nature's bounty.

To carry out these all important undertakings, vital to the welfare of ourselvs and our children, the National Liberal League has voted to raise a fund of $5,000. Over $1,200 of this is already pledged. I hav no doubt that Liberals all over the country will cordially respond, and that in a few weeks the whole $5,000 will be pledged. Let friends send in their names and subscriptions as soon as possible, to be published, in order that others may be incited to the same good deed. Every dollar paid into the treasury will be accounted for at the next annual Congress. The officers of the League intend to prove their fitness by the work they do, and not by their professions.

In accordance with the spirit of this address, and to carry out all the purposes named, Mr. Watts, the first vice-president of the League, and myself, will devote ourselvs to the lecture field. We wish to visit, during the coming year, at least two or three hundred towns from the Atlantic to the Pacific, lecture, organize Leagues, etc. The qualifications of Mr. Charles Watts for the important position to which he has been chosen are well known. He is a veteran of twenty years' hard work; a man of rich experience; of wide intelligence; of thorough scientific culture, and an orator of rare ability. Let me hear at once from every section of the country in regard to this matter of lecturing. We are ready to go wherever the Liberals giv us a call. Don't try according to the size of your purse, but according to your hope in Liberalism. We will come if you send for us and pledge us a welcome, even though by but few.

Remember that all the money earned by our lecturing tour goes into the national treasury, subject to conditions named in resolutions, and every cent paid in will be accounted for. Be generous, therefore, as your circumstances permit, for what you do is not for our individual benefit, but for the benefit of the National Organization.

I would say one word more in closing in regard to a most important subject, namely, the burial of our Liberal dead. It is our duty to enshrine their death with all those hopes that make our life so beautiful. The shadows of the past must not rest upon the graves of our departed. We must speak our word, our consolation, our faith, our glory—founded in the life that now is and into whose bosom we would gather those who are outwardly silent, but inwardly eloquent still, and throned in affectionate memory.

I would say that Mr. Watts and myself will be ready at any time to serve those who, in the shadow of death, desire the noble consolations of our secular faith.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM,
Secretary of the National Liberal League.
Address: No. 55 East 9th st., New York City.

THROUGH DAY TO NIGHT, AND NIGHT TO DAY.

never be saved until a true Christ lifts up to purity and womanhood the last Magdalene. I know that this subject has been unwisely meddled with by the unskilful. Some people seem to always take hold of the hot end of the poker. Instead of presenting to us this subject only when transmitted into the flowers of beauty and fragrance, they empty the manure-heap on our heads.

But even this must not make us betray the cause of the soul's highest purity and truth. Holier than any temple of wood or stone, consecrated by diviner rites and for diviner purposes, is the human body. But we must also teach that the flowers of modesty are as beautiful as those of love. The rough feet of reformers must no more be allowed to trample on the pure modesty of nature than those of street loafers. Those who cannot see men and women mingle in pure and friendly relations without poisoning the air with slander and low-minded gossip must be shown their own corruption until they are shamed into silence.

But this subject, in all its bearings, is getting too vast for me. It overpowers me with its magnitude. I see the light dawning in such glory that it blinds me. I see the black spirits of evil fleeing before this bridal of night and day like wild beasts before the advance of civilization. I whisper to myself the words of Walt Whitman:

"Oh, living always; always dying!
Oh, the burials of the past and present!
O me! while I stride ahead, material, visible, imperious, as ever;
O me! what I was for years now dead I lament not. I am content.
Oh, to disengage myself from those corpses of me which I turn and look at where I cast them!
To pass on (Oh, living, always living!) and leave the corpses behind."

I am lost in the splendor and magnitude of the thought. I see love rising cleansed from the last stain of lust and coming forth to fill the world with rejoicing and beauty unspeakable. I see the time when death will be only a thin veil which we can part at any time, and clasp to our hearts again the forms of departed friends and lovers. I see the time when children will come into this world only through the garlanded portals of love, and greeted with the joy-bells of welcome. I see the time when education will be equally bestowed and made to cover the perfect and symmetrical unfoldment of body, mind, and heart; when each one will be and belong to himself; when life, saved from the lust of acquirement, will be consecrated by the highest culture.

Friends, we are to liv forever.

If I know anything, I know that our so-called dead are not dead. We are the children of the infinit and eternal. Let us liv worthy of our immortal destiny. Are you living simply to amass a fortune for your children, that is more likely to prove a curse than a blessing? Go home and spend it. Improve and beautify your home. Put in a bath if you hav none already. Keep your body clean and sweet. Remember it is the temple of an immortal spirit. Buy the best books. Liv to liv. Add strength to strength, and grace to grace. Do not expect death to save you, nor rely upon any one else's magnetism. Worship no longer the god of the dead, but the god of the living, the god in you. Be large in mirth as well as free in thought, liberal in deed as well as in profession. Help to spread the light. In closing I should like to warble one note you will all remember. This is the fifth year I hav addressed this convention at this hour. I hav given to you who are Agnostics four of the best years of my life. Though I go forward now into Spiritualism, I trust that you who hav been my friends will be so still. The world to-day is to me full of truth and beauty. I seem to be alive for the first time. Infinit possibilities ravish my vision. I hav no more fear of death, but anticipate it with thoughts of pleasure. But whether Agnostic or Spiritualist, this is still the creed:

"To thine own self be true.
Do the task that lies nearest.
Follow the truth thou seest.
Open thy heart to beauty.
Make thy prayers thy duty."

And for you shall unfurl the banner of victory. Let the good of both day and night blend in your love. Then as a bridegroom going forth to meet his bride, as the bride waiting in thrilling ecstasy his coming, so shalt thou greet each returning day. As the pure and strong father, the wise and loving mother, through the garlanded gates of love and law, bless and redeem the world in their offspring, so shall all the fruit of thy life be for the healing of the nations. However dark the night around you, above you will gleam the stars of hope. Fear shall no more hav power to touch you. The castle of doubt will be demolished, and the giant of despair slain. Though you walk through the valley of the shadow of death, you shall fear no evil. Palaces of beauty will giv you rest and inspiration. Delectable mountains will widen your vision until your feet shall come to the land of the immortals. Then though ideals on earth remain unfulfilled, yet as you vanish from the pinnacle of time into the mists of eternity, you shall cry victory, as the promis of all their fulfilment shall burst upon your vision. Then there shall be no more night.

"Night's candles are burnt out, and jocund day Stands tiptoe on the misty mountain-tops."

Summary of the Life of Paul.

There was a Jesus who was stoned and hanged for sorcery in Judea about 75 years B.C. Passages from the Talmud relating to him were long ago adduced by eminent Christian scholars. In 1874, the Rev. S. Baring-Gould gleaned them all, and expressed the belief that in the reign of Alexander Janneus (106–79 B.C) there was a Jesus who went to Egypt with his master, Rabbi Joshua Ben Perachia, and on returning to Judea practiced magical arts, for which he was stoned to death. And in the first Toldoth Jeshu the stoning is described as occurring in the reign of the widow of Janneus, i. e., between 79 and 69 B.C. See "Lost and Hostil Gospels," and "Revelations of Antichrist."

The evidence we hav adduced that Paul escaped from Damascus prior to 62 B.C. cannot be successfully controverted. Paul therefore must hav been a disciple of this martyred Jesus, whom he called the messiah, or anointed son of God.

We must therefore look for Paul's fellow-disciples in the century before the Christian era; and lo! we find Rabbi Simon Kepha described in the first Toldoth Jeshu as dying on a tower about 39 B.C., which would be about the time we would fix for the death of one of the eldest apostles of Christ.

With this strong prima facie case, what other evidence hav we discovered to corroborate it? Josephus furnishes almost all the history we hav of that period, and to him we are indebted for the discovery of most of the following personal indentities and collateral facts:

1. Onias, who was murdered outside the walls of Jerusalem between 66 and 69 B.C., answers to the martyr Stephen; and there is no trace of a martyrdom answering to his for the next 130 years, or until A.D. 62. Stephanos in Greek means "crown."

2. Paul's escape from Damascus was when Aretas, king of Arabia, governed that city. After 63 B.C., Damascus was governed by an uninterrupted succession of Roman officials, and no petty Arabian king ever controled that city under the empire.

3. Manahem the Essene, a prophet who was living about 20 B.C. at a very advanced age, parallels closely with Manahen, one of Paul's early coadjutors, mentioned in Acts xiii, 1.

4. Pollio the Pharisee, another aged man, revered by Herod the Great, answers to Paul. Herod's two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, went to Rome to be educated (20–17 B.C.), and while there lodged at the house of Pollio. This was about the time, if any, when Paul the aged wrote epistles from Rome.

5. If, as Ewald supposes, Pollio the Pharisee was Hillel, then Pollio's disciple Sameas may answer to Saul, alias Paul.

6. In that case, or perhaps in any case, Gamaliel of Acts answers to Hillel, who was enough older than Paul to be his preceptor. But Hillel would hav been too old to hav lived at Rome 20–17 B.C., therefore we think the identity of Pollio with Paul is far more probable than with Hillel, about whom very little is known.

7. If Pollio was Paul, then Sameas may answer to Silvanus (Silas of Acts); and it is possible that Paul's associate, Silvanus, was the same who is mentioned by Josephus as pretor of Ephesus about 20 B.C.

8. Paul's associate, Titus, was probably Titus Justus of Corinth. Otherwise there is no clue at all in Acts to the discovery of Titus. The order of events in that book would exclude this identity, but the chronology of Acts is inextricably confused.

9. Timothy and Titus were both Arameans. The Greek codices falsely call them Greeks (Acts xvi, 1; Gal. ii, 3. Compare Syriac version).

10. Paul was probably not very familiar with the Greek language. He uses the word Greek but once in all his epistles, although the earlier Greek codices make him use it twelve times, and the later codices thirteen times (Compare Syriac version).

11. Tyrannus, in whose school-room Paul preached at Ephesus, may hav been the Tyrannus who was body-guard to Herod the Great, and was put to death about 7 B.C. And Secundus of Thessalonica may answer to Jucundus, the companion of Tyrannus, who suffered a like fate.

12. Ananias was high priest from A.D. 48 to 55, so that it is apparently impossible to recognize him as high priest at the time described in Acts, when Paul was tried at Jerusalem.

13. There is not a particle of historical proof that Herod (Agrippa I.), or Felix, or Festus, or (Herod) Agrippa II., or any known historical personage of their time knew Paul.

14. If Paul ever appeared before Agrippa it was Marcus V. Agrippa. Herod Agrippa II. had no jurisdiction in Judea except to appoint high priests, A.D. 49–70, while M. V. Agrippa had supreme authority under Augustus in all the eastern empire between 22 and 12 B.C.

15. The orator Tertulius answers to Nicolaus of Damascus, whose speech before M. V. Agrippa, about 16 B.C., as given by Josephus, furnishes part of the substance of the speech of Tertulius in Acts xxiv.

16. Julius, the kind officer who accompanied Paul to Rome, answers to Julius who was consul 13 B.C., and pro-consul of Ephesus, 10 B.C. He protected the Jews.

17. The Augustus mentioned three times in Acts answers only to the first Roman emperor. In the Syriac version Augustus is twice changed to Cæsar (Acts xxv, 20, 25), but the Greek codices all retain Augustus (ho Sebastos) in those passages.

18. The historical characters mentioned in the book of Acts and known to hav lived in the first half of the first century are as follows:

Judas of Galilee, rebel, died about A.D. 10.
Annas (Ananus), high priest, A.D. 4–21.
Caiaphas, high priest, A.D. 25–36.
Ananias, high priest, died about A.D. 48–55.
Gamaliel, lawyer, died about A.D. 52.
Theudas, rebel, slain about A.D. 47.
Herod Agrippa I., reigned A.D. 37–44.
Herod Agrippa II., reigned A.D. 49–70.
Claudius Cæsar, emperor, reigned A.D. 41–54.
Felix, governor of Judea, 51–60.
Festus, governor of Judea, A.D. 60–62.

To these may be added the two sisters of Agrippa II., namely, Drusilla, wife of Felix, and Bernice, widow of her uncle Herod of Chalcis, and mistress of Titus and Vespasian. (But there was a Bernice who was married to a son of Herod the Great, about 22 B.C., and became the mother of Herod Agrippa I.)

19. There is not a scintilla of historical evidence to connect a single one of these persons with Paul or with any apostle or contemporary disciple of Jesus, the adored messiah, much less with Jesus himself. The most learned scholars hav never been able to adduce from all the authentic records of antiquity any evidence to substantiate the narrativs of the book of Acts, so far as they relate to the immediate disciples of the messiah.

20. But on the other hand we claim to hav discovered with more or less certainty historical traces of the following persons named in the book of Acts, all of whom existed, and most of whom died, in the century before the Christian era:

Paul (perhaps Pollio the Pharisee), 96–10 B.C.
Manahen (Manahem the Essene), 96–10 B.C.
Stephen (Onias), slain about 68 B.C.
Herod (the Great), reigned 47–4 B.C.
Bernice (his niece), married to his son about 22 B.C.
Agrippa (M. V.), lived 63–12 B.C.
Gamaliel (Hillel?), lived 112–20 B.C.
Silas (Silvanus, pretor of Ephesus), about 20 B.C.
Julius (proconsul of Ephesus), about 10 B.C.
Tyrannus of Ephesus, died about 7 B.C.
Secundus of Thessalonica (Jucundus?), died about 7 B.C.
Tertullus (Nicolaus of Damascus), flourished 16 B.C.
Augustus Cæsar, reigned from 31 B.C. until A.D. 14.

21. Some of the above dates are only approximate, and several of the identities are quite shadowy. But as to Paul, we entertain no doubt that he lived most, if not all, of the years above indicated (B.C. 96–10); and as a further confirmation of his existence at that period the apocryphal story of "Paul and Thecla" mentions "the Syriarch Alexander" and "Queen Tryphena"—the latter a "kinswoman of Cæsar," and both subordinate to an Asiatic proconsul. This undoubtedly refers to the time of Julius or Augustus Cæsar—probably the latter.

In proof of this assertion we now cite the ancient historian Plutarch, who says that Mark Antony appointed his own son Alexander king of Armenia, Media, and Parthia, and another son, Ptolemy, king of Phenicia, Syria, and Cilicia The mother of these sons was Cleopatra, queen of Egypt. And in the year 31 B.C., when Antony gave battle to Octavius Cæsar, Plutarch names six "vassal kings" in attendance, viz.:

"Bocchus, of Libya; Tarcondemus, of the upper Cilicia; Archelaus, of Cappadocia: Philadelphus, of Paphlagonia; Mithridates, of Commagene; and Saladas, of Thrace."

And the same author adds:

"Out of Pontus Polemon sent him considerable forces, as did also Malchus from Arabia, Herod the Jew, and Amyntas, king of Lycaonia and Galatia; also the Median king [Alexander] sent some troops to join him."

Alexander and Ptolemy, who were small boys at this time, were styled "king of kings." Antony and Cleopatra died the next year, and Octavius Cæsar, afterward called Augustus (27 B.C.), governed the whole Roman empire. After his reign there were no more "Syriarchs" or "queens" in the Asiatic provinces. Syria continued to be governed by a succession of Roman presidents. In a part of Jewry the sons of Herod the great retained their thrones as tetrarchs. His grandson Agrippa received the title of king under Claudius for three years, until his death, A.D. 44. Then for five or six years all Jewry was governed by a Roman procurator. In the year 50 Agrippa II. was called king, but his territory was insignificant and his royal power next to zero. Nero (A.D. 54–68) allowed him to retain his title and nominal power, but he was a renegade Jew.

We conclude our work with the following affirmation:

Every scrap of evidence that has ever been produced, whether called canonical, apocryphal, or historical, purporting to hav been written within a hundred years after the alleged crucifixion of a Jesus Christ under Pontius Pilate, attesting the fact of such an event, is either a fiction or a forgery.

FINIS.

Legislation upon Temperance.

I do not write "legislation upon liquor dealing," which is the only theme now before the public, simply because this may be decided either way by the ballot, without its allowance or its prohibition essentially affecting the evil of intemperance. Before producing facts to prove this point, I disclaim all desire for direct legislation upon temperance as well as upon the trade in liquors, because I believe in more effectiv means of combating intemperance. Only, as there are honest differences of opinion about the proper functions of government and value of legislation, I shall indicate for those who care to use such means the enemy's weak point. It is not in a partisan spirit that I write. And whatever motivs may influence votes, it is rational to suppose that all writers upon temperance or on prohibitory legislation hav in view substantially the same end, viz., sobriety. This sobriety, necessary to the development and acceptance of practical truth, carries courtesy into the discussion of it. The more we are in earnest about the abatement of a public nuisance, like drunkenness, the more discriminativ we must be as to the means employed, so as to concentrate our forces on the vital point.

Let us examin first the negativ results of legislation upon liquor dealing, because experience has already rendered its verdict upon this method of action, whereas that which I favor as more direct and practical cannot, that I am aware of, appeal to experience, but only to analogy and common sense.

The advocates of prohibitory legislation who demand an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, or else an unconstitutional encroachment by the general government on the powers reserved to state autonomy, are invited to meet me on the preliminary ground of state experience within acknowledged constitutional limits. For no one can seriously desire to repeat upon a larger scale such legislation as may hav proved ineffectiv and pernicious on a smaller yet amply sufficient scale of judgment, such as is presented by Vermont, by Maine, and perhaps by other states of which we possess no statistics.

The Agitator, Washington City, May 17th, givs statistics proving the general habitual and open violation of the prohibitory law in towns and villages throughout the state. The writer, Edward Johnson, remarks of its exceptional enforcement: "A person arrested for intoxication is compelled to 'disclose' the person from whom he procured liquor, and that person is then tried for the offense. Such cases are common, but as only the lowest class of liquor dealers is concerned in them, generally speaking; and as the prosecution is invariably for a 'first offense,' no effectiv purpose is served. Occasional efforts to enforce the law in the larger towns hav invariably proved short-lived, and in almost every instance the people hav, at the earliest opportunity, rejected at the polls the officers who hav attempted it." And he concludes: "Such laws in the hands of the vicious—who are always among us—reduce the father and mother, husband and wife, parents and children, to being spies and informers on each other, or else connivers and parties to the infraction of the laws. They giv opportunities to wreak a mean revenge; to disturb peaceful and law-abiding families by obtruding the arm of the criminal law into the domestic life of any citizen; and, on a trumped-up suspicion, drag him disgracefully before a criminal tribunal. These laws enable a policeman, acting upon a nebulous suspicion, to insist upon entering and searching your house during your absence; and when a timid, frightened lady, prompted by modesty, attempts to keep him out until you return, to arrest her for resisting an officer and drag her to a police station."

"Under the operation of these laws, a neighbor knows that his neighbor is a law-breaker for gain. The father knows it of the son, and the son of the father. The wife, the mother, the sister, the daughters and sons, know that for profit's sake their husband, father, son, or brother, neighbor or friend, is hourly violating the laws of the land. If such laws can be disregarded with impunity for gain, what law or obligation will be sacred to such people?"

If you hav a parti pris in this question, it is easy to throw the blame on the defectiv manner in which these particular statutes hav been worded; but consider that Vermont is above the average of our states in culture and intelligence, and that its majority, which passed these laws, hav been occupied thirty years in perfecting them after their kind. "Each legislature since '53 has modified and amended them in view of thoroughness, severity, and efficiency." "This law constitutes an entire chapter of the revised statutes, and embraces more than fourteen sections." Will you shift your ground and call them premature, in view of the small majority which passed and which sustains them—22,215, over a minority of 21,044? Then I answer that whenever public feeling is strong enough to enforce such laws impartially, it is strong enough to dispense with them by acting directly and socially on the drunkard himself. With or without legislation, render drunkenness really disgraceful—as much so as the penitentiary uniform, and let its repetition consign the drunkard to an insane asylum for special medication with hard work. When public opinion is strong enough for that, it has no occasion to peck at commerce with an awkward tool like legislation.

Revolted by the ugliness of certain vices, like intemperance in drink, feminin impulse is prone to confound this so prolific parent of crime with crime itself, against which it is wont to see legislation directed. Yet the more earnestly we desire sobriety, the nicer must be analytical discrimination of means, in order to avoid needless opposition. Now, it is easy to know whether a man is drunk or sober, and to regulate our behavior accordingly; but if you make liquor, instead of its drinkers, your objectiv point, you get presently bewildered. True, it requires no very profound studies to know that fermented drinks, more or less adulterated, cause, through excesses, rather diseases than crimes; that light, pure wines and beers are innocent; the heavier, gouty; and whisky, with its crude fusel oil, more criminal than rum. But other than hygienic reasons meet you when you go to legislate. You might never hav thought of invading the social bier garten, but if, respecting its orderly cheerfulness, you legislate against riotous whisky, Ireland cries out against your partiality to Germany, or labor makes common cause with rowdyism against gentlemanly indulgences in wine. Thus you are politically driven to go the whole hog, and after having, at vast cost of lungs and dollars, conquered a moral majority, your legislation fails by sheer unpopularity.

Another difficulty in legislating against liquor dealing arises from an agricultural interest, in itself auspicious toward temperance. Every observing traveler knows, and the reports of our consuls all over the world, published by government, hav established the fact, that the wine and beer drinking countries are the soberest, and that those disinherited of the vine which hav instituted the still, are corrupted by drunkenness.

At present our lake shores and Ohio valley do most of our wine making of the Atlantic states; but as the steam plow invades our levels, capital, possessed of machinery, will monopolize grain, cotton, and other cultures, except upon the steeper declivities, where only the grape and a few other fruits can be grown to advantage with the spade and pick. The love of independence will then drive the small farmers to the mountains, where Bacchus and the goat wait to welcome them. Our wine culture, then greatly increasing, will at once counterindicate prohibitory legislation, and favor a salutary change in our drinking habits.

In citing Dr. Lewis, I distinguish between his research and testimony with regard to the fact of inefficiency in Maine, and his conclusions from them in favor of the maudlin crusade which he claims to hav initiated and propelled. It is not by spasmodic movements, too much resembling Methodist revivals and salvation armies, that woman can effectivly prevent intemperance, nor has she any occasion to beg favors or to browbeat keepers of saloons. Whenever and wherever moral intelligence is adequate, the leading women of character in any society hav but to organize opinion with regard to their treatment of lovers, in order to carry their point about sobriety. How powerful, in spite of their fantastic notions, were the Courts of Love in Provence, is matter of history. We can do much better now in a practical way. Such feminin and purely social opposition, either to drunkenness or lewdness, is sure to be respected, and is from that dangerous provocation to reaction in favor of culprits, which all arbitrary legislation, with constraint by the arm of a police corps, notoriously engenders. Sentiment and conscience cannot borrow aid from physical force in any form, without weakening their natural influence. The instinct of liberty is insulted when order is imposed by constraint. Yet this same liberty engenders order when left to its own untrammeled evolution by the co-operation of spontaneities.

As to methods of constraints, "main strength and awkwardness," nature, while counterindicating them as against vices, permits them against crimes. Outrages on person or property naturally provoke the same in kind. If legislation mediates, the natural limit to severity is the difficulty of its impartial enforcement. Here again spontaneous social action, as in case of the Californian vigilance committee, is more adaptiv, more discriminativ, prompter, and more effectiv than any code bolstered with precedents and served by lawyers.

Masculin legislation may punish, but never reforms. As for feminin legislation, that is quite another thing, for that will be the end of the reign of things, i. e., of simple material interests; and the beginning of the reign of persons, i. e., of sentiment. And that reign may begin to-morrow, if the young ladies please, without waiting on Congress, or amendments to the Constitution, or the ballot. It is within the easy power of the minor mode, which is the sovereignty of charm, to turn the tables on the major mode, which is main strength and awkwardness, without saying, "By your leave," or, "Dim yer sowl," or iny kind of perliteness. It will be a new phase of the co-operativ movement, but which can originate only at the summit and flower of society, where fine natural faculty coincides not merely with intellectuality, but with the habit of command. It is the queen's move. Far from my pen be the audacity of tracing its course; but among its probable corollaries I foresee the Great Western Republic clearing herself from the breakers of a tremendous civil war, the salvation of property, the redemption of labor from the curse of soulless capital, and general contentment resulting from justice attempered by love.

Knocking Out the Stuffing.

BROTHER MACDONALD: More than a year ago you wrote that if "Antichrist" could prove conclusivly that Paul flourished before the Christian era, it would "knock the stuffing out of historical Christianity."

A little later you seemed to be more than half convinced that there wasn't much "stuffing" to be knocked out, for you said in an editorial, Oct. 27, 1883:

> "Without a foundation in fact, with not a real solid peg on which to hang its pretensions, Christianity has exercised squatter sovereignty in the world, and refuses to vacate until forced by law. It has retreated from the house to the fence, from the fence to the ditch, and there it proposes to fight, joining forces with all the lawless population of the neighborhood."

And now, if, after reading the "Summary of the Life of Paul," you are able to see any "stuffing" left, your eyes are sharper than those of

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is not often that I annoy THE TRUTH SEEKER compositors with fault finding in the shape of corrections, but there are a few mistakes in my article, "Prohibitory and Sumptuary," in the issue of Aug. 2d, that much mar the sense, and hence I solicit a correction. In first line of seventh paragraph, third column of page 484, for "harm" read honor. Seventh line of second paragraph, first column of page 485, for "we" read she. Third line of second paragraph, second column of page 485, for "Ruin" substitute Rum. Next to last line of fourth paragraph, second column of page 485, for "potent" read patent.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The transformation of the word "nude" into made, sadly muddled what I considered one of my best points in my "Realistic Meditation" of last week. I intented to say that spiritists ever pretend to see and attempt to prove too much, and that—old clothes not being immortal—if they saw spirits nude instead of clothed in the identical garments known at the time positivly to be elsewhere, they would not themselvs prove their delusion. But pretending to see certain clothes, when they positivly do not see them, proves absolutely that the spirits they pretend to see in the clothes are a delusion also. Old clothes cannot be immortal, but as spirits are never seen without them, it is self-evident that both clothes and spirits are a phantasm.

EDGEWORTH.

BURR OAK, MICH., Aug. 22, 1884.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: THE TRUTH SEEKER is usually very carefully edited and printed, but I suppose little mistakes would occasionally occur even in a "Paradise not made with hands." There were more printers' errors in that last article of mine on Talmage than I ever saw in a whole copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER before. I think the proof-reader must hav been "out" the night before. Out of several words underscored, only one was italicized. I wrote, "Hebrew and Talmagee," meaning, of course, the language of Talmage, but the final e was omitted, making nonsense of the first part of the sentence. I wrote "Credo," and it was printed "Creeds,' in the same type as the body of the article. A name, the name of one of America's noblest sons, was omitted entirely. Where I wrote capitals they were printed in small letters, and vice versa. Notwithstanding THE TRUTH SEEKER'S correction (?) or oversight, I can't say which, the last syllable of Heidelberg is properly spelled with an e instead of u. And so on. Hoping this kindly criticism will not grate harshly on your nerves—I suppose editors' nerves ought to be made of steel, anyway—I am

Respectfully yours, M. G. W.

IN the North American Review the leading article is by Bishop J. Lancaster Spalding, who insists that the only sure "Basis of Popular Government" is morality, not culture of the intellect, nor universal suffrage, nor the development of material resources; and that if the country is to be saved from ruin, there must be a return to the uncompromising moral code of the founders of New England. Mr. Spalding does not advocate the re-establishment of the Inquisition, but he evidently can see how it would be, in the hands of the "right" kind of Christians, a valuable moral agent. The policy of "The Exclusion of the Chinese" is advocated by John H. Durst, who presents a striking array of forcible and original arguments against Mongolian immigration. Four distinguished writers on political economy, namely, David A. Wells, Thomas G. Sherman, J. B. Sargent, and Professor W. G. Sumner, set forth, from nearly every conceivable point of view, the "Evils of the Tariff System;" and it is announced that in the Review for October several writers of no less distinction will exhibit the "Benefits of the Tariff System." The other articles in the current number are "The Demand of the Industrial Spirit," by Charles Dudley Warner; "Inspiration and Infallibility," by the Rev. Dr. J. H. Rylance; "The Need of Liberal Divorce Laws," by Elizabeth Cady Stanton; and "Our Remote Ancestry," by Professor Alexander Winchell.

The Close of the Convention.

The main features of the meeting up to Friday afternoon were given last week. Mr. C. B. Reynolds used up a couple of hours Thursday afternoon in expounding "Salvation." Notwithstanding its great length, the audience listened attentivly to the address and frequently encouraged the orator by tumultuous applause. We shall, as room is found, print this and other worthy speeches; but as many of the orators forgot to fulfil their promises to hand us their manuscripts—among them Mr. Reynolds—the verbatim report must necessarily be foregone. This issue contains Mr. Chainey's Sunday forenoon speech, to which Mr. Watts replied Sunday evening. Mr. Watts spoke extemporaneously, but we are promised a very full abstract so soon as he can find time to write it out.

Friday, as briefly mentioned last week, was occupied by Miss Gardner and Mr. Remsburg, followed by Mr. Reynolds, as above noted. Mr. Remsburg's speech on "Bible Morals" was what one auditor termed a roarer. Mr. Remsburg himself regards it as the best lecture he has yet written. This is saying a good deal, but in a week or two our readers will hav the opportunity of judging for themselvs. That those who listened regarded it as a thorough and irrefutable indictment of the "holy scriptures" was proved by the loud applause often ringing through the amphitheater. Friday evening a collection was taken up for Mr. Green, who is in very bad health. Eighty-seven dollars were realized. Friday evening was devoted to a D. M. Bennett Memorial Meeting, at which short extempore addresses were made by S. P. Putnam, T. L. Brown, J. H. Burnham, M. E. Billings, W. S. Bell, Charles Watts, and C. B. Reynolds. It was a delightful evening, the subject of Mr. Bennett's wrongs being one upon which perfect harmony of opinion exists among the members of the New York State Association of Freethinkers. Before beginning the speaking, Mr. Green returned thanks to the audience for the collection in his behalf of the afternoon. Mr. Putnam moved, also, that hereafter the secretary of the association be allowed more pay for his services than is usually realized from voluntary contributions for that purpose. He mentioned the sum of three hundred dollars annually. Courtlandt Palmer seconded this proposition in a rattling good speech upon the necessity of better supporting the activ workers in the Liberal field. The printing of Mr. Chainey's speech, called for by his friends, in this paper necessarily crowds out a detailed report of the memorial services.

Saturday morning was a business meeting, at which officers for the ensuing year were elected, and delegates to the ensuing Congress of the National Liberal League. The old board was again chosen, with the exception of some changes in the vice-presidents. A resolution was also adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That as an auxiliary of the National Liberal League, it is the sense of this association that the action of the National League be confined to the Nine Demands of Liberalism, to be supplemented by social and educational work unconnected with party politics.

Resolved, That this association advises the League to elect its officers for practical activity, and that its president (or first vice-president) and secretary be put directly into the field with a salary to be paid out of the funds of the League.

Resolved, That this association pledges itself to aid the officers of the National League in their labors with pecuniary and moral support, and call upon its members to advance the interests of the cause, both by individual and combined effort.

Mr. Courtlandt Palmer seconded the resolution, and it was carried unanimously. The delegates to the Congress were C. B. Reynolds, C. W. Austin, and W. S. Bell. Mr. Putnam then read a paper prepared by Saladin (W. S. Ross), of the London Secular Review. The reading was followed by two ladies, Mrs. Watson and Mrs. Hannah Stearns, both Spiritualists. Their addresses were listened to attentivly, and voted excellent by the audience. The afternoon was filled by Messrs. Billings and Burnham. The evening was given over to hilarity, which took the form of a dance, tickets fifty cents, realizing about twenty-five dollars for the treasury, the rest being absorbed by the band.

On Sunday morning a discussion on the place for meeting next year was held. Cassadaga Lake was unanimously condemned. The attendance was small, and those on hand were all Freethinkers who did not need conversion. Either there were no outsiders to come in and be benefited, or the wretched railroad facilities deterred them. The management of the Spiritualist Association were magnanimous, and their generosity was duly and gratefully appreciated, but everyone felt the unfitness of holding our conventions, of only a few days duration, in a place which furnished no audiences except from people who came to spend the summer, and who had then nearly all departed. A large city was felt to be more advantageous to the spread of our ideas, and Buffalo was the choice of many. Mr. Palmer thought Saratoga would be a good place, and it was finally left to the Business Committee to settle. After the discussion, Mrs. Mattie Krekle made a splendid speech on "Rights, Human and Divine." She promised to write it out, and we hope to hav the pleasure of publishing it ere long.

Mr. Chainey delivered the address printed elsewhere. The address in itself is a fine one, a magnificent rhetorical picture, but it lacks one thing, namely truth. His criticism of his Liberal associates, attributing to them sensualism and intellectual cruelty, was the most presumptuous piece of nonsense ever uttered, especially as he was being paid by an association composed of people many of whom held the very philosophy he was grossly abusing. Non-Spiritualistic Liberals, and many of the more Liberal Spiritualists, felt deeply hurt by his onslaught, and greatly deprecated its delivery. But the offense was not by any means one-sided. In the afternoon Mr. Wakeman spoke, and during his address paid his respects to Mr. Chainey and the Spiritualistic philosophy in rather brusque terms, which angered the believers in immortality as much as Mr. Chainey had offended the other side. All over the ground little groups formed at the close of the lecture, discussing the two speeches, and wondering what Mr. Watts, who had formally been announced to reply to Mr. Chainey in the evening, would say. Mr. Wakeman's lecture was founded on the recent papers in THE TRUTH SEEKER by Frederic Harrison, Herbert Spencer, and S. P. Andrews. His remarks upon Mr. Chainey were incidental, but their caustic nature was very irritating, and the knowledge that Mr. Watts was to further dissect his former colleague's new faith added fuel to the flame. Several said they were now convinced that Spiritualists and Materialists could not work together, and, proceeding on this assumption, one gentleman stopped his two copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, although he had no fault to find with us on the score of Liberality and toleration. His opinion was offset, however, by a few Spiritualist friends advising all their acquaintances to take the paper as being the one journal perfectly fair to all sides. One said he repudiated vicarious atonement, and thought it just a trifle unfair that we should suffer for what the chief editor of Man said. Ill-feeling ran high in both parties, and though the platform of the Convention was absolutely free to both sides, and many Spiritualists occupied it without dumur, it was not until Mr. Putnam had pointed out the "Unities of Liberalism," that anything like harmony was restored. The extent of the jar may be inferred from the remark of a good old lady who said she thought the wrangle had so disturbed the atmosphere that the spirits would be driven away.

Mr. Watts's speech in the evening was a scathing rebuke of Mr. Chainey's attack on Liberalism, and, though strongly Materialistic in tendency, was courteous in spirit, dignified in delivery, and tolerant in tone, making him many friends among his philosophical opponents, who intimated that whatever they thought of Mr. Watts's logic, they were sure Mr. Chainey deserved all the castigation he received.

One of the best addresses of the Convention was that of Courtlandt Palmer, on the "Supreme Being." Mr. Palmer's conception of a supreme being coincides with that of Comte, and he is a believer in the Religion of Humanity as opposed to the current superstition of Christianity. The address was polished and scholarly, and we shall take pleasure in printing it entire when we obtain the requisit permission—and manuscript.

Friday evening Mrs. Mina Seymour, pianist, of Salamanca, a vivacious young lady, invited the speakers and one or two others to a spread of ice cream and cake served in one of the tents adjacent to the hotel. Thanks were duly returned to the giver of so much sweetness, who, however, expressed herself satisfied at having gathered so much uniqueness around one table. This Convention relaxed from its rigidity more than any held formerly, and we feel sure the example was well set. With the exception of the one strain of discord the five days were a round of continuous enjoyment for all on the ground, the hotel keeper excepted. His life was made unhappy by the incessant clamor of unsatisfied guests. All the ladies brought their autograph albums, and the speakers were obliged to duplicate their pretty thoughts about once every half hour.

One of the two regrettable incidents of the meeting we hav spoken of. The other was that the expenditures were greater than the receipts, owing to the large number of speakers and the long distances they were compelled to travel. It was necessary to pro rate, and about one-third of their fees was paid in due bills. Mrs. Krekle generously gave her unreceived balance into the treasury, and perhaps others did that we did not hear of. Any member of the Association who did not attend but wishes to help it out may confer with Mr. S. P. Putnam, 55 East 9th street, this city. The people who were there gave generously, and only the slim attendance, caused by the inaccessibility of the place, prevented the whole cost being defrayed at once.

A considerable number of the attendants at the State Convention were also delegates to the Congress of the National Liberal League, and during the week considerable discussion of the best men to elect to office in that body was heard. Mr. Chainey's name had been mentioned, but after his change of sentiments he was unavailable, for the reason that he was not enough in sympathy with the movement to devote his entire time to working for it. It is his desire to found in some large city a Spiritualistic church, of which he shall be the pastor. His life work, he feels now to be the promulgation of the truth of spiritual communication, and the formation of a religion founded on this truth. Consequently he peremptorily declined to hav his name used in connection with the presidency of the League. Col. Ingersoll was the unanimous choice of the delegates for president, providing he would accept. But it was also strongly felt that at least two officers should be elected who would go out into the highways and by-ways and preach Secularization and organize Leagues. Mr. S. P. Putnam was the unanimous choice for secretary, with Col. Ingersoll for president; and when the delegates heard Mr. Watts speak, a feeling grew that he ought to be secured in some way to help the work along. His experience in organization in England, his practical ability, his personal geniality, his power as a speaker, all combined to make him a working force whose acquisition would be invaluable. His capture is a species of grand larcency from Canada, in which country he had proposed to settle, but it was thought the provinces could stand it, especially if the United States loaned him to them once in a while. And when Mr. Palmer suggested that he be induced to swear alligiance to the states, and then put in a position in the League where he could help build it up, the point was seen at once. Mr. Putnam was morally certain to be the next secretary; everybody liked him for his magnificent enthusiasm, constant self-sacrifice, splendid laboring abilities, poetic genius, generosity of conduct, toleration of beliefs, and general loveableness; he wanted a congenial colleague, and so he united in asking that Mr. Watts be put in the Board with him. That this would be the outcome was patent when the League delegates assembled Monday morning. The details of the Congress will be found elsewhere.

It was a splendid sight to see such old veterans present as Elizur Wright and Parker Pillsbury. Though Mr. Wright is an octogenarian, his mind is as clear as a bell, and his speeches, delivered in a voice just a little weakened by age, are as vigorous in thought and virility of expression as they were when he fought the anti-slavery fight. Of Mr. Pillsbury the Congress heard little. His health is not the best, and he is obliged to husband his strength. But his mere presence was an inspiration to the younger members, who can learn much, if they will, from these veterans in liberty's war. Mr. A. B. Bradford, who is entitled to rank with the abolition fighters, was activly engaged at this Congress as the chairman of the Committee on Resolutions.

The important business of the League was finished Monday night, and many delegates left on the early train Tuesday morning; but for those who remained no trains from the grounds were obtainable until the evening. Tuesday forenoon was occupied by the closing session of the League. Mr. S. D. Moore suggested that the afternoon be devoted to a conference. The visitors had gradually departed until not more than fifty responded to the ringing of the bell for this gathering, but from the illumination of the countenances coming from this little love-feast at its close, we are inclined to think no session of either convention was more enjoyed by the audience, who in this case were also the speakers. But however entertaining it may hav been, time would not wait, and when the dirty cars of the D., A. V. & P. R. R. halted at the Lily Dale station, the last of the Freethinkers were waiting to receive it. As this railroad was never known by any mistake to make connections with other roads, most of the departing guests of the Cassadaga Lake Free Association were obliged to remain in Dunkirk or Jamestown over-night, an opportunity to get something to eat which most of them embraced. From Jamestown and Dunkirk the people scattered in all directions; our ex-president and present secretary returning to New York; Mr. Watts, first vice-president, going to Toronto; Elizur Wright to Saratoga to report to a convention assembled there to discuss the forestry laws and best methods of inducing rainfall in arid regions; and the speakers to fulfil their engagements in various towns in various states. The general opinion expressed by the outgoers was that the Convention was not so successful as had been hoped, but that the action taken at the League Congress was the most important in the history of the League, and gave the most promis of satisfactory results. That over a thousand dollars should be raised from a little handful of people to prosecute the work, shows the great enthusiasm existing when once the practical method is pointed out.

Almost War.

The two following dispatches were printed in Monday's daily papers. The first is from London:

"The antagonism in Belgium between the Clericals and the Liberals is becoming uncontrollable, and threatens to result in civil war. The Brussels newspapers are flooded with letters from sanguinary Liberals urging the press to publish a signal for a rising against the Clerical party, and the writers promis that when the tocsin is sounded there will be no lack of armed men to enforce the demands of the people. Many members of the nobility, although nominally Catholics, are full of indignation against the Clerical program, which they look upon as tending to subvert their established rights. These noblemen are exasperated at the action of the peasants in voting almost solidly for the Clericals, and they propose a variety of reprisals. Those of them who are large landholders propose to take revenge upon their tenants by remaining absent from their property, spending their money in Antwerp and Brussels, and by evicting the farmer tenants whenever they can find a legal pretext for such action.

"The Catholic journals of Brussels, such as La Belgique and the Journal de Bruxelles, hav been for many days urging the boycotting of Brussels tradesmen in revenge for the action of the Liberal mobs which hav threatened and attacked Clerical processions in Brussels. These incitements are now producing their effect, and life is made a burden to commercial travelers going through the provinces as representativs of Brussels business houses. In several instances these drummers hav been threatened with lynching, and some of them hav been glad to escape with their lives, leaving trunks full of costly samples to assuage the fury of the mobs."

The second comes from Brussels and reads as follows:

"The Official Gazette, of Brussels, announces that the king has signed the Educational bill. The Gazette makes a strong appeal to the Liberals to maintain calmness. There were riotous demonstrations to-day at Alost between a number of Brussels pedlers and the inhabitants of Alost. The police were called upon and restored order."

The averting of a similar collision in this country is the object of the National Liberal League. It is the only organization in the country standing on such broad and patriotic ground. The Freethinkers of the country are the only people with foresight sufficient to detect the machinations of the church that in all ages and climes has been the persistent foe of freedom. Isolated and scattered throughout the country, the Freethinkers can, however, do little to oppose these machinations. But they can support the organization which in future will fight, and ultimately defeat, this church, or any church which undertakes to lord it over the consciences of men, or dictate how their children shall be educated.

Let there be peace and unity in our own ranks, that the war against the common enemy may be successfully waged.

Bigotry Rampant in British Columbia.

Having failed in all other means to prevent Col. Robert G. Ingersoll from securing a hall in Victoria, British Columbia, in which to deliver a lecture on orthodoxy, the civil authorities, on learning that he had rented the new Royal Opera House, entered a protest against the building being used for a public meeting on the ground that means of egress were inadequate in case of fire. Their decision was announced on the day Ingersoll arrived, the 28th of August—the date he was announced to lecture. On hearing that there was likely to be trouble, Mr. Ingersoll stated that he would lecture on the street, but feared the interference of the police. Learning that he could charter a steamer then in the harbor, he proposed to charter her at his own expense and take those who wished to accompany him to Port Townsend free of charge, when he would deliver his lecture rather than disappoint them. However, this alternativ was not taken advantage of. He and a number of friends had gained admittance to the Theater Royal, where he proposed to hold the lecture.

Hundreds were waiting outside of the door to gain admittance, but were stopped by the police. The superintendent of police ordered the treasurer to stop selling tickets under pretext that the building was not safe. The treasurer with a few friends then went around to the west side of the building, and with an ax cut an entrance. Mr. Ingersoll and ladies, the United States consul, Colonel Stephens, and other ladies and gentlemen, finally appeared upon the stage. Alderman Fell, stepping forward, began in a strong speech to condemn what he proclaimed as a bold attempt to frustrate free speech, and said that, though British born, he blushed this evening for what had been done. He was enthusiastically cheered. The scene that followed beggars description. Windows and doors were smashed in, by which entrance was effected. The police were powerless to keep order or carry out their instructions. The crowd were with the lecturer, and were determined to hear him. During the melee several ladies fainted. After the police found that they could not prevent the lecturer going on, they contented themselvs with endeavoring to keep order. Immediately after the lecture was over Colonel Ingersoll took a steamer for Washington Territory. It is stated that he will sue the corporation of Victoria for heavy damages. —Dispatch to the New York Herald of September 13th.

Editorial Notes.

THE Rev. H. Martin Kellog, of Sound Beach, Conn., appears to be an honorable sort of man. It will be remembered that Mr. Samuel P. Putnam was called to that hamlet a few weeks since to comfort, so far as a funeral discourse may, the family of Charles Palmer, whose wife had died. In interviews with Mr. Kellog, published in the daily papers, that minister was made to insinuate that the use of the church in which the service was held was obtained dishonorably by Mr. Putnam pretending to be an ordained preacher. We took the liberty at the time of denying this point blank, for Mr. Putnam is not the man to do a dishonest act. Mr. Kellogg himself now corroborates our statement. In the Stamford Herald of the 3d inst. are three letters, one from Mr. Palmer, over the grave of whose wife the Christians hav tried to wage the battle, one from Mr. Bladworth, who made the arrangements for the funeral, and one from Mr. Kellog. We hav room for only the latter:

"EDITOR HERALD: Please allow me to correct some inaccuracies which crept into the report of the recent funeral which was held in the First Congregational church of Greenwich, published in last week's Herald. It must be acknowledged by all to be unwise and harmful to the cause of religion and humanity to hav misrepresentations of such a matter promulgated through the press, and still worse to permit them to remain uncorrected to continue their injurious influence. The officers of our church were unanimous in granting the use of the edifice for the funeral, upon the single condition that the officiating clergyman be a regularly ordained evangelical minister of the gospel. Two hours before the hour appointed for the service, Mr. Putnam, of New York city, was brought to the parsonage, and introduced to me as the minister selected. He stated that he wished to see me personally before proceeding to the service, as he could not meet the imposed condition, not being an evangelical clergyman, or now a clergyman of any sect or denomination. He said he was ordained a Trinitarian Congregationalist, afterward became a Unitarian Congregationalist, and then merged into Liberalism. He proceeded to voluntarily pledge himself not to preach any religious doctrin or dogma of any sort, that he was not here for that purpose, nor did he seek any controversy, but that he had responded to his friends to simply extend the sympathies of humanity and truth to the bereaved family and friends of the deceased Mrs. Palmer. Mr. Putnam, in all his conversation and bearing, evinced himself to be a most courteous gentleman, and entitled to respectful and reciprocal treatment. Upon his statements, I replied that I would take the responsibility of removing the barrier of the imposed condition for the use of the church, and freely and cordially sanction the funeral obsequies. He asked with evident solicitude if it would not create some unpleasant feeling in the community, and said he did not wish to be an instrument of social disturbance. I replied that undoubtedly there would be much talk about it, but he need not heed that, but proceed to perform his duty. The statement in the Herald that 'the pastor felt some trepidation about allowing the ceremony to proceed,' is wholly contrary to fact. I could hav staid the proceedings by a word of refusal at that juncture, but from such a manly, candid declaration from Mr. Putnam, I was quick to see that that would not be the true spirit of humanity or of Christ in the time of mourning. The lengthy description of the service given in the Herald as my words was evidently copied from the New York Sun of the previous Monday. The facts about that are briefly as follows: A reporter of that paper waited on me Saturday evening. I gave him in substance what I hav written above. He then proceeded to ask a volley of questions which I was very chary in answering. Among them were inquiries as to the order of exercises, and whether Mr. Putnam kept his pledge, which I positivly declined to answer. Very many of my people hav asked me these and similar questions, and to all I hav given the uniform reply: 'I express no opinion whatever.' It does not look consistent, surely, that after making that reply many times to all parties, I should giv a detailed and inaccurate description of the whole service with my own minute views to the reporter of a daily newspaper? It is evident that the dailies wished to make as much of a sensation story of the whole affair as possible, no matter what the detriment might be to our community. It is unfortunate also, as it tends to fan a flame of discord and rupture which is likely to burn on indefinitly in continued dislike and prejudice, and will be hard to extinguish. Brethren, while we may jealously guard the sacred walls of our sanctuary against desecration, let us show the spirit of our savior and master in exercising that Christian charity which endureth all things, is not puffed up, not easily provoked, and is the greatest of the three cardinal virtues of our Christian profession. When a man is beneath the waves of affliction by the loss of his wife and the mother of his children, whatever the difference of opinion and religious belief, let us heartily extend the open hand to raise up, and the sincere voice of sympathy to cheer and to win to him who wept himself with those that wept at the grave. For the sake of truth and charity and religion I offer these explanations.

"Very truly yours in the Christian ministry,

"H. MARTIN KELLOG.

THE Rev. Dr. Sexton, of England, is creating great excitement in Toronto by lecturing against Secularism, and has become quite popular with the churches. This Mr. Sexton is an old antagonist of the English Secularists, and Mr. Watts has arrived at Toronto in good time to meet him, which he proposes to do in a four nights' debate. In the mean time Mr. Watts is lecturing at Albert Hall, Toronto. On the 14th he expounded the principles and aims of Secularism, and to-morrow, the 21st, he examins the claims of Christianity. His further dates and subjects at the same place are as follows: Sept. 28th, "Secularism Proved to be Superior to Christianity;" Oct. 5th, "Morality and Religion; Is Man Necessarily a Religious Being?" Oct. 12th, "Religious Fanaticism; Its Cause and Cure;" Oct. 19th, "Agnosticism; An Exposition and Defense." When our presidential campaign is ended, so that the public can be reached on sober matters, Mr. Watts will come down to New York to join the secretary of the League in the Liberal campaign. In the mean time routes will be laid out and arrangements made by Mr. Putnam.

THE "Home Missionary" of the American Nonconformist is rustling through the towns of Iowa in the interest of himself and General Butler. He met many Liberals, among them the stanch Dutton families, who stood by Mr. Bennett so grandly when he was in trouble, and has since stood by the paper he founded. Of the meeting the "missionary" says: "At Grand Mound we met the Dutton's, four in number of families, all highly respected citizens of their respectiv localities. Mrs. Flora Dutton, wife of LeRoy Dutton, is well known over the state as one of the most uncompromising reformers. When D. M. Bennett was in prison, she paid $10 a month toward his defense fund the eleven months he was confined; when he returned from his trip around the world he was down here and made quite a stop with his old, tried, and true friends, and today, if you want to raise a fight with any of the Duttons, you hav only to attack the good name of D. M. Bennett."

FREEDOM of thought means, to some members of the class calling themselvs "Freethinkers," license of expression. A number of persons from this class are at present holding a convention at Cassadaga, in Chautauqua county, N. Y., in which they are airing rather loose sentiments on the Bible, religion, morality, and the Almighty. Miss Helen H. Gardner is delivering her lecture on "Men, Women, and Gods," which she offered to a New York audience last winter. Miss Gardiner is pleasant to look upon, and a proteje of Robert G. Ingersoll. Miss Gardiner might very well be in better company and engaged in a nobler and more womanly work. Mr. Courtlandt Palmer on Sunday was to tell what he thinks of "The Supreme Being." It may interest him some time to know what the supreme being thinks of Mr. Courtlandt Palmer.—Herald.

Journalists are not, as a rule, theologians. The editor of the Herald shows about as much knowledge of Liberalism as the writer in the Times did of religious matters when he referred to Methodism as "a mild form of Calvinism."

IN THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 16th we called attention to the efforts being made by Willis McDannald, of Milton, to secularize his state, Oregon. He prepared petitions, and sent them to all the Liberals in the state that he could hear from. He wants now to communicate with some additional ones, and also to state that all petitions should be returned to him by December 20th. Thus far all the expense has been borne by himself alone, and a little assistance in that way would also be gratefully appreciated. If he is supported as he should be in this endeavor, he is sanguin of success. Col. Ingersoll has been in the state, and met with his usual grand success. The colonel told Mr. McDannald that he would commend his efforts wherever he spoke in Oregon. If the resident Liberals will do as much, the news from Oregon will be glorious.

MESSRS. WATTS, Putnam, Remsburg, and Macdonald are indebted to Mr. Wm. H. Wyman, of Dunkirk, for a very interesting trip through the Brooks Locomotiv Works, located in his town, and with which he is connected. He will please accept the thanks of all the gentlemen for the pleasant and instructiv time spent in his company.

ANY one having a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 30th that can be spared will do us a favor by returning it to this office. Our supply has been exhausted by reason of that issue containing Mr. Andrews's comparison of and reply to Messrs. Harrison and Spencer, and yet the demand is not satisfied.

Letters from Friends.

MURRAY, O., Sept. 2, 284.

MR. EDITOR: I desire once more to write a letter to you to inform you that I am still on the side of Freethought and reform.

I inclose petition for state secularization. Please excuse the dilapidated condition you will find it in. A friend of mine, to whom I had sent a petition for him to take around, in answer to my letter, said in regard to the petition, "I think little about it (recognition of God, etc.). Paine sincerely believed in God, and exp cted to be happy beyond the grave. Some of the petition is repugnant to my feelings. I am not an Atheist. I shall not ostracize myself nor ruin my business in traveling with such a petition; there is no pay in it, and the community I liv in would soon let me feel I am not prepared for the ordeal of proscription."

I will state right here that this friend and myself hav corresponded regularly for the last fifteen years, and I had every reason to believe he was an Infidel, and so he is; but he is one of that kind who, having found out the fallacies and superstition connected with the Christian religion, is satisfied to remain idle, or unmindful of the thousands who are yet "patrons of its corruption."

With your kind permission I will state that I am very much indebted to Mr. Eliiott Preston, that grand humanitarian, for anti-vivisectional literature that he sent me some time ago, the perusal of which has convinced me or the uselessness of vivisection, scientific or otherwise. The evidence is also so strong in favor of anti-vivisection that I feel justified in saying that unless the practice of vivisection is immediately stopped in the physiological schools, our students will be reduced to a state of demoralization that will take years of ethical teachings to eradicate.

The following is one of the many ways the vivisectionists treat their subjects in order to reduce them to a fit condition for their examination: "Planting nails sharp and numerous through the feet of the animal in such a manner as to render the creature almost motionless, because in every movement it would hav felt its torment more acutely."

Great goodness, such cruelty! The above was the pet hobby of Professor Mantegazza. How any sane man can for a moment think of anything being gained by the above operation is more than I can tell.

Are we not told upon good authority that what will kill a hawk will fatten a chicken? and as a chicken resembles a hawk considerably, at least, more than does man a dog, we feel safe in saying that a vivisectional operation upon one species can never result in giving us any knowledge in regard to another species. What then? Why, in order to obtain any knowledge (physiologically) of man, it will be necessary to take man for a subject, and then it is known that what will effect a cure for one will in some cases act in an opposit course for another. But be that as it may, for the sake of argument say that the vivisection of one man will benefit a thousand. Are we going to stand idle and permit human beings to be slaughtered in the name of science? As a votary of humanity, I protest against such cruelties. When vivisection would hav reached such a hight, we would all protest. Why then not protect the lower animal—dog, horse, etc.—as we would the higher animal—man? Let us hav no compromise. Let us hav the total prohibition of vivisection. Allow me to say that "A Pœan of Liberty," by Elliott Preston, in last week's TRUTH SEEKER, was splendid; in fact, everything that flows from his pen is good.

If I am not taking too much space, I would like to inform you how the men of this place were insulted yesterday by the governor (Hoadly) of this state. As you are aware, "these are the times that try men's souls," especially in this part of the country. The miners of this place hav now been on strike twelve weeks, that is, contending for their rights against the unjust demands of the operators, which demands, if conceded to on the part of the miners, would reduce them (the miners) to a state of slavery, equal to, if not worse than, the slavery of 1860. Did space permit, I would giv it to you in full. Suffice it to say that the demand is so tyrannical in its nature that the miners are determined to resist to the bitter end. They (the operators) hav their mine of this place filled up with "foreign laborers," about one hundred and twenty in number.

The company, which is, as I said in a former letter, a very large syndicate under the title of "C. & H. C. & I. Co.," not being satisfied with taking the bread out of the mouths of the miners' wives and children, has added the last "hair to the camel's back" by ordering them to vacate the houses, which is being resisted on the part of the miners by taking legal proceedings. There hav been, to my knowledge, but two cases won on the part of the miners. In all cases where the company wins, the miners are immediately ejected. It will thus be seen that monopoly not only takes the bread from the wives and children of the miners, but throws them upon the cold charity of a much colder world. In view of all this it is but justice to the miners to say they are taking the matter peacefully and philosophically. Well, to come to the point in question, yesterday a dispatch was received at this place—by a prominent Democrat—stating that the governor would be here some time during the day, and to hav as many men as possible to meet him. He was to come on the train. I saw the dispatch myself. In consequence of this a very large (for this place) number of men were congregated at the depot when the train came in, all expecting that Gov. Hoadly would address them. The general feeling among the men was that the governor's object in coming down was to address and advise the people. Such an address! Wonderful advice! Glorious eloquence! What! Do you think the governor spoke to the people? No. He reminds me of the Christian Jehovah who did all his speaking through his man Moses, but probably Hoadly had no man Moses, or again, perhaps the "cat had his tongue." Whatever the reason may me, suffice it to say that the governor of the state of Ohio did not recognize his constituents in their time of trouble. No, he came through like some great magnate on his throne in company with monopoly under the title of "C. & H. C. & I. Co.," or like an asteroid whose circumference the people could not touch. Freethinking governor though he may be, he has lost a great number of friends in this place. There is no doubt that the dispatch was sent here for the express purpose of gathering the men together to create a demonstration so that the governor would go away under the impression that this place was in a lawless condition, when such is not the case. Such remarks as the following could be heard from the crowd as they were leaving after the governor had gone: "Did not the governor make a splendid address?" "Was it not good advice?" "Such eloquence!" etc.

The men, without an exception, were disgusted and felt they had been insulted by the head executiv of the state of Ohio.

Yours for the right, D. E. LEWIS.

READING, KAN., Aug. 30, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I notice a communication from Geo. T. Bruce, from San Francisco, Cal., favoring prohibition. I am surprised that an Infidel, which he says he is, who has become such from a full and free exercise of his own mind, or one that possesses that spirit of Liberalism which we expect to find among Infidels, should take the position which he does.

I deny that prohibition ever originated with Infidelism. He says: "The movement of prohibiting the crime of selling intoxicating liquor is an Infidel movement, and originated from scientific investigation," all of which I positivly deny. While I admit that Infidelity has given freedom to a great amount of mental slavery, and opened up channels for scientific research, I deny that prohibition is in any sense a resultant of that scientific investigation; but, on the contrary, has proceeded from that trammeled condition of mind which we find in the orthodox church. While it is true that scientific research has demonstrated that alcoholic liquors used to excess are injurious to the human system, and while I admit the fact that Infidelity is energetic in advancing knowledge and progress in all reforms to the bettering of the condition of mankind, I deny that it is the province or intention of Infidelity, or that Infidelity recognizes the right, to deprive any man of what he desires, however injurious it may be to him. The idea should be repulsiv to every true Infidel.

The sentiment is of the church, and not of Infidelity. The church says to its ignorant followers, "I know, and you don't know. I am the result of scientific investigation, and I prohibit you from eating any meat on Friday." Infidelity appeals only to reason. He says that the liberty for which we contend is the liberty of the highwayman, when he puts his pistol to his victim's head and says, "Your money or your life," which sentiment, it seems to me, could not hav come from an Infidel who has become such by his own research and reason, from the fact that the position and idea are too ridiculous to hav proceeded from such. The rum-seller and the highwayman might possess the same feelings toward their fellow-men because the same man might pursue both of their avocations, but in no other case could I see that there would be necessarily any similarity in their relativ positions or feelings toward their fellow-men.

The rum-seller would keep his goods eternally if there was no one's desires to supply. It is unreasonable to say that prohibition is not to prohibit the drinker, but only to prohibit him who sells. If there were no one to want, there would be no need of the law, so that prohibition can only mean to deprive a man of what he wants, and is bound to be so construed, which is il-Liberal and also un-Infidel. While Infidelity would favor all law that would redound to the welfare of humanity in protecting life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, it would also favor all law that would extend to every human being a perfect liberty to do what he pleases, unless it be a forced injury to his fellow-men. But the rum-seller's injury—if, perchance, he does an injury to his fellow-men—is not forced, and is as much an unknown injury to him as it is to the merchant who sells the pistol with which the purchaser commits suicide. But there is another feature of the prohibitory law of which I wish to speak. It is not only wrong in principle, but it is wrong in view of the object which it is intended to accomplish. Is it not a fact that human nature is so constituted that contention fosters curiosity, and curiosity demands knowlegde, and knowledge demands experience? It is truthfully said that what is true of families is also true of nations. In the house there is whisky, but the father says to his boys, "You cannot get any of that whisky to drink, because I hav it locked up in my chest." If those boys had the brains necessary to ever become Infidels, they would be into that chest the very first opportunity.

The prohibitory law says to the people: "You can't hav whisky. You don't know what you want. You think you need whisky, but you don't. You, the minority, can't get whisky, because we, the majority, hav got it locked up." The minority get it and drink it, partly to assert their rights, and partly to gratify their curiosity, which contention for and against the law has created.

This is the way the prohibitory law works here in Kansas, and in every other state where it has been tried.

I am prepared to assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that prohibition fosters intemperance here in Kansas, and ever will wherever adopted. W. H. PENFIELD.

OMAHA, NEB., Aug. 28, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Christianity, as a system of religion, claims to be of divine origin, and boldly proclaims to the world that it is the only channel through which the human race can escape a life of endless misery, and obtain a life of joy and happiness for evermore. The church says to the people, individually and collectivly, Unless you subscribe to our creed, and meekly comply with all the requirements of the gospel, as interpreted by us, you will most assuredly be damned forever. Now, sir, that is certainly a most extraordinary assertion, and should not by any means be accepted as true unless supported by positiv proof. It is, therefore, our duty as rational beings to investigate the matter, and ascertain for ourselvs the truth or falsity of such a sweeping assertion.

It appears to me that the claim of divine origin must of necessity rest entirely on the doctrin of the immaculate conception. If that doctrin is true, Christianity is of divine origin. If false, Christianity is as destitute of divinity as the Liberal League of your city. Consequently the question very naturally arises, Is that doctrin true? and we answer by saying that such an occurrence is contrary to all the operations of nature, so far as known to man; therefore we are justified in rejecting it as false until substantiated by proof of the strongest description.

But the church says we must believe that without faith it is impossible to please God. And we reply that without evidence it is impossible for faith to exist. Therefore, if God wishes us to believe a statement or proposition which both reason and observation tell us is false, he must furnish proof sufficient to bring conviction to the mind that such a statement or proposition is true. We cannot believe, or, in other words, we cannot hav faith without evidence to force conviction on the mind. It would be just as reasonable to ask a jury of twelve men to render a verdict on the guilt or innocence of a prisoner before hearing the evidence, as to ask people to believe without proof. Consequently such a thing as faith in the doctrin of the immaculate conception, or in the divinity of Christianity, cannot exist in the minds of people who hav given the subject a careful and candid consideration. Therefore the oft-repeated dogma, "Believe or be damned," although written in a so-called sacred book, is not only outrageously false, but is in the highest degree absurd and opposed to every principle of sound reason and common sense.

Christianity has now been in existence for a period of nearly two thousand years, during which time it has had a multitude of learned and able expounders of its principles. It has succeeded in accumulating a vast amount of wealth and influence among the civilized nations of the globe, it has by legislativ enactments and otherwise obtained privileges which are denied other institutions of a similar nature; yet with all its privileges, wealth, and influence, it has signally failed to accomplish the object of its mission, which, its promoters say, was to free the world from sin and misery, and establish peace and happiness among mankind. Seeing, then, that the principles of this great and powerful institution hav been proclaimed so long and loud to the world with no better results, would it not be advisable for these holy men, the preachers, to throw up the sponge and honestly acknowledge defeat? And we all know how these pious people dread the approach of that young giant which they call Infidelity, although only a youth (figurativly speaking), without either wealth or influence, marching forward so rapidly that in a short time he will shake their venerable institutions to their very foundations—not with such carnal weapons as Christianity used to establish her authority, but with the sacred instruments of truth and reason.

The churches everywhere lament the sin and wickedness that exist within the fold of what they call the faithful, and candidly admit that with all their exertions and most determined efforts they are unable to stem the torrent of iniquity which is continually rushing into the camp of their most devoted followers. Such being the actual condition of the churches, how can we believe Christianity to be a divine institution? Yet the Christian, with all his imperfections and wickedness, will be wafted to heaven, while the Freethinker or doubter whose only sin is unbelief will be consigned to perdition.

ROBT. S. COLVIN.

HELENA, NEB., Sept. 4, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Let me say at the outset that out of fifteen different papers I read, none suits me as well as THE TRUTH SEEKER. The editorials are up with the times, and, when necessary, can strike right out from the shoulder. Your correspondents are generally A. No. 1, except, perhaps, it be those who attempt to enlighten us in the affairs of other worlds, or tell us of a life that stretches out upon the broad ocean of eternity. Now, I hav no desire to take away or destroy one ray of hope, nor even that peace of mind that those who think they believe in a future life claim to hav or possess, but I would be pleased to know at what period of our physical development does spirit or soul begin. It seems to me that they ought at least to know something of the spirit-soul in the present, before they pretend to tell so much about its future. I hav known of quite a number myself, besides hearing of a great many more, who hav received injuries that deprived them of their physical senses, but I never knew nor heard of a case where the spirit-soul ever took cognizance of anything that happened while in this condition and reported it to the senses after they had become conscious. Would it not be well for those who are so mightily stirred up when we question the truth of their so-called spirit manifestations to try at least to giv some demonstration to prove that they had a spirit themselvs, before they tried to stuff us with the idea that one just went out of that corpse? I hav stood by the bedside of the dying with my fingers on the feeble pulse till the last faint flicker ceased, and I never yet hav seen anything in this last trying moment that would lead me to think otherwise than "as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they hav all one breath; so that [in death] a man hath no preeminence above a beast. All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again." But, Mr. Editor, who knows? I know they say they hav the evidence, but is the evidence any better than that offered by that shouting Methdist or that long-faced Presbyterian? Again, who knows? Does Mr. Chainey know? I presume he knows it just as well as he did when he was preaching Christ crucified, and not one whit better. He used to trot out the Holy Ghost. I wonder if he can now trot out one that has not got any holes in it. Aside from all jokes, my experience is such that I hav found in every case, no matter how mild it may be, where it is tinctured with ghosts, spirits, souls, witches, demons, hobgoblins, gods, or devils, they always hav their origin through and from the same cause, a morbid constitution, an unnatural physical development, a diseased organism. There are hundreds of thousands that only need one shake more to do the same, or worse, that Freeman did.

Yours for a sound physical and intellectual development, and the ghosts will be banished from the earth.

W. P. BROOKS.

CLEVELAND, O., Sept. 9, 284.

MR. EDITOR: The city of Cleveland has just passed through a fearful ordeal, which seemed at one time as though it would destroy the entire business portion of the city; but, the wind shifting in another direction, through the herculean efforts of our firemen, the fire was confined to the flats. But it is over now. That which I regret the most is the enforced idleness of several hundred men. But what a change! Saturday, when I was down on the flats, all was life and activity; men were piling lumber and unpiling lumber, and hanling it to the mills; everything denoted thrift and industry. Sunday night, when I went down on the flats, a different scene arose before my gaze. On the flats where so many men had been at work at their several trades the day before, the immense lumber piles, the great factories, and the iron works were in a mass of flames; while every available space as far as you could see was occupied by people. Tuesday, 9 A.M., where are those men I saw working last Saturday? Idle. Where are the great piles of lumber I saw there Saturday? They hav ascended in smoke. Where are the large mills I saw there Saturday? They too hav gone up in smoke. And now I would like to ask my Christian brothers and sisters where was their great, good, and just God; that being who watches over his children with such tender care? My Christian friends, where was he? Where was this great omnipotent being; where was this person, this spirit, or whatever you call him, who, by his simple word, can make or unmake worlds at a time; where was he while this fire was destroying this property in Cleveland? Why did he not exercise some of his power then? Oh, well! poor fellow, I suppose he was counting hairs or watching sparrows fall and didn't see the fire.

A few more words and I am through. On page 574 of THE TRUTH SEEKER is an illustration, the vivisector's death-bed. What an awful scene does that represent! When I look at that picture it makes me shudder. Well has Mr. Preston portrayed, in the poem under the picture, that which must arise before the vision of a man who has spent his time in torturing helpless animals under the plea of scientific investigation for the improvement of the human race. I hav given this matter a little study, to try and find where vivisection had proved a benefit to man, but I hav found but one result as yet, and the further I go the plainer it is. May Mr. Preston continue to show up this inhuman practice until the last vestige of it is wiped from the face of the earth.

With my best wishes for the continued success of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, I am Yours truly, DENNIS A. LOSSING.

JORDAN, MINN., Sept. 5, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: In looking over some back numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I ran across a short article by Elliott Preston, indorsing an articie by P. G. Peabody, relativ to the impropriety of Christian "antics" over the body of a dead Infidel. He says it is contemptible and disgraceful, and those who carry out such a farce over his defenseless remains (knowing full well that, if he were alive, he would protest with all his being against such an outrage) are not his friends, but traitors to the love they professed to bear for him while living.

Reading the above article reminded me of just such a farce as Mr. Preston refers to, that was carried out in this place not very long ago, and I think that every Freethinker will agree with Mr. Preston that such conduct on the part of the friends of a dead Infidel is both contemptible and disgraceful. But is it not a fact that they are very frequently driven to such a course for want of an appropriate funeral service to be used at the funerals of Freethinkers. And is it not a fact that there are hundreds of communities in which a man could not be found who would feel entire confidence in his own ability to deliver an appropriate funeral address, extemporaneously, but with an appropriate funeral service, or some appropriate forms that could be varied to suit nearly ever case, plenty of men could be found who would not object to officiate on such occasions. Why, then, will not some of those able writers, who contribute such masterly articles to the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, write an appropriate funeral service, or a variety of appropriate forms, for that purpose, and hav them printed in pamphlet form, together with a select collection of Liberal songs? With a copy or two of a pamphlet of this description in every community where there are Freethinkers, they would be prepared for emergencies, and in all probability might prevent the carrying out of the Christian farce, or Christian antics, over the dead bodies of Freethinkers.

Hoping that the above subject will receive the attention it deserves, I am, with highest regards,

Yours fraternally, THOMAS KNOTT.

[The suggestion here made is a good one, and has to some extent been anticipated by the publication of "The Truth Seeker Collection of Forms, Hymns, and Ceremonies," which can be obtained at this office for 75 cents, and which will be found to contain appropriate services for the sad occasions of which our correspondent speaks.—ED. T. S.]

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

MR. EDITOR: As thy valuable columns are open to all opinions, not excepting the most pronounced Infidel, I once again send a few lines, with no other motiv than to do some little good by spreading broadcast the honest truth, as found in the grand and universal laws of nature. There is no part or portion of these laws which point or direct mankind to any other world but the one in which they were born. All those many schemes and inventions which hav from time immemorial been either imposed or forced on this planet, and the inhabitants thereof, hav been the sayings and doings of vast numbers of priests of all grades, shades, and fantastic ideas of a most anti-natural, crude, and ignorant character. The present ideas are so many links in the chain of past paganisms. The dogma of another life outside of this planet hath been the theme of priestcraft for thousands of ages; it was the only thing they had to offer for the people's money. It is the same to-day. Seventy thousand useless persons are this day, within the limits of these states, promulgating this dogma, and not one of them knows the least iota of any such thing as a sure and certain fact. Every honest and sensible person must know, or ought to know, that this, and all other dogmas, are the wildest speculations, not bearing the least semblance to solid facts. In short, there is not one religion extant but what is chimerical and full of errors, when compared with the scientific laws of nature, as now well understood by the students of nature's grand philosophy. There is no affinity or unison between nature and religion. They are antagonisms, and can never stand on a par. The one is founded on indelible law, and the other on the most fickle, fantastic, and changeable whims. The one is unmistakable and solid, and the other is froth, excitement, and the wildest folly. Religion is a mixture of dreams, ghosts, and blood. Had it not been for this compound, a three-headed myth would never hav been worshiped. Yours for common sense,

T. WINTER, Materialist.

THE ENEMY COMING!

BANGOR, ME., Sept. 9, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As you are continually on the watch-tower of truth, let me tell you and your readers something about the state election which took place yesterday. Being in the city I took a walk to see what they were doing.

At the place I visited were three ladies gaily dressed, with votes which they handed to every one, with the word "Yes," printed in large letters. If any one wanted a negativ vote they had to call for it, and the word "No" was printed in small letters. The ladies used strong, earnest language to persuade every one to vote "Yes," and it is understood a large vote was thrown in the state for the prohibition amendment.

Handbills were posted up in all the voting places, one of which I inclose for you, and a very much larger one was put on an omnibus and driven round the city. Please print the words on the bill that the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER may know that "the enemy is coming." The poster reads as follows:

"For God, and Home, and Nativ Land! The defenders of these interests should vote YES on the constitutional amendment."

I hav not been in Bangor for a long time, and as so much has been said about rum-selling here, I took a walk to see if I could find any open bars.

They can be found by scores, and the rum-bottles are in plain sight, as much as flour barrels in the grocery stores. I hav been here four days, but hav not seen one person intoxicated. Friends, remember that "God-in-the-Constitution" comes next. SEWARD MITCHELL.

P.S.—It was an inspiring sight to see the cheerful face of the dear TRUTH SEEKER in the houses of my esteemed friends, Albert and William Lewis. S. M.

BOWMAN, GA., Aug. 25, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just read an address on the excellences of the Christian religion in a recent number of the Hartwell Sun, by F. B Doyle. The author of this address was, on my first acquaintance, and until recently, an avowed Atheist, and, notwithstanding he has returned to the old superstitious mire called Christianity, I must confess my love and admiration for him, as he was one of the main subordinate levers by which I was extricated from the quicksands or imaginary fabric called the Christian religion. And as I am endeavoring to work you up a few new subscribers, in which I think I will succeed ere long. I send you the original address, trusting you will everlastingly riddle him. Though it be a small thing with you, it is a good big gun down here. At least do me the favor to dismount his popgun and spike it, as I hav promised some that are beginning to drink of Liberal water pretty freely, if you will condescend to cleave him up through your columns, I will hand it round. I see my time of subscription will soon expire if I should fail to remit for renewal. Please send on my paper, as I will soon, and hav the promis of others.

Yours as true as steel, J. A. HAIRSTON.

[The address to which Mr. Hairston refers either miscarried in the mails or has been mislaid. We hav no doubt that he himself carries guns heavy enough to dismount those of Mr. Boyle, and suggest that our friend undertake the task himself. What assistance is necessary we will endeavor to supply.—ED T. S.]

MILNERSVILLE, O., Aug. 31, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find something that speaks for itself. On this same day there is another one of these things at Winchester, Guernsey county, within four miles of here. They call them colored camp-meetings. Last Sunday there were just seven negroes on the ground. The rest of the crowd were white people, who put in their time (at least, a great many of them) horse-trading, drinking, quarreling, and having a good time generally. All for Christ's sake.

Very truly yours, DR. W. B. ROSAMOND.

The inclosure referred to by Dr. Rosamond is in the form of a "dodger," and reads as follows:

"Last Day! of the Colored Camp-Meeting! Now in session on the Newcomerstown Fair Grounds, will close Sunday, Aug. 31, 1884. God is making a wonderful display of his spirit. Let all come and join us in the praise of our God. Good Preachers and Singers in attendance. Also Mrs. Lucy Cooper, the Lady Evangelist, a Wonderful Power for Christ. Come and hear for yourself! Preaching at 3 o'clock P.M., by Rev Joseph Bane, of Zanesville, Ohio, after which will take place the services of the Return of the Prodigal Son, and killing of the Fatted Calf, with a Rejoicing over the Son! The Ten Virgins! Preaching at 7:30 P.M., after which the Ten Virgins will be represented as recorded in the 24th chapter of the Gospel by Matthew. The meeting will close with a general shaking of hands. W. A. Meridith, Manager."

ALEXANDER, ARK., Sept. 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I hav to thank you for still sending THE TRUTH SEEKER for so long a time after the expiration of the time paid for. My business has been very dull this summer, but with the advent of cooler weather, land seekers from the North will come and, consequently, an increase of my business. I hav everything to contend with in this priest-ridden country. Every man who does not attend their pow-wows and help support the preacher is ostracized and lied about. The sky pilots are holding one of their jamborees here. You can hear them yell for a mile; and their poor credulous dupes sit and take it all in. Here in the South, Christianity is not dying out by any means, but is gaining strength. The mass of people believe that the preacher is the mouthpiece of Jehovah. To illustrate: A gentleman from Illinois attended one of these revivals, and for simply saying that it was disgusting to see men and women perform like a lot of monkeys, and if that was the effect of getting religion he wanted none of it in his, he was arrested for speaking disrespectfully of Christianity, and fined.

ANDREW J. HALL.

IDAHO SPRINGS, COL., Sept. 8, 1884.

MR. EDITOR:.We hav just finished reading Colonel Kelso's "Bible Analyzed," and pronounce it one of the ablest works of the kind we ever read; indeed, we think that it would be impossible for any thinking mind to read this work and any longer regard the Bible as a sacred and good book; therefore we would warn all good Christians that believe in the Bible and the God of the Bible not to read Kelso's analysis of the Bible, for if they do, like our first parents, their eyes will be opened, and they will no longer remain in the beautiful garden of Eden.

Please find herewith money-order for "The Real Blasphemers," and three months' subscription to your valuable and fearless paper—THE TRUTH SEEKER.

MRS. H. A. HOUGH.

MANSFIELD, PA., Sept. 3, 284.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find seventy-five cents to apply to my subscription. I would like to hav all the errors in the Bible exposed, so that the committee on revision can correct them. For instance, in the thirty-sixth chapter of Genesis it reads: "And these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom before there reigned any king over the children of Israel" (31st verse). 1 Samuel, tenth chapter, first verse, reads (1095 years B.C.): "Then Samuel took a vial of oil and poured it upon his head, and kissed him" (making Saul king of Israel). 1 Chronicles, twenty-first chapter, eighth verse (891 years B.C.), says they (the Edomites) made themselvs a king, making an error of 204 years. How is it? O. J. LOVELL.

BRONSON, FLA., Aug. 21, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3.60—$3 to apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for the balance send me "Crimes of Preachers," "Freethinkers' Almanac," and "False Claims." And now that the monument is completed, I repeat the offer I made last winter, viz., a donation of twenty acres of land on which o build a home for needy and superannuated Liberals. The location is very healthy, pleasant, and convenient to railroads. There are a number of intelligent Liberals already residing here as permanent settlers. The climate is particularly agreeable to persons well advanced in years.

Yours for progress and Freethought, O. RICHARDSON.

ANGOLA, IND., Sept. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3, to pay another year for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, which is certainly carrying out its mission by granting all parties the privilege of being heard through its columns. I hav been a Spiritualist for thirty-two years, yet I like to read those Materialistic ideas of Elmina, Winter, and others. Man cannot believe what he will, but must believe from the force of evidence.

Yours for truth and progress, DR. J. H. MOORE.

BUTLER, N. J., Sept. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: As some of our Liberal friends of this place are of the opinion that machinery is only beneficial to the inventors and the capitalist, and more or less injurious to the workingman, I request some of our Liberal friends to be kind enough to giv us some information on the subject through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. It occurs to me they are in error, and ought to be enlightened on the subject.

GEO. KRAHMER.

GLENVILLE, CONN., Sept. 1, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: I believe there is a fair chance for a good doctor in this village. If you know of one, please place me in communication with him. This village has about four hundred inhabitants, and about four hundred more within a radius of six miles. There is no doctor here at present, and none within three miles. The place is growing. H. J. MUNSON.

MCSOUTH, KAN., Aug. 2, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3 to renew my TRUTH SEEKER subscription. Fifteen months' acquaintance with it has made me feel that I shall never willingly do without it. With best wishes for your success in a great and good work, I am, Yours sincerely, M. A. T. STEEPER.

WESTMINSTER, CAL., Aug. 20, 1884.

MR. EDITOR: Send us a good Liberal speaker to the "Land of the Angels." This county and San Bernardino and Santa Barbara counties can and will pay a good speaker and reasoner a good salary. Correspondence solicited. S. P. BATES.

A GOOD way to promote the cause of Freethought is to get trial subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. To such the paper will be sent three months for fifty cents.

The Liberal Club.

The cool wave that struck New York last week encouraged more attendants at the 344th meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club than had come to the previous one, but the hall was not full. Ladies, many of whom were young, and all of whom were engaging, composed about half the audience. Dr. Weeks, recently returned from the country, came in and asked Assistant Librarian Chamberlain who was to speak. "Shook," answered Mr. Chamberlain. "Do you think things will be shook up?" said the doctor. Mr. Chamberlain administered an appropriate reproof. At the solicitation of the chair, the assistant secretary read the minutes of the previous meeting.

Mr. Wakeman, presiding, made a short report of the proceedings at the Cassadaga Convention and Liberal League Congress. The latter he characterized as the most successful ever held. The Convention, he said, opened with a ball, at which the Liberals and Spiritualists danced together in great harmony. Chainey had set forth his new faith, and drubbed the so-called Materialists mercilessly. "Your humble servant," as the chair designated itself, had then replied to him and livened up the animals very materially. Mr. Watts had done the same.

The chairman then announced with considerable emotion that Mr. Shook would not be present at the club this evening. He had had a chill. However, Col. A. H. H. Dawson was there, sent thither undoubtdly by a special providence, and would address the meeting.

Col. Dawson took the floor. "To-day," said the colonel in opening his speech, "I asked a man to take a drink. I supposed he would decline, because I had seen him drink not five minutes before. The man said he would refuse only he was afraid of getting in the habit of it—the habit of refusing." The colonel then went on to say that he would refuse to make a speech on this occasion if he were not fearful that he should contract the habit of refusing. But a man who had lived for sixty-five years in this world should always be prepared to make a speech on a momentous subject like that of the presidential contest. He was glad that the audience was no larger, because he was not at his best. He had never before congratulated himself on the smallness of his audience except once, and that was when he was addressing one lady. The speaker believed in criticism, provided he could hav the last tag. The minister in the pulpit had an unfair advantage in this respect, because, whatever he might say, no one had a chance to reply. The tariff question, the colonel said, was not material; neither were the questions discussed by capital and labor. These could not ruin the country. Our great danger was from centralization of power. James G. Blaine was first cousin to the speaker, but he (the speaker) did not believe that was any particular honor to himself. He then brought up the popular charges against Mr. Blaine, and inquired, "Can you say anything like that about Grover Cleveland?" Some one in the hall said, "Yes." "What is it?" asked Mr. Dawson. The voice was silent. The audience thought of Mr. Cleveland's indiscretions and smiled. Mr. Dawson spoke of the scandal concerning Mr. Blaine's method of getting married, and said that the truer it was the more it reflected credit on Mr. Blaine. He only wished the Plumed Knight had been as true to his country as he had been to his wife. Several persons left the hall during the delivery of Col. Dawson's speech. These he reproved by saying, "The wicked flee when no man pursueth."

Mr. Cohen took exception to the previous speaker, though he charitably gave Col. Dawson the benefit of the doubt as to his honesty. Cleveland cared nothing for the constitution when monopoly asked a favor, but when labor was the applicant the case changed its aspect, and the law must be upheld. The Democratic party took no interest in the laboring man except on election day, when it would fill him up with whisky and corral his vote. Mr. Cohen spoke for some time, but as a committee of one on advertising he did not report.

Mr. Andrews believed that Cleveland was a survival of the old-time honest politician, while Blaine was a dashing, unscrupulous statesman, determined on success, honest if convenient, but success at all hazards. His nomination and candidacy were the fag-end of the third-term Grant boom, and represented the same tendencies, though not in so dangerous a form. Cleveland was hampered by the constitution, which the people themselvs had made and put him under oath to support. Mr. Andrews believed that Cleveland had kept that oath. The people must change the constitution if they wish measures carried which are opposed to it. As for Mr. Andrews himself, he was more interested in a Republican Socialism, which Cleveland knew nothing of, and could do nothing for if he did, while bound by the law and his oath of allegiance to it.

Dr. Weeks held that the old parties were no longer worthy of support. Our laws were the will of monopolists. A new party should come up which should embody the principles to which the Republican party owed its existence, and to carry out the objects for which the Republican party was founded. The doctor made a good speech.

Mr. Beaumont, a stranger to the club, spoke at the suggestion of Mr. Cohen. This gentleman said that the only positiv plank that ever appeared in the Democratic platform was put there during the candidacy of George B. McClellan. That plank declared that "the war was a failure." Mr. Dawson had touched upon the family relations of Blaine. Why, Mr. Beaumont would like to know, was not something said about the family of Cleveland?

Mrs. Leonard arose to remark that the men had better stop talking about one another's morals. They had no standard of morality for young men, and did not demand that a man should be moral except when raised to some high position. She thought that masculin immorality was generally a matter of more moment to women than to men, and that the question either of male or female morality should cease to be discussed by males, since they had no virtue themselvs to boast of; least of all should they condemn lack of virtue in woman.

Mr. Dawson, in taking advantage of what he called the "last tag," said that the discussion that had arisen from his feeble remarks had been amusing if not instructiv, and that he hoped every man would make up his mind to vote according to the best light God had given him, looking both to his own happiness and the destiny of the nation.

At the next meeting a Republican orator will advance the claims of Mr. Blaine to the support of the Liberal Club.

To Friends.

Here I am at Masquerier's, at 99 Java st., Greenpoint, Brooklyn, N. Y. I had a warm but not an unpleasant trip, and everything from the first start has been propitious thus far.

I found Mr. Masquerier and a single sister of his keeping house together and doing their own work. Though she is eighty-three years old, she is activ, healthy, and cheerful, and a perfect embodiment of her name, Patience.

They met me with all the kindly greetings of old and true friends, and I feel as perfectly at home here as if I had known them for years. Mr. Masquerier, as you all know, is an enthusiast on the land question, and the great work of his life has been an effort to hav all the land divided up into inalienable homes for all the people, to do away with the great cities, and hav rural homes dot the whole earth. One thing is sure—all these great efforts for human good and human happiness work in the end for progress, purity, and the elevation of the race.

I hav been up in his "den," as he calls it. It is a perfect magazine of books and papers. He has all of Mr. Bennett's books, and great files of TRUTH SEEKERS, Investigators, and land reform papers, and so many others that it tires the brain to think of and even enumerate them; and how much more to read and understand them all!

My one great regret is to think that a mind like his must ever become (as an identity) extinct. If it could but be as our spiritual friends believe, that the whole life of the individual could be continued on in another sphere, and be the same life still, then the good work begun here could be gone on with over there. But every good seed sown here will some day germinate and produce fruits for the future, even though the individual existence is so brief and limited.

With the mercury in the nineties not much can be done toward sight-seeing, but while I am resting I am not losing time.

Yesterday Mr. Masquerier, his sister, and I went to the beautiful city of the silent sleepers, Greenwood. None of us had ever seen the monument "erected by one thousand friends" to their beloved, lamented, and worshiped hero-martyr, D. M. Bennett. Having no guide, we wandered about a long time before we found it. On our way we paused awhile at the stone that marks the spot where lies the only other man whose personality was, perhaps, as dear and precious to his readers as was our Bennett's to us—Horace Greeley. We stood within the little inclosure and gazed reverently upon the noble features of the great founder of the New York Tribune and the friend of the people. We saw him pictured below as a young lad setting type. We saw the emblems, the plow and the pen; and on the lovely grass at our feet grew in tender foliages of green and white the letters "H. G.," and just below them, in the same way, was growing the name "A D A." By and by we reached the one spot most longed for—the grave where our hero was buried.

Oh, how beautiful! We were more than pleased. The locality, the plot, and the stone, all were perfect. My friends said, "Read for us the inscriptions." I tried it with trembling and faltering voice. I could not finish, and Patience read the third side. She has been a school-teacher, and she reads impressivly and distinctly, as well as appreciativly.

I wish you could all know this lovely old maid, so kind and gentle and good, and her mind as strong and activ as ever, and her step as brisk and tireless.

We stayed some time at the "Holy of Holies," thinking of the good works and loving heart of the great sleeper. We saw the beautiful row of geraniums and colens that encircled the plot, the two tall urns of exotics with drooping vines and lovely flowers, the pine-tree in the corner, from under which we each gathered a cone. Then, plucking some ivy leaves from the grave, for remembrance, we silently and reverently bade him adieu. I say him, for our hearts were so full of him that he seemed to be there with us. We felt it was good for us to hav had this sweet communion, even though it was really all in ourselvs. I am not much of a hand to care for monuments and parades over the dead. But I believe in them for the commemoration of our few great and grand heroes, our men and women who hav been public benefactors, who hav lived outside of themselvs and lived for others.

Horace Greeley and D. M. Bennett are such men, and hence I am glad they are so honored by true and loving friends. Affectionately, ELMINA.

The Petition for State Secularization.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I propose certain additions to the petition on State Secularization which were omitted from the original draft (the one on marriage in particular) for fear they would not meet with general approval; but this fear has been dissipated by maturer thought and consultation. The time seems opportune for the amendments, as the meeting of Liberals just now in national convention will enable the friends of State Secularization to pronounce on the petition as a whole, and so to elicit, besides wholesome criticism, an increased interest and zeal in the work itself. To the eight specifications already contained in the petition, two are now added, making them ten. And the concluding paragraph, being the summary of the whole, is altered so as to bring out the idea or principle more fully and more clearly. As one interested in the petition I feel to thank THE TRUTH SEEKER for the interest it has shown, and the advice given in the work. Come, Liberals all, and let us be one, and put head and heart into this work, and make of it a success, a grand success.

9. The vague and indeterminate sense in which the words civil and sacred are used when applied to the marriage contract; and the appeal to God or the Holy Scriptures by some of the states, as the final authority on marriage.

10. Making morality subject to church dogma, by describing it as Christian, instead of natural, morality.

11. The license rather than liberty given to religion by the first amendment to the United States Constitution, by forbidding Congress to make any law "prohibiting the free exercise thereof;" which means, really, "the free exercise" of whatever anyone chooses to call religion.

. . . . . .

The total separation of church and state, by prohibiting Congress or any state, county, municipality, or township from enacting any law that infringes the rights of conscience, or favors any practices in the name of religion, or of aught else, that interfere with private right or the public welfare.

T. W. CURTIS.

Lectures and Meetings.

AT the next two meetings of the Liberal Club the following subjects will be presented by the speakers named: On the 19th, "The Republican Party and Its Future" (Blaine), by Gilbert R. Hawes; on the 26th, "Prohibition in Politics" (St. John), by John H. Gibbs.

C. FANNIE ALLYN will be in Cleveland, Ohio, during December, and if Spiritual and Liberal societies desire her services they may address her for several weeks yet at Stoneham, Mass. Mrs. Allyn is a brilliant speaker and a whole-hearted woman, who, while believing sincerely in a "life beyond the grave," is heartily laboring to make the life this side of that mortal finality a much pleasanter one than it is now.

DR. J. C. PHILLIPS, of Omro, secretary of the Wisconsin State Association of Spiritualists, sends us the following encouraging report of the meeting recently held in his town: "The meeting just held in this place was a marked success in every respect. Indeed, with Mrs. H. S. Lake and A. B. French, no meeting could be a failure. The philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism, and the practicalities of life, were thoroughly discussed. One of the fine features of the meeting was the music, furnished by the Cross Concert Troupe, which gave universal satisfaction. The election of officers for ensuing year resulted in the selection of Professor Lockwood, of Ripon, as president, and the writer hereof as secretary. Mrs. M. J. Pratt was elected vice-president, and John Challoner, treasurer. The next meeting will undoubtedly be held in Milwaukee, the first of December next, due notice of which will be given."

MR. S. P. PUTNAM'S novel, "Waifs and Wanderings," is now published in book form. Everybody liked the story of Cupples and his search after Bessie when it was printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER; but the tale takes on a new interest in its more connected book form, and will repay a second perusal. It is handsomely printed, and bound in the finest style. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 50 cents.

A GOOD way to promote the cause of Freethought is to get trial subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER. To such the paper will be sent three months for fifty cents.

Children's Corner

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"His life is long whose work is well,
And be his station low or high,
He who the most good works can tell,
Livs longest though he soonest die."

"The Death of Susie."

(Inscribed to Miss S. H. Wixon, with warmest sympathy.)

The birds are singing sweetly, as they used to sing of yore,
Still the jasmine's fragrant blossoms bloom above the open door;
But thy love, that crowned with glory the fair city of my soul,
Is departed, ah, forever, leaving nought save sorrow's dole.

Nevermore upon this bosom may'st thou rest thy gentle head,
Nevermore thy smile shall bless me—thou art numbered with the dead.
Nevermore, in all the summers that may sadly come and go,
Shall thy kiss translate to Eden life's unblest and lengthened woe.

"Dead," they call thee! In the sunbeam dost thou sparkle 'pon the grass?
Bloom'st thou in the rose's petals, where my fainting footsteps pass?
It may be so; yet I cannot yield thee to the insensate clay;
Soul to soul I yearn to greet thee in the spirit's perfect day.

Beauteous dreamer! be thy slumbers gentle as thy guileless breast,
That was spared life's bitter anguish; and thy kisses, still they rest
On my lips, sweet! And thy fair cheek through the night's long hours is lain
'Pon my bosom, where of old, dear, I was wont to soothe thy pain;

Wont to soothe thy childish sorrows, that to thee seemed deep and wide.
None knew, darling, how I loved you—how my heart broke when you died!
Oh, my tears are falling, falling, faster than the summer rain!
Would that I might rest beside thee, stilling beat of heart and brain!

Stilling all my fevered pulses from Nirvana's shadowdy shore,
Wrapt with thee in dreamless slumber, both at peace forevermore.

ELLIOTT PRESTON.

6 Park Square, Boston, Mass.

"I Can, Because I Will."

"It is very strange to me how some people always get along so nicely. There's Rebecca Smith never misses in her lessons, never is in a hurry, never makes a mistake as I know of, or, if she does, she is so quiet about it that nobody knows it. Oh, dear! this is a hard and wicked world, I think," and Florence Phillips bit her lips and sighed.

"I think just as you do," said Annie; "everything goes wrong with some folks. Now, I'm forever twisting my ankle, spraining my finger, or something of the sort; but other folks will slide along and never hav a bit of trouble. Here's this sheet that I am sewing up. See, I can't make the seam come straight to save me. We are two sisters and we're always in trouble. I can't see why we should be."

"You can't because you won't."

"Are you listening, Aunt Bessie?"

"Well, as I was sitting here, I could not very well help hearing your conversation, and being amused at it too."

"You know it is so, Aunt Bessie," said Florence, sighing dolorously. "I can't get my lessons fixed in my head anyway. Oh, dear! Say Annie, did you see how Mabel's dress hung down at the sides last night at the party? Wasn't it frightful?"

"I know it. And how Eliza looked with her hair banged. I couldn't help laughing to save me. And did you notice the pink stockings? Pink stockings and a blue dress. She thinks she's a great beauty. Pooh! I look as well as she does—just as well," said Annie, tossing her head.

"But you can't play the piano as well, Annie."

"I know I can't. I wish I could though, but then I never can. It must be nice to play and sing good. And oh, how I wish I could paint as nicely as Dicky Calvert. He draws so beautifully. Ah, it is a great gift. I would giv anything if I could draw well, but it is no use to wish, for I never can."

"You can't because you won't."

"What's the matter with you, Aunt Bessie? Don't you know that some people are gifted more than others? Some hav a faculty to do things that others cannot do."

"That may be so, Annie; some can do many things easier than others, but others can do a great deal more if they would keep a certain stumbling-block out of the way."

"What stumbling-block, Aunt Bess?"

"That little word, 'can't.'"

"Well," said Florence, "that is a pretty big word sometimes. It looms up mighty high just at present in my arithmetic lesson. I can't understand per centage, and I never shall."

"You can't because you won't. You don't try."

"I hav tried;" and she bit the pencil in her hand angrily.

"Not half so hard as you tried to see how little Eliza's dress was hanging at the sides last night."

"Couldn't help seeing that."

"And if you would look as attentivly at the rules and examples in your lesson, it would be as clear as you would wish. If you would put your mind to your music and drawing, you would be as skilful in either as you could wish to be. I am very certain of that. We hear a great deal about the gifted ones, the people of genius. Maybe you think, with many another, that they simply hav to turn their hands over to find them full of whatever they wish. It is not true. They hav to work for what they hav, and they never get it by saying, 'I can't.'"

"That's the talk, Aunt Bess. You've just hit the nail right square on the head," and Will, cousin Will, brought his hand down hard upon the table by way of emphasis. "There's my sister Jane, thinks people hav what they want by wishing. All the time, it is, "Oh, I wish I had this,' and, 'I wish I had that.' And if you ask her to do anything, it is, 'Oh, I ca-n't.' I asked her this morning to bind the frame of my slate over—it is all ragged—and she said right off, 'I ca-n't.'"

"Why didn't you do it yourself?" inquired Annie.

"I can't do such things; I'm a boy."

"Pshaw! that's all nonsense. I don't see as you are any better than Jane. I think you know how to say, 'I can't,' as well as anybody."

"It is quite likely," said Aunt Bess, "that Will has the same habit as Jane, and a great many others. We do not see our own little ways and habits, as we see the ways and habits of our relativs and friends. We are apt to think ourselvs quite perfect, and everybody else rather imperfect."

"I know Jane is."

"We all are, I suppose, more or less; if not in one thing, we may be in another. Do you not think, without reflecting on the imperfections of others, that it would be wise to mend our own ways? Now, about this 'can't' business—do you not think it would be better to substitute 'can' for 'can't?'" Would it not accomplish more, in the long run?

"Of course you hav all read about Napoleon Bonaparte."

"Great man, he was—a big general," said Will.

"Yes; well, I was about to tell you a little incident that is related of him. He was about to commence a new enterprise that was very difficult, and his friends told him it was very doubtful if he could surmount such difficulties and obstacles. 'I can surmount them,' said Napoleon. 'I can, because I will,' and he did.

"And so by going right to work, and persevering patiently, you can do what you undertake to do. Henry Clay was a famous orator, as you may know, but he was not brilliant without study. He once said that he commenced oratory in the field when at work. He would repeat the history he had read, with emphasis, thus fixing it in his memory, and exercising his voice at the same time. Charles Sumner, another of America's great statesmen, wrote his speeches, and then learned them off by heart, practicing them over and over a great many times before he had them to suit him."

"I suppose we would be greatly astonished if we knew how people of genius, as we call them, work," mused Florence.

"I think we should," said Aunt Bess. "Nothing really great comes except by exertion. Buffon, a famous naturalist said, 'Genius is nothing but labor and patience,' and he was right. Hard work and a great deal of it lies at the bottom of what is termed success, and people who do succeed are not those who make the most noise and bluster in the world. How long do you suppose it took Victor Hugo to write the books of 'Les Miserables' that you could read in, well, to take plenty of time, say a month or six weeks?"

"Maybe it took him a whole year!" said Annie.

"I guess it would take him two years, sure," declared Will.

"Well, he worked on those books for twenty-three years!"

"Land of love!" exclaimed Florence.

"Writing, reading over, erasing here a word, and supplying there another, he was all that while occupied with that as his chief work, but, you know, they are books that will liv and endure while thousands of books written hurriedly will perish and be forgotten in a year. Carlyle worked on his "Life of Frederick the Great" thirteen long years. Musicians practice and practice years and years, and persevere through many drawbacks. The same with great artists. I know a celebrated artist who painted a great many pictures before he became famous. Indeed, he was gray-headed before he became known to the world. But he meant to succeed, and he did. The proper way for all is to persevere, and do whatever you undertake to do well. And I would advise you all three to drop that word 'can't,' and adopt Napoleon's sentence for your motto, 'I can, because I will.'"

Poetry.

The Rime of Sir Lionne.

In days of old, as rimesters tell,
(Culvert, and petrel, and mangonel,)
A maiden dwelt in a castle stout,
Guarded and walled, within, without,
And ever defeat and direful rout
To all her castle's besiegers fell.

No suitor the maid's proud heart could win,
(Pike, and halberd, and culverin;)
She recked not of love-kiss, ne vow, ne sigh,
But her song had the ring of a battle-cry;
"O strong is my fortress—a maid am I—
And never a foeman shall enter in."

But it fell in an evening windy-wet,
(Hauberk, and helmet, and bascinet,)
A knight drew rein 'neath the castle wall;
Proud was his port, his stature tall,
His face held the gazer's eye in thrall,
And a lion of gold on his casque was set.

He winded a bugle silver-clear,
(Mace, and arblast, and bandoleer,)
Singing: "Yield up thy castle, fair May to me:
Sir Lionne me hight, of a far countrie.
Now boune thee, lady, my love to be,
Or I take thee by prowess of bow and spear!"

In the pale, pale light of a crescent moon,
(Spear, and corselet, and musketoon,)
She saw him there by the castle wall,
And shrilled to the warder a careless call:
"Ho!—let portcullis and drawbridge fall;
We would see this bold knight of a braggart tune."

And oh! but the wind had changed, I trow,
(Falchion, and gauntlet, and good cross-bow,)
When, an eve from thence, in a fading light,
On the bastion-keep stood a maid and knight,
And, while to his heart he clasped her tight,
"Thou hast conquered, Sir Lionne!" she murmured low.

"I had vowed that no knight beneath the sun,
(Demi-pique, helm, and habergeon,)
Beneath the sunlight, or moonbeam shine,
Should be lord of this castle and heart of mine;
But take me, dear love, I am only thine;
My fortress is taken, my heart is won."

Science at Montreal.

From the Sun of Sept. 4th.

The week's session of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, held this year at Montreal, closed yesterday, and by general agreement the meeting was successful. It was at first thought that the proposition to bring so large a body from Britain to Canada was preposterous; and it was long doubtful whether enough of the strong men of the association would take the voyage to create a fairly respectable meeting. There was at first a rush of people willing to accept the easy terms of new membership to avail themselvs of so favorable an opportunity to visit America; but this proceeding was quickly stopped by the council, so that the attendance from England mainly consisted of bona fide members, and of these nearly a thousand crossed the Atlantic. In point of numbers the assemblage was up to the usual standard, if not decidedly above it. About eighteen hundred members were registered, including, of course, the Canadian savants and those from the United States. At the Southport meeting last year twenty-seven hundred and fourteen were present, but at Southampton the year previous the number was only twelve hundred and fifty-three. The present meeting was, in fact, too large for the Montreal accommodations, and the consequence was a great deal of uncomfortable squeezing.

In point of quality, or the scientific character of the members present, the meeting was quite up to the average. A large number of the leading investigators of science in all departments of inquiry were on hand. A few of the English magnates were missed, but no more than are usually absent from the meetings at home. The officers were men of distinguished ability. Lord Rayleigh, professor of physics at Cambridge, presided, and of him but little was known; in fact, it was supposed that his selection was due to the tuft-hunting propensities of the English, by which lords and dukes hav been frequently chosen for this office. But the public has now found out that Lord Rayleigh is a man of remarkable talent, and the compeer of the most distinguished who had previously held the post. He is a genial gentleman, of modest manners and no airs, an efficient presiding officer, and a ready and agreeable speaker. He, moreover, proved himself to be possessed, in an eminent degree, of the faculty of lucid exposition in dealing with abstruse subjects; and for a profound mathematician and a subtle experimenter, he excited some surprise by the practical bearing and strong common sense of his ideas. His inaugural address, on the "Recent Progress of Physical Science," was comprehensiv and much condensed; and it was listened to with the closest attention throughout by an immense audience.

The British Association performs its work in the customary way by the division of labor. It is broken up into eight sections, which meet separately, each having its own president. These were all men of the first rank. Sir William Thompson presided over the section of physics and mathematics, Sir Henry E. Roscoe over the chemical section, Professor W. T. Blanford over the section of geology, Professor H. N. Mosely over that of biology, Sir J. H. Lefroy over the geographical section, Sir Richard Temple over that of economical science and statistics, Sir F. W. Bramwell over the mechanical science section, and the distinguished author, Dr. Edward B. Tylor, over the section of anthropology. Each of these gentlemen gave an address at the opening of the proceedings in his section, and all the presidential discourses had been previously printed and were ready for distribution after their delivery. They were carefully prepared, and, taken together, form a considerable volume, devoted to a presentation of the present state of inquiry in all the leading divisions of of sciences, reporting whatever has been recently done in them that is noteworthy, and stating the problems that next press most urgently for solution.

The original papers contributed to the several sections were, as usual, of varied importance. The discussions that follow their reading at these conventions are undoubtedly the most interesting and profitable part of the proceedings. A paper upon a particular subject being announced in the morning program, naturally draws to the section all who hav made that subject a specialty; and the criticisms, suggestions, and further elucidation contributed by the experts are always instructiv, and often spicy and exciting. The new views presented hav to undergo a sharp ordeal. Huxley says that Herbert Spencer's notion of tragedy is an hypothosis slain by a fact. Ardent theorists hav to submit to a severe test when they come before the disciplined and vigilant cultivators of their own subject in these sections, with whom bubble pricking is always an agreeable pastime.

Of course the coming of such a host of British savants to Montreal was a great event for Canada. The Canadians were proud of the honor, and did not fail to improve the occasion to magnify the dominion as an integral portion of the British empire entitled in future to increasing consideration. Indeed, the movement will unquestionably be a first-rate thing politically and economically for the Canadas. A thousand Englishmen of the solid, practical, level-headed sort that constitutes the membership of the British Association, cannot visit the provinces with the facilities that were offered them to become acquainted with the extent, resources, institutions, and character of the people without diffusing much correct information in England and dissipating many errors and prejudices. All this, however, is but incidental. The influence of the meeting will be chiefly felt in giving a new impulse to science in Canada, and, in connection with the meeting of the American Association which opens in Philadelphia to-day, the effect will be a general stimulation of scientific study through the more intimate intercourse of the scientific men of these different continents.

The coming of the British Association to this side of the Atlantic in full force to hold a regular annual meeting, very naturally awakens suggestions of comparison with the American Association, of similar name and objects, which was organized twenty years later in imitation of the English plan. The British Association was the pioneer in the peripatetic field, and the general policy of the two associations is identical. As regards scientific investigation, the older body, being the older and richer, and having the larger number of trained and experienced investigators, has done much more work, but the character of the work is the same. There is, however, some diversity in the spirit and management of the two bodies, which is suggestiv of contrasts in the temper and preparation of English and American men of science. There is one feature of difference which we should hardly hav been prepared to look for. The British Association has undoubtedly manifested from the beginning a deeper interest in the popular side of its work than the American Association. Indeed, it incorporated in the earliest authentic statement of its purposes the design of acting upon the public mind for the awakening of a more general interest in scientific matters, which the founders of the American Association did not except; and in their revision of the English statement they left this feature out. The British Association was, in fact, established to do in this direction what the older scientific societies had failed to accomplish; but, perhaps because we in this country had no such older societies, the American Association confined itself exclusivly to original work and to the extension of scientific knowledge, leaving it to our schools, as Agassiz used to say, to attend to the duty of diffusing scientific knowledge. Accordingly, the British Association has ever taken a deeper interest in scientific education generally than its American imitator. It must be confessed, too, that there hav been more independence of thought and courage of expression on questions that go athwart public opinion in the official utterances of the British than of the American presidents. Even this year Lord Rayleigh broke out at the close of his inaugural address into a condemnation of the exclusiv culture of Greek and Latin in our higher education, which he regards as a great hindrance to science. Though a Cambridge man and a classical man, and holding moderate views upon the subject, he yet used the opportunity to declare his convictions, which are in substantial accord with those of the advocates of more enlarged scientific education; but in this independent and authoritativ expression of his ideas he has not been, and will probably not for some time be, emulated by any president of the American Association. And so it has also been with the presidential declarations in regard to the truth and scientific importance of the doctrin of evolution. Many years ago Professor Gray ventured, as president of the American Association, at the Dubuque meeting, to recognize the principle of evolution, after it had been over and over again adopted by the successiv presidents of the British Association. From which we may infer that science in England is more independent of popular feeling and of unintelligent public opinion than in this country.

We must regard this meeting in Montreal as a significant event. It serves as a register of the increasing intensity of interest in scientific subjects. Though it may seem to matter little where the association meets, its purpose being the same whether it assembles in Liverpool or Montreal, yet the migration of so large a body of studious men to another and distant continent simply means an unusual resistance overcome, and therefore indicates the strength of feeling that is now associated with the interests and pursuits of science. It indicates not only that science has become a great leading factor of modern civilization, but that the scientific mind is more and more affected by the enlargement of its tendencies and the expansion of its influence. While in other fields of mental activity, political or religious, local, sectarian, and narrow influences predominate, in science men are occupied with widening and liberalizing influences which cannot fail in time, by their reactions upon character, to do much toward obliterating the traditional jealousies and antagonisms in which different peoples hav been educated.
